CHRISTMAS AND OTHER OLD NATIONAL MERRY-MAKINGS CONSIDERED, WITH REFERENCE TO THE NATURE OF THE AGE, AND TO THE DESIRABLENESS OF THEIR REVIVAL.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?—Twelfth Night.

THE comedy, from which this quotation is made,—(a passage, involving as SHAKESPEARE'S pleasantries are apt to do, so much kind-hearted and tolerant wisdom) is supposed, with some reason, to be the last play that he wrote. If so, it is a delightful specimen of the master-spirit of those holiday-times, and of the happy-making disposition he kept up to the last,—and this too, in spite of early ardour, which is so apt to go to another extreme,—of a profession which peculiarly exposed him to the attacks of jealousy and envy, and of other troubles, of various sorts, which too often make men bitter with their nature. It was this sweet greatness of mind which led him to reconcile his deepest tragedies with such exquisite tastes and humanities, that our tears all turn to balm, and we depart with nothing but kind and equal feelings towards our fellow-creatures, instead of peevish or disdainful. His native cheerfulness is even observable, we think, in the titles of his plays. Those of his tragedies are in general mere names of persons;—his comedies are the Merry Wives of Windsor, As You Like It, Much Ado about Nothing, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, All's Well That Ends Well, Twelfth Night or What you Will, &c. What a companion must SHAKESPEARE have been for Twelfth Night!

But to return to that subject,—Twelfth Day, which closes the Christmas holidays, is the greatest and has been most preserved of them all,—the crown of the feast. It "has been observed in this kingdom," says Dr. DRAKE, ever since the reign of ALFRED; in whose days, "he adds," quoting from COLLIER'S Ecclesiastical History, "a law was made with relation to Holidays, by virtue of which the twelve days after the Nativity of our Saviour were made festivals." (DRAKE, Vol. 1. p. 127.)—Thus we see this truly great monarch, (the other greatest name in England with SHAKESPEARE) studying the enjoyment of the subjects whom he so nobly fought for, and regarding the extension of their holidays as a fit task for a paternal legislator.

The reference of Twelfth Day to the Wise Men of the East mentioned in the Bible, who have been mistaken for Kings, is well known. It has been sometimes called the Feast of the Three Kings, as it is still in some other countries; and hence most likely the custom of drawing for King and Queen. We say most likely, for though all our festivals have perhaps a religious origin of some kind or other, and are reasonably mixed up with a religious feeling, (provided it be a cheerful one and such as does real honour to the Great Spirit of Nature), yet it is by no means certain that any one of them originates in the Christian Religion exclusively. It has been usual for most nations to make merry at certain marked periods of the year; and several of the customs on such occasions are traceable to the Gothic and Celtic religions, or, as in the case with many of the ceremonies of the Catholic Church, to the worship of Greece and Rome. It is not necessary therefore to occupy our attention with points that may have any thing like an exclusive tendency. Exclusiveness is the bane of humanity at all times, much more so at times of professed mirth and benevolence; and holidays that are kept in the true spirit, that is to say, with hearty sociality, and a feeling for whatever can contribute to it in external nature, will easily accommodate the idea of their customs to all descriptions of faith. Christmas, or the Saturnalia,—May-Day, or the Floralia, Holidays, Games, Feasts, Belteins, Bairns,—a great and good Being will have been pleased with them all under whatever denomination, if there has been kindness and happiness among his creatures.

Twelfth Day, as it was kept by our ancestors, was much the same, in its specific character, as it is now. A king and queen were created at hazard by means of a bean and a pea, or other lots, stuck in a cake, which the company broke up; and a Court being formed by their Majesties, the characters were kept up till midnight; only with their usual superiority to us in merry-making, there was a more poetical air given to the mirth in high life, more carousing and music among the gentry, more country-sport among the peasantry, and a greater exhibition every where of sensitiveness to the beauties and cheap luxuries of nature. Yet what may we not recover with the help of good-will? The Wassel-bowl,* of which we spoke in our last, was in its greatest glory on Twelfth

Dr. Drake, in mentioning that he has a large silver Wassel-bowl in his possession, which was given to a member of his family about a hundred and fifty years ago, and which "is divided by four pegs," quotes a pleasant piece of information on that subject from Brady's Clavis Calendaris. Some of these Peg or Pin Cups or Bowls, and Pin or Peg Tankards, are yet to be found in the cabinets of antiquaries; and we are to trace from their use some common terms yet current among us. When a person is much related, we say he is "in a merry Merry Pin," which no doubt originally meant, he had reached that mark which had deprived him of his usual sedateness and sobriety; we talk of taking a man "a peg lower," when we imply we shall check him in any forwardness: a saying which originated from a regulation that deprived all those of their turn of drinking, or of their peg, who had become troublesome in their liquor; from the like rule of society came also the expression of "He is a peg too low," i. e. has been restrained too far, when we see that a person is not in equal spirits with his company; while we also remark of an individual, that is getting on "peg by peg," or, in other words, he is taking greater freedoms than he ought to do, which formerly meant, he was either drinking out of his turn, or, contrary to express regulation, did not confine himself to his proper portion, or peg, but drank into the next, thereby taking a double quantity." and of the revival of this in some places in our own time, we have had the pleasure to hear in the course of the week, as well as of its existence still in some parts of the country. Those who pique themselves therefore on having a true Old English, Shakspearean, Alfredian cup, must do their best next Tuesday; on which day also, of course, the height of the mirth will be at its climax;—the best wit of old, middle-aged, and young, must be in requisition;—the games at cards, if any, by all means round, so as to admit players of all ages and sizes;—the king behave himself with true greatness, not making insidious partitions of his neighbour's fish;—the queen be served with infinite gallantry;—and the rest of the characters have their proper effect of shewing how good humouredly we should take such varieties in real life. One dance at least there should be, wherever it can be contrived, for health as well as vivacity's sake; and a little music and song also, to modulate the uproariousness, and remind the Animal Spirits of the presence of the Graces. Here's a sprightly Twelfth Night song by ROBERT HERRICK, which carries its music along with it:—

Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake full of plums,
Where Beau's the king of the sport here;
Beside, we must know,
The Pea also
Must revel, as queen in the court here.
Begin then to chuse,
This night as ye use,
Who shall (for the present delight here)
Be a king by the lot,
And who shall not
Be twelfth-day Queen for the night here,
Which known, let us make
Joy-sops with the cake;
And let not a man be seen here,
Who, unurg'd, will not drink,
To the base from the brink,
A health to the king and the queen here.
Next, crown the bowl full
With gentle lambs-wool;*
Add sugar, nutmeg, and ginger,
With store of ale too;†
And thus ye must do
To make the wassail a swinger.
Give then to the king
And queen wassailing;
And though with ale ye be wet here,
Yet part ye from hence
As free from offence,
As when ye innocent met here.

* Roasted apples. † Or wine.

Pray admire the end of this hey-day song of merriment. Could any dance fall into a prettier, modest courtesy? Could any sermon end better? How much more efficacious, in behalf of real virtue, to inspire hilarity, and then appeal to the kindly passions excited,—than to threaten, and frighten, and make gloomy, and then expect peace and charity to ensue! The title of one of Ben Jonson's Masques, which was presented at Court on Twelfth Night, is "Pleasure reconciled to Virtue." This has long been a very desirable reconciliation indeed, and only because Pleasure and Virtue have both been so little valued. We have no more right to be kept asunder, than inclination; but the world has made so many artificial Pleasures and Virtues, and taken such extraordinary pains to separate the two ideas, (in spite of some professions and recommendations to the contrary), that, by selfish pretenders or foolish mistakers, real Pleasure is almost always lost as much sight of as the Golden Age itself; while real Virtue is too often defied by those, who just see far enough to detect the false. The reason is, that Virtue is too much made to consist of compromises with really vicious and foolish and overworked states of society, which of necessity cannot attain to pleasure; and so Innocence or Hurtlessness comes to mean things, both in abstinence and practice, which it would not otherwise do; and Happiness is despaired of in this beautiful world.—nay, often made a merit of being despaired of! So invincible almost is the tendency to get pleasurable sensation of some sort; and yet such modes does human folly discover at the very same time, of cutting off its own power of returning to them!—We hope the days will yet come when the world will be wiser; and when it will think it as barbarous to make these intellectual and moral sacrifices of human beings to the Molochs of Gain and Superstition, as it now holds it to have been barbarous to sacrifice their bodies. At all events, things may be better and more cheerful than they are now; they have been so; and as these are the two great steps towards improvement,—first, not to despair,—and second, not to delay,—here's to their speedy reformation, and to the reader's health, in a Wassel-cup made by "a Wife, a Mother, and an Englishwoman."

We conclude these articles for the present; though we must own we do so with an unwillingness, which will be pardoned by such of our brother-politicians as do not confine their notions of politics to a question of the day, or their enthusiasm for the good and beautiful to the faces of the Allied Sovereigns. We shall continue them however from time to time, as the seasons of the old holidays come round,—particularly on May Day; for besides the pleasure of writing upon such subjects, and of hoping that they may be of some little service, we have now the additional and delightful excitement of knowing that they have already been so. We have had accounts from various quarters of the revival of old festivities,—some brought us by friends, some that have come round to us by chance, to the great surprise of those who witnessed them;—and some sent us by correspondents on the subject, among whom we have particularly to thank those who appear in our present paper, with a fair and true woman at their head. We should formerly have left out the complimentary parts of their letters, perhaps because we were more proud, or less understood what was due to others, or less felt the value of sympathy; but we now leave them in, and feel ourselves much more than overpaid by the accounts and reflections which they accompany. The letter of our fair stranger in particular happened to come upon us in the midst of some very wintry reflections indeed, and roused us up again like a beam of sunshine.—This has been one of the pleasantest periods of our public life.

HOLIDAY REVIVALS.

SIR,—For many years past I have been a constant reader of your liberal and patriotic Paper; but, much as I admire the general run of its contents, I have been more

THE EXAMINER.

Gratified by your observations on the right method of celebrating the present blessed season, than with any particular paper, if I except the one published after the Battle of Waterloo, and the two recent ones on the demise of the Princess Charlotte.

I am a lover of Nature and of social happiness, a happiness which is but too little known among the higher classes of English society in modern times. I was born and educated in the country, and I was early taught to hail Christmas as the peculiar season for acts of benevolence, and old English mirth and hospitality. I have lamented with each returning December, the visible alteration in the manner of celebrating this once joyous period. Your paper enchanted me—and I resolved for once to lend my aid towards restoring the “Good old Times”, in the proper sense of the phrase. I am a middle-aged woman, and have for the last ten years been deprived of the use of my limbs, and rarely know the blessing of an hour’s health; but I have not forgotten the green days of my youth, and I can still be happy, whilst I see others so.—On Christmas Eve, I decked my house with the verdure of my garden, and commenced the twelve days revelry with a revival of all the old customs and sporting, crowned with the “Wassail Bowl.” On Christmas Day the Poor of the Parish partook (so far as my means could extend) of old English fare, in Beef and Plum-pudding; and after a similar repast in the parlour, with a large party of young folks, we passed the evening in successive games, and the peals of re-iterated laughter cheered my heart, and would have pleased yours, had you heard them, I think. If God spares my life, I shall continue to keep up the hilarity of the season, by every means in my power, till after the Twelfth-day,—not forgetting the Baron of Beef, the “Boar’s Head,” and the standing Christmas Pye, as the embellishment of a well-stored Larder.

I have no other apology to offer for thus intruding on you, but the idea which has occurred to me, that every proof given of the good likely to result from your excellent papers on this subject must be gratifying to you.

Wishing you many and happy returns of a season, whose cheering influence you seem so well able to appreciate, I remain, Sir, yours, sincerely and cordially,

A WIFE, A MOTHER, AND AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

South Lambeth, Dec. 28, 1817.

EXTRACT FROM THE LETTER OF ANOTHER CORRESPONDENT.

You deserve the thanks of every Englishman for your warm-hearted attempts to restore the conviviality of the present festive season, and have put me to some expense to buy “Christmas,” to decorate the kitchen, &c. that mere thoughtlessness had made me omit these last two years.

I passed three or four Christmases in a beautiful and secluded village, near the coast of Sussex, where the villagers have many old English words and customs still current. They regularly go “wassailing,” singing “wassel songs,” (and call them so because their fathers did), and come into your halls and kitchens, and act plays about the Grand Turk, and the Christian Knight, and the Holy Land, and old Father Christmas; all fairly dressed, and personified according to the age and condition of the actors; for old and young join in it, and go round from house to house—besides carol singing, &c. They called it “tip-teering,” and the actors “tip-teerers,” but I never could learn either the orthography or etymology of the word. I think I could remember almost the whole of their play; it seldom varied in all their parties, and was in metre.

Wishing you all the enjoyments of the present festive season, which you are so qualified to enjoy, I remain, Sir, your very obedient servant and constant reader,

J. F.

EXTRACTS FROM THE LETTER OF

Sir,—The opening of your paper on the season attracted my attention last Sunday, and my expectation for to-day, which is not disappointed this morning, its poetry, good humour, and good sense, once cheering and refreshing, and are well in keeping with the fine winter sunshine we enjoy this season.

You have not adverted to a condition of Christmas, pregnant with reflections on its customs:—viz. that it is a Christian institution; that it is the Saturnalia of ancient days—the Feast of Saturn, the Father of the Gods. To this habit, long formed, and probably carried to its greatest abuse of licence when the slaves changed places with their Lords, the Christian institution conformed, here turning the observance to its better purpose. The astronomy of the season, too, is a circumstance worth noting:—the return of the sun from his most distant point in the southern circle of his ecliptic course. New Year’s Day is properly the 22d of December; and the birth of the Saviour, at this season, was a coincidence which happily fell in with the heathen practice, and served to tolerate, and, in changing its object, to perpetuate the habit. We must go far back for its origin. It is probably of Persian institution in the temperate zone, and refers to the early worship of the Sun, as God of this visible diurnal sphere. When sensible images were all the human mind could reach to, the Sun must have been the object of wonder and of gratitude for his power and his benefits; that is, the object of fear and of hope, the God of trembling mortals.

We are so much the slaves and the dupes of verbal cant, that I cannot acknowledge the advantage of chasing away one by the substitution of another; and am not therefore at once content with the expression of all the meaning that is intended to be conveyed by your new-fangled term of “Other-worldliness,” of which by its repetition you may grow fond. Things are too much abused by words, and by none more than these “cant brevities” which mean any thing, and to which soon every one who sees them affixes a meaning of his own.

The Creator of us, and of this world we are placed in, did no doubt give it to us to enjoy; nor has all our obliquity and selfishness, and disregard or oppression of our fellows, been able yet entirely to mar this destiny. But surely we have defaced this stamp, degraded this condition, deprived each too much of this heavenly boon, this natural lot, which Christmas was meant to acknowledge and keep in memory, to keep in sight, and in hope, though it could not re-establish and restore! We labour too hard, to gain and possess too little. Order and art, method and prudence, equity and the due reward of toil, could make all glad. Virtue and industry, sobriety and economy, have much in store for us when we shall draw upon their hoards of leisure and pleasure, of ease and sufficiency, all the year through, and to allow of a merriment at Christmas, grateful to the giver of all, and liberal of his gifts one to another.

DISTRESSED SAILORS.

A Meeting took place on Friday at the King’s Head, Poultry, with the object of adopting some speedy means of relieving the distressed Seamen, with whom the streets are crowded.

It appeared from the statement of the Chairman, Mr. M’Auley, that the subject had previously undergone some investigation, and that a Committee had been formed with the view of fixing upon the most eligible mode of facilitating the views of those who proposed the Meeting.

THE EXAMINER.

the names of the Committee, those of the late and the present Lord Mayor appeared.

His LORDSHIP declined taking the Chair, and begged to be understood in doing so, as not acting from any other feeling than those of humanity. He was apprehensive of the consequences of giving his public sanction to a meeting, the result of which might be the prodigious influx of the distressed, and those pretending to be so, to the City of London: an event that would add to the exhibitions of misery that daily took place.

Mr. PAINE, Clerk to the Magistrates at the Guildhall Police Office, was in the habit of witnessing scenes of great distress, and he trusted there would be a co-operation between the Meeting and the Magistrates of Police upon a subject so important. He then read the Petition which he had presented to the Court of Common Council, and expressed a hope that, as the Committee of City Lands, to which it was referred, could not recommence their functions for some time, the interval would be occupied in providing some means of relief. The London Workhouse, established in the reign of Charles II. in his opinion, presented an asylum in which starvation, at least, could be prevented, and at a future period the expenses might be defrayed by a regulation, directing that the different parishes should pay in proportion to their extent and ability. In answer to the observation of the Lord Mayor with respect to the probable influx of strange vagrants, he had to say, that the city of London could only act as it was in the habit of doing when the hospitals were full; there being no more room, those who could not be accommodated were obliged to wait till there was, and the City of London would, by an exertion in this cause, shew that an example to other parts of the country was not wanting.

The CHAIRMAN said, the attention of those assembled was to be directed to the object of distinguishing between worthy and unworthy objects; that the former might be provided with employment in ships, and that impostors might be treated with the wholesome severity provided by Act of Parliament. There were numbers of seamen about the streets in a state of disease and nakedness, in consequence of their own vices, and such men could not be taken into the service until those two very revolting objections were removed. The doubt whether good or harm was likely to arise from what the Meeting might determine upon, was itself distressing, but something must be attempted, and the concurrence of the Magistrates would render great facilities to the investigation.

The LORD MAYOR saw plainly that the motive was excellent; but he regretted to say, that by far the greater number of those who claimed charity as seamen were impostors. There were, besides, many foreign seamen about the streets, whom he had sent to the different Consuls in vain; for they had rather beg than go home; and accordingly betook themselves to the accustomed demand upon the compassion of Englishmen. His Lordship again expressed his fear of accumulating distresses.

A long conversation then took place upon the probable means of distinguishing between deserving and undeserving objects.

One of the Members observed, that the distress they had to relieve was merely of a temporary nature, and that next spring would present the most grateful mode of disposing of the poor seamen, in the departure of the East and West India fleets, in which they could find instant employment. It was suggested, that a house, or a ship, should be hired immediately for the purpose of accommodating those, who should, upon examination, be deemed worthy objects; that public notice should be given of the place where Captains of ships might be supplied with men; and that the Police Officers should take all persons of the description alluded to, who were found begging, to an office, hired by the Committee, two or three of whom should attend daily, assisted by a person of sea-faring intelligence, for the purpose of examining into the cases of those brought before them. A doubt having been entertained of the power of compelling those who were unwilling to attend the office,

The LORD MAYOR said, he should give directions to the Police Officers of the City to act according to the suggestion that had been just given.

It was agreed upon all sides that it was indispensably necessary to the Ship Owners and all others employed in commerce, to have the streets cleared of those begging sailors, for many of them contracted, from the necessity of begging, a fondness for it, and it might be found difficult to induce them to work, after having had a successful experiment of the effects of a lazy life. At an early period of the meeting it was mentioned that application to the Admiralty would be advisable; but that hint was soon rejected, upon the ground that the observance of official forms would make starvation inevitable by delay! With respect to those whose characters were bad, and who were not qualified to act as able-bodied seamen, it seemed to be understood that the Committee should endeavour to procure employment for them of a different kind, and that there should be a recommendation to occupy them, amongst other things, in clearing the navigation of the Thames, and repairing the roads about the metropolis.

One of the Members said, he was convinced no able-bodied seaman would beg. His noble pride would prevent him!—Another declared that such a declaration was completely erroneous. He knew it to be a fact, that there were many Petty Officers, who had served long and well, and who, being reduced to the alternative of begging or dying, very judiciously adopted the former.

The Captain of a merchantman said, the practice followed by West Indianmen, of discharging their men upon going into dock, was the cause of a great deal of the misery that existed. When at Hull and other docks the men were retained, he could not see why the West India Docks should adopt such a system. If he had a son, and was in poor circumstances, he never would put him on board a West Indiaman, for that reason.

The Meeting then, amongst others, made the following recommendations, which are to be submitted at the General Meeting:—

“That a Committee be appointed to engage a vessel, in which poor seamen shall be lodged and sustained until provided with a situation.—That Members of the Committee shall attend to the cases brought before them daily, at an office chosen for that purpose; and that the Police Magistrates be solicited to give their assistance in having all vagrant seamen brought before the Committee, and that temporary sustenance be afforded.”

Thanks having been given to the Lord Mayor for his promptitude in offering assistance, and to the Chairman for his conduct in the Chair, the Meeting broke up.

SUBSCRIPTION FOR MR. HONE.

On Monday a numerous meeting of the Friends of the Liberty of the Press and Trial by Jury took place at the City of London Tavern, to take into consideration the conduct of the late prosecution against Mr. Hone, and of the propriety of opening a subscription for that individual. The room was crowded to excess.

Mr. WATKIN having been called to the Chair, observed, that though he had to regret that some more able individual had not been called to the Chair, yet he took it with pleasure, because he considered this as an object most materially connected with the Liberty of the Press. With respect to the Parodies, he never read them till after the trial: he was not an admirer of these sort of productions; but he had read these, and he thought he might venture to say, no one could read them without seeing their object; and he was persuaded, that every one who heard him would agree with him, that had they been written to ridcule Reformers or Anti-Ministerialists, instead of Ministers, they would have been passed over, as all similar productions had been before—(Applause)—With respect to the present Meeting, he would state how it had its origin. He and some other individuals having met at a Coffee-house soon after the third trial of Mr. Hone terminated, it became of course the subject of conversation; and it was then suggested, that as the Liberty of the Press was closely connected with the Trial by Jury, on which, united, in a great measure depended the liberty of the subject, the noble defence which Mr. Hone had made of those two great bulwarks of our freedom, called on the Public for its gratitude. The situation of Mr. Hone was then adverted to, and it was proposed that some such measure as the present should be adopted, where the liberality of his fellow-citizens might be exerted, to place him and his family in a state of comfort. A string of Resolutions were then drawn up, which would severally be put to the Meeting; who would have the opportunity of expressing their opinion upon them.

Sir F. BURDETT expressed his satisfaction at and gratitude for the applause which was now bestowed upon him. Next to the duty of maintaining the Liberty of the Press, was, in his opinion, the duty of supporting an humble individual, who, for political purposes had been persecuted, and through whom the Liberty of the Press and of the Country had been struck at. He trusted the Meeting would this day express the strong sense of the noble stand which this humble individual had made, and of the conduct of Ministers, who, under a most hypocritical pretence, had persecuted him beyond what had occurred on any former occasion. The worthy Baronet then proceeded to read the several Resolutions which had been put into his hand, and which, he was persuaded, would be adopted unanimously, and acted upon with the liberality becoming such a Meeting and such a subject. He perfectly agreed with all the general observations made by the worthy Chairman in opening the business of the day; but he must add one more observation, and that was, that no measures which the People could adopt, could secure their liberty—the Liberty of the Press, or the Trial by Jury—unless we had a Reform in Parliament. (Applause.) Unless those who had to guard and make laws were pure, how could it be expected the laws should remain pure, or the Liberties of the People secure? With respect to Mr. Hone, he knew nothing of him, but in his late prosecution. With his future life or conduct he had nothing to do; but by the noble stand he had made, and the honest intentions which he had since shewn, he had no doubt of his future conduct proving him worthy of their support. For what was passed, however, the Public were called on to support him. The noble stand which he had made—the victory he had obtained over the Learned Judges, and all the Court Lawyers, was unequalled on any former occasion. (Applause.) No such conduct had ever been adopted by Judges before; they had, on this occasion, completely misconstrued the Act commonly called Mr. Fox's Libel Bill, and had, under the provisions of that Bill, as they construed it, constituted themselves Foremen of the Jury; and in that character delivered their verdict, and so delivered it to the Jury, with all possible solemnity, with the hand placed on the heart, or where the heart ought to be, and declaring that conscientiously as honest men, and consistently with their oath of office, they were bound to give this opinion. Now such was not the true and fair way of construing the Act; the Act said, the Judge should give his opinion as in other cases. If it were otherwise, if it were as the Learned Judges had construed it, the subject was now in a much worse situation than before the Act was passed. Unfortunately, it was seldom that Judges or Lawyers on this subject were men of common sense. A Jury of honest men, with common sense, had, however, decided for themselves, and acquitted Mr. Hone, notwithstanding two Learned Judges conscientiously declared him guilty—(Applause.)—The Hon. Baronet here observed, that there was an individual, whose name on this occasion ought not to be passed over, that was, Mr. Pearson, who had obtained for the public, of the City of London, a free, upright, and honest Jury List, and got rid of that old Book, which, by long use, had become rotten and corrupt.—(Applause.)—This was the first dawning of Reform. If the cleansing system of Mr. Pearson could be extended to Middlesex, and the rest of the kingdom, then the people might defy all the attempts of Ministers. Another doctrine of the Courts of Law newly set up was, that the Crown Office had a right to select the Jurors: though it appeared that with the old book the Master of the Crown Office was most polite; he would not select any, but take them fairly. That was something like what his old friend Mr. Horne Tooke used to say; it was like offering a person a basket of rotten oranges, and desiring him to select a dozen for himself!—(Much laughter)—The Master of the Crown Office had now got a new List to take Jurors from, and now he claimed a right to select and choose; but with all his care, he could not select a Jury which would find Mr. Hone guilty. He had heard of a story of a man who used to go about the streets shewing a lion occasionally putting his head down the animal's throat. He used to say, if ever the lion wagged his tail whilst a head was down his throat, the head would go for it. One day the beast wagged his tail, and the poor man lost his head. Mr. Hone's head had been in as dangerous a situation; the lion had wagged his tail: fortunately, however, Mr. Hone escaped with his head, but he was not less entitled to the gratitude of his fellow-citizens on that account. Sir Francis then proceeded to move the first Resolution, viz.

"That the Liberty of the Press is one of the dearest rights and proudest distinctions of Englishmen; and is inseparably connected with, and wholly dependent on, the purity of the Trial by Jury."

Mr. Alderman THORPE congratulated the Meeting on the triumph of Mr. Hone; the victory obtained by him had established the Liberty of the Press, and the Trial by Jury, without which every country must be despotic—with which every country must to a certain extent be free.

Mr. Waithman then proceeded to read the other Resolutions, which were carried unanimously:—

"That the inestimable importance of the sacred and constitutional right of Trial by Jury has never been more demonstratively proved than by the recent prosecutions and honourable acquittals of Mr. Wm. Hone."

"That Parodies on Scripture having been written and published by Martin Luther, the Father of the Reformation—by Dignitaries of the Church, and by other eminent and learned Personages, down to the present time, we are persuaded, that the exception taken to the Parodies of Mr. Hone, by the present Ministers of the Crown, was to answer political purposes against the Liberty of the Press."

"That hypocritical prostitution of Religion, and a pretended zeal for its defence, when used by corrupt Statesmen as a mark for political persecution, must ever be held by all sincere Christians as the worst profanation of its sacred name."

"That it is evident, from the manner in which those prosecutions were commenced and conducted, that the real object of Ministers was not to protect religion, but to crush an apparently defenceless individual, who had exposed their political delinquencies, to stifle public discussion, to destroy the Liberty of the Press, and to uphold existing abuse."

"That the extensive knowledge—the varied talents—the manly intrepidity—the energy of mind—and the unshaken perseverance—which enabled Mr. W. Hone so dauntlessly to resist the reiterated assaults of Ministerial persecution, entitle him to the gratitude and support of every friend to constitutional freedom."

"That a subscription be now opened, and that the money which may be subscribed be placed in the hands of a Committee, to be used in such way as shall appear to them best calculated to promote the permanent welfare of Mr. Hone and his family."

"That the following Gentlemen be of the Committee:—Robert Waithman, Joseph Hurcombe, Wm. Sturch, Alderman Thorpe, Alderman Goodbehere, Samuel Brooks, and Wm. Williams, Wm. Teasdale; and Robert Waithman, Esq. was appointed the Treasurer."

MR. WAITHMAN said, he had one circumstance to mention, namely, that a subscription to a very considerable amount had already been entered into. He would read a list of the subscribers. Mr. W. did so, and, amongst others, was that of a Lady, 25 one-pound notes, and five five-pound notes. Mr. W. said, he had also that moment had put into his hands a subscription of 100*l*. He was not at liberty to say who it was from, but it was an individual known to all present. His description was as follows:—"A Member of the House of Lords, an enemy to all persecution, but especially religious persecution for political purposes."

MR. PERRY said, a part of this day's proceedings had been committed to his hand, and he hoped he should be believed when he said, that on no occasion had he ever performed a task which gave him so much satisfaction, or in which he so much regretted his want of talent to do adequate justice to his subject. The Resolution now put into his hands, and which he had to submit to the Meeting, was one of thanks to a worthy Baronet near him—Sir F. Burdett. He trusted he should not be considered as enthusiastic in his admiration of that Hon. Gentleman, when he said that he never had known a man who had, with such true motives, such pure motives, and such unabated patriotism, the whole course of his parliamentary life, fought the cause of the people in the House of Commons as the worthy had done. With respect to the objects of the present meeting, they were this day met to support the Liberty of the Press, without which they might indeed exist, but not live. The Liberty of the Press was to the mind as necessary as was light to the human body. Mr. Hone had, on the late occasion, made a noble and an unprecedented stand in support of it. He (Mr. P.) was one of those Journalists who could not express the gratitude he felt to him for that stand. The law of libel in this country was so undefined, that no common man could understand it. The Crown Lawyers said it was the purpose which constituted the libel; the purpose was to be judged by the effect; they said it was truth, if truth tended to indispose men's minds, or was unpleasant to them. If such was libel, he should continue to be a libeller, for he would publish truth, even though it should displease some men, or draw down the anger of Ministers upon him. He would still say it was not a libel to tell the truth, and to maintain those privileges with which we were born. The Crown Lawyers and Judges also say it is not a libel because it is true or false, but because it may provoke a breach of the peace; that was indeed to make men not liable for their own acts, but answerable for the acts of others. He trusted it would not be long before a Requisition would be presented to the Sheriff of Middlesex, calling on him to convene a Meeting of the County to consider of the measure of Ministers the most obnoxious and unconstitutional, the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and to express an opinion on that abominable Circular of Lord Sidmouth, in which the Noble Lord said the County Magistrates had power immediately to imprison any individual publishing what he was pleased to call blasphemous Libels, but which three honest Juries had declared were not so. With respect to the Habeas Corpus Act, circumstances had proved there was no reason for its violation; and he trusted the Suspension Act would not be allowed to expire of itself without an opinion being declared upon it; and to be brought in, like the Mutiny Act, in future, perhaps once a year. (Applause.) Mr. Perry then read the Vote of Thanks to Sir F. Burdett, as follows:—

"That the Thanks of this Meeting are due to Sir F. Burdett, Bart. for his spontaneous offers of co-operation with the Gentlemen originating the subscription, in strict conformity with a life of pure motives and love of country."

Mr. Wooten was anxious to second this motion, because there never was a motion in which he more fully concurred. He could not refrain from taking this opportunity of adverting to the conduct of the Jury, who, on the Judge attempting to put that Court at lock, irrelevant matter, on the defence of Mr. Hone, got up, and nobly declared he considered the matter as relevant; and by this declaration he enabled the defendant to put himself under Jury-masters. (Applause.) The Judge's trappings shivered in the wind, and he was under the necessity of hailing the Attorney-General, and observing to that Learned Gentleman, "I think we had better let this gale blow over us." (Applause.) He would not now detain the Meeting by any observations of his, from the exercise of their liberal intention, which he hoped would have the effect of placing Mr. Hone and his infant family in a state of comfort.

Sir F. BURDETT then presented himself to the Meeting, to return thanks for the honour done to him. Their applause was the richest reward he could ever enjoy; and should his life be long or short, it should ever be his chief study to deserve it. The Worthy Baronet then proceeded to pay some compliments to the exertions of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Wooten; and concluded with moving a vote of Thanks to the former Gentleman, in the following terms:—

"That the Thanks of this Meeting are hereby cordially given to Mr. Charles Pearson, for his manly and successful struggle in correcting the corrupt system of packing Juries, which has consequently essentially toward the present triumph; and especially for his constant advice and assistance given to Mr. Hone throughout the whole of the prosecutions—affording a rare example to his profession, of zeal, independence, and disinteto prevent the interposition of the Judge between the Jury and their verdict. He spoke feelingly on this subject. He considered it as one of the greatest evils. When he was labouring under the pressure of a sentence which he should ever complain of as being unjust and oppressive, and by which he was adjudged to pay a fine, which he had determined never to pay, but rather to pass the remainder of his life in a dungeon, his friends then came forward, and relieved him from the difficulty in which he was involved. The hundred pounds then paid for him he would now present to Mr. Hone. (Loud applause.) He regretted much that he was under the necessity of paying it to the Treasurer of the Subscription in the base currency, a Bank of England note. He had endeavoured to get the legal coin of the realm for it, but in vain; no guineas could be procured. He could have had Sovereigns and Regents, indeed, but Sovereigns and Regents had nothing to do with this Meeting or Subscription. (Loud Applause.) He understood we were to have a new silver currency instead of crowns and half-crowns, he supposed they would be called Ministers and Borough-mongers. (Applause and Laughter.) The Noble Lord then handed over 100*l.* note, and declared he felt the highest pleasure in giving it, and the warmest gratitude to Mr. Hone, for affording him the opportunity of giving it.

The thanks to Mr. Pearson were then put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. PEARSON returned the meeting thanks for the honour they had done him. The worthy speaker then proceeded to detail the circumstances which attended his endeavours to obtain the object for which the meeting had now voted him its thanks. That he had been successful was mainly owing to the support and assistance which he had received from the worthy Chairman of the present meeting, in his place in the Court of Common Council. He was aware he could only impute the applause he had received to his being a young recruit in the service; if he was a recruit, Mr. Hone was his bringer, and he hoped his bringer would be well rewarded. (Much applause.)

Mr. STURGEON then moved the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Waltham, for his conduct in the Chair to-day, and for a long life of active exertions in the service and cause of the Public. The worthy gentleman then proceeded to comment on the conduct of the late prosecutions, and observed, that the Crown Lawyers were to be pitied. A parody was not yet a crime, though it soon might be so; but before it was, he would take the liberty of making one, namely, "It was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a Crown Lawyer to be an honest man."

Mr. WOOLEY seconded this motion, and congratulated the meeting on the great victory which had been obtained for the people and for their liberties by the exertions of Mr. Pearson. The Master of the Crown Office might look over his book to look for his old acquaintance, but in future he would look in vain; and he was persuaded he might safely congratulate the country on a period being put to the practice of packing Juries.

A resolution of Thanks to Mr. Waltham was then put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Waltham returned thanks. Through the whole of his political life he had received no reward, and he sought for none but the applause of his own heart and of his fellow citizens; these were the richest rewards he could receive, and all which he desired. (Applause.)

The Thanks of the Meeting were then proposed to Lord Cochrane; and they were carried unanimously.

LORD COCHRANE thanked the Meeting for the honour they had done him, and the confidence they had on all occasions placed in his assertions of rectitude of conduct. He pledged himself to prove that confidence not misplaced. In less than a month he would lay open such a scene of conspiracy, wickedness, and perjury, as never before met the eyes of the Public; and trusted, by that exposure, to prevent Ministers in future, however daring and profligate they might be, from attempting, by such means, to crush an individual who might become obnoxious to them.

The Meeting then adjourned. Books were opened, and subscriptions to the amount of several hundred pounds were immediately paid down. Sir F. Burdett subscribed 100*l.*; Mr. Waltham 20*l.*; Mr. Perry 20*l.*; Alderman Goodbehore 20*l.*; and several sums of 10*l.* and 5*l.* were subscribed by individuals.

PRICE OF STOCKS ON SATURDAY.

3 per Cent. Red. 81½ | 3 per Cent. Cons. shut.

NOVELTIES at the Theatre, next week.

Attention will be paid to the Communication on Prisons.

We have often begged our Correspondents to understand, that we cannot possibly keep all their letters, with the chance either of their being called for again, or of their accumulating into one of those heaps of paper at which the REGENT himself was alarmed. They will have the goodness to recollect this.

The Sonnet from ZAPPI will be inserted with pleasure, and so will the fine one entitled OZYMANDIAS.

MARIANNE'S DREAM also is not forgotten among our poetical stores.—A. F. G. has guessed rightly.

"EVENING HOURS" have been received, and are certainly promising for so young a writer, especially the Sonnets at the end, one of which we will give shortly to our readers.

Did Mr. R. W. get his paper?

Various Letters and Verses have been sent on the PRINCESS CHARLOTTE; and various others, in a very different strain, on other royal personages.

Will any extracts from the compositions of the young man in question suit the purpose of Mr. W. who favoured us with a letter? The Minuet by MOZART mentioned in a late Examiner is to be found in the same publication which relates the origin of it, — the Supplement, lately published, of Mr. SHIELD'S Introduction to Harmony. The other questions which accompanied the present one, have been answered in the course of our political articles.

R. B.'s judicious Letter on the POOR LAWS,—a CRITIQUE on Mr. West's Great Picture of Death on the Pale Horse,—and other Articles, in our next.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JANUARY 4.

THE French Deputies, in the course of their discussions on the Liberty of the Press, have rejected a proposition for applying the Trial by Jury to offences of it; so that the Chronicle observes, "the other amendments introduced into the Projet become of little consequence." It is indeed as sage and satisfactory a proceeding as the old Bartholomew-fair improvement,—the part of Hamlet left out by particular desire.—However, there are two things which it tells us, though not very new ones;—first, that the BOURBONS, and even the BONAPARTISTS while BOURBON Ministers, are afraid of letting the people be judges; and second, that they have not grown wise enough, as some supposed, to fall in with the liberal demands of the age, and thus obtain that only security of their power, which BONAPARTE, with a candour which he could afford, acknowledged he had missed.

The Citizens, it seems, are becoming alarmed about their money-transactions with Government, and the enormous issue of paper. The Sovereigns are said to disappear as fast as they put forth their heads, and on the other hand, the Ministerialists will say that it is only a false alarm as usual,—just as they have said on all occasions, whether the alarm was false or not, and just as Courtiers have talked in the anti-chambers of the corrupt, up to the last moment when the whole edifice of Government sunk with them and their masters. Certainly bad things may be bolstered up a long time; and the dropsical may talk merrily on the strength of what is preparing them wretchedness and destruction; but the thing is to prove that a dropsy is in itself advantageous, and that such a system of finance as ours can possibly last. We have seen its effects on the lower parts of the community,—on the shrunk and mortified legs, as well as the jolly laughing head,—which nevertheless can turn pale pretty often, and feel the sinking at the heart;—and we are persuaded it can not last. The "crash," which a fine old politician of the present day said would take place "some fine morning," will inevitably, we fear, take place. The time even, we believe, is just now fast approaching, according to the former prediction in PAIN'S Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance.—"a treatise unanswered. "Go, count the graves," said PAIN, to the false calculators of all sorts, "and learn the folly of your arithmetic." Indeed, we know readers of Mr. CORBETT'S "Paper against Gold," who though very cool-headed persons, and quite alive to the deficiencies of that able putter of common cases, who expect before long to see strange beggars in the highways, and to be accosted with—"For God's sake, Sir,—a little charity to a poor Fundholder." A strange sight indeed! cry some;—but so cried others at seeing the Assignats in the French windows; and so thought the writer of this article a few years back, when he saw a French Marquis dealing out small-coal. There are many persons in this metropolis, who have had their books bound, and excellently too, by a French Count;—only think of PAINE's treatise on the downfall of our Finance bound by some unfortunate fund-holder, who shall think himself lucky too! We most heartily wish that such things were not to take place, and, as far as our strength goes, have tried to prevent them; but it is one of the habits, as well as prognostics, of a diseased system, to get angry at being warned, and to do even worse out of resentment. Happy are they who have looked to other means of reasonable possession and enjoyment than mere money-getting. If chance has thrown any of them into the system, their best riches may yet survive; and if they have used what they have gained in a different spirit from others, accursed for a while be that ungrateful friend who would not share his last crust with them. It is not every one that can disentangle himself from these systems, whom education or other chances have thrown into them; though some, we know, would do so if they could, and are no more formed to live in them than birds in a till. At all events, let us cultivate as much as we can other and safer modes of life, and such luxuries as depend not on bad systems of government, but on the eternal, always proffered, and seldom accepted kindnesses of Nature and Reason.

The Antigua Gazette of the 5th ult. has reached town, and letters were received from Barbadoes to the 28th of October, and from St. Kitt's to the 13th ult. We are happy to have to state that none of his Majesty's vessels on the Leeward Island station suffered in the dreadful hurricane of the 21st of October. The Antelope, Admiral HARRY, reported to have been lost, was safe at St. Kitt's, which does not appear to have been affected by the hurricane. Its destructive effects at St. Lucie and Martinique, prove to have been very little exaggerated in the first accounts. At Saint Lucie all the barracks were prostrated, and General SEYMOUR, the Governor, his wife and children, together with Major BURDETT, his wife, child, and servant, were buried in the ruins, and all, except Mrs. Seymour and her children, perished; the Governor having survived only a short time after he was taken out of the ruins. Upwards of 14 vessels were on shore. The hurricane was not felt at Tobago. The following is an extract of a letter from Barbadoes, dated the 27th ult.—"On Saturday night we here experienced a tremendous gale of wind from the westward. It did some trifling damage on shore, and threw on the beach twelve vessels of different kinds. As yet we have not heard how they fared at Martinique. From St. Lucie, a vessel to-day, brings deplorable accounts. I have just seen the Governor's Secretary's letter to Lord COMBERRIE, in the Governor's name, craving support and assistance for the distressed inhabitants of that island. The letter describes the devastation briefly, but no doubt correctly. It states that not a negro-house or residence was left standing—all destroyed, except magazines and tanks. The Governor (General SEYMOUR) and his family were extricated from under the ruins of their house. The Governor was so much hurt as not to be expected to live 48 hours. Major BURDETT and his wife and child were killed by the fall of their residence. The canes were nearly all cut up by the roots; the men in the garrison were saved by being ordered out of the barracks in time. The town was nearly all destroyed, and the island laid waste as far as cultivation extended.—Many lives were lost."

The private letters from America notice the general and earnest expectation which prevailed respecting the tone and sentiments of the Speech which was to be delivered by the President on the 1st ult. in opening the First Session of the Fifteenth Congress of the United States. In consequence of the acquisition of two new States, Indiana and Mississippi, the whole number is at present 20. The Senators, therefore, will amount in all to 40, and the Representatives to 184. Besides these, there will be three Delegates, one from each of the territories of Missouri, Illinois, and Alabama.

The Paper which first alluded to the probability of a matrimonial union between the son of Sir F. BURDETT and a daughter of the Duke of MARLBOROUGH, has inserted the following paragraph:—"We have authority to contradict the statement relative to a certain Baronet's son and the daughter of a Noble Duke, there being no truth in it."—Courier.

MEDICAL KNAVES.—The public are cautioned from being imposed upon by two persons travelling on horse-back, of respectable appearance, in the character of a Physician and his Apothecary, the one on a gray and the other on a dark brown or black horse. The apparent age of the pretended Physician is about 35, and that of the Apothecary about 50. The former calls himself the nephew of the celebrated ASHLEY COOPER, and introduces himself by stating that he has been into the country a few days in assisting some surgeon in the performance of an operation (whose name he does not omit to mention, as well as the extreme difficulty of the case), and being desirous of rendering himself as serviceable as possible on his return home, by accident hearing that the person whom he addresses has some one in his family labouring under some affliction (which he has of course made himself acquainted with before this interview), and informs them that it is from no desire to insinuate himself into their confidence, his sole motives are from a desire to benefit the afflicted individual,—asserting at the same time, as a proof, that he never takes any fee unless expressly sent for. By his style of address, and apparently philanthropic motives, he of course often proves successful. But the sequel will generally compensate for his departing from the usual custom of taking a fee. When he obtains access, his first enquiry is for pen, ink, and paper, on which he inscribes something to be given to his apothecary, who is a very careful man, and always accompanies him in his journey. This careful apothecary soon alights, and prepares from his portmanteau (which doubtless contains "salve for every sore") the prescribed lotion, tincture, or salve; whatever it may be, it is soon prepared, and whose charge for this precious compound may well be said to amount to sufficient, both for fee and medicine! The industrious tradesman or the humble cottager now finds himself in the most singular situation; the enormity of the demand forces upon him the idea that his philanthropic friends are impostors, but the respectability of their appearance forbids him to resist the payment: he pays them, to rid himself of the company of those whose longer presence may perhaps be worse to him than being the dupe of a deep laid trick to impose on the afflicted!—Is there no remedy for this evil?

The Baron de GRIMM, in his Memoirs, mentions the extraordinary circumstance of an irritable French Author having died in a fit of anger, in consequence of a favourite work, which he had himself revised with great care, having been printed off with upwards of 300 typographical errors, half of which had been made by the Corrector of the Press!

The Duke of CAMBRIDGE is expected to arrive in England about the middle of February, to settle some preliminaries, relative to his approaching marriage.—Courier.

A barrister entered the hall with his wig very much awry, and of which, not at all apprized, he was obliged to endure from almost every observer some remark on its appearance, till at last, addressing himself to Mr. CURRAN, he asked him, "Do you see any thing ridiculous in this wig?" The answer instantly was, "Nothing but the head."—O'Regan's Memoirs of Curran.

An opinion is said to have been current in JAMES the 1st's time, that he was David Rizzio's son. The royal pedant would fain have been thought the Solomon of the North: upon which HARRY the 4th of France said, "Ay, ay, I've no doubt he is the son of David."

GRAND-DAUGHTER OF CROMWELL.—In the suite of the late Princess AMELIA, there was formerly a Lady of the name of RUSSELL, who was grand-daughter of OLIVER CROMWELL, and who, it should seem, inherited, without any alloy, much of his undaunted and ready spirit. One day, it happened to be on the thirtieth of January, she was in waiting, and occupied in adjusting some part of the Princess's dress, just as the then Prince of WALES, the father of his present Majesty, came into the room. His Royal Highness accosted Miss RUSSELL rather sportingly, and said to her "For shame, Miss RUSSELL, why have you not been at Church, humbling yourself for the sins on this day committed by your grandfather?" "Sir, (replied Miss RUSSELL) for a grand-daughter of OLIVER CROMWELL, it is humiliation sufficient, to be employed as I am, in pinning up your sister's train."

LORD FALKLAND'S DETESTATION OF INFORMERS.—Lord CLARENDON, in his character of the Lord FALKLAND, when Prime Minister of CHARLES I. says—"Yet two things he could never bring himself to, whilst he continued in office; that was to his death; for which he was contented to be reproached, as for omissions in a most necessary part of his place. The one, employing of spies, or giving any countenance or entertainment to them. I do not mean such emissaries as with danger would venture to view the enemy's camp, and bring intelligence of their number, or quartering, or any particulars that such an observation can comprehend; but those who by communication of guilt, or dissimulation of manners, wind themselves into such trusts and secrets as enable them to make discoveries. The other, the liberty of opening letters upon a suspicion that they might contain matters of dangerous consequence. For the first, he would say, such instruments must be void of all common honesty, before they could be of use; and afterwards, they could never be fit to be credited; and that no single preservation could be worth so general a wound and corruption of human society, as the cherishing such person would carry with it."

THE SERPENTINE RIVER.—On Thursday the ice was excellent in the centre, at the west end of the river; and on it, about three o'clock, were many superior skaters. The water still presented the same singular appearance as it did on the preceding day—one half being still free from ice. It is said that all the ice-wells in the metropolis were, previously to the late frost, completely empty, a circumstance which created great anxiety. Every day some accident has occurred from the folly and temerity of the skaters. On Tuesday a young man was drowned; and on Thursday another fell in, in consequence of unskilfulness in the management of his skates; the ice broke from a heavy fall, where it was not sufficiently strong to bear the concussion: nothing serious, however, occurred. On the north bank there were many carriages; and on the south side, numerous parties of ladies. There were also present some Frenchwomen in full Parisian costume.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO H S*, ESQ.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

With what a fine, unyielding wish to bless,
Does Nature, HORACE, manage to oppose
The town's encroachments—Vulgar he, who goes
By suburb gardens, which she deigns to dress,
And does not recognize her green caress
Reaching back to us in those valued shews
Of box-encircled flowers, or poplar rows,
Or other nests for evening weariness.

Then come the squares, with noon-day nymphs about,
Then vines and ivy, tree-tops that look out
Over back walls,—flowers in the windows too;
And ev'n where Cain huddles his noisiest rout,
The smile of her sweet wisdom will break through,
For there, dear HORACE, has she planted you.

1817.

Mr. EGAN, the lawyer, was a person of very great stature and of great thews and sinews: on going into the bath, he exultingly struck his breast, all over matted with hair, and exclaimed, "CURRAN, did you ever see so fine a chest?" "Trunk, you mean," said Mr. CURRAN.—O'Regan's Memoirs of Curran.

A gentleman who was too desirous of attracting the attention of those about him to the style and fashion of his dress, and one time to the shape of a pair of half boots, which he had that day drawn on, appealed to Mr. CURRAN, among others, for his opinion, who said, "He observed but one fault,—they shewed too much of the calf."—O'Regan's Memoirs of Curran.

FINE ARTS.

MODERN ARCHITECTURE.

MR. EXAMINER,—My attention has been called to the observations made by your Correspondent Scamozzi Tertius, whom I consider, by his weeping, to be an unnoticed professed Architect, and, no doubt, a "modest man of merit, capable of decorating his country, but too proud to solicit employment:" to him I would recommend not to play at throwing stones, seeing that himself is made of glass. The observations alluded to, I consider foreign to his subject of Mary-le-bone Church; and that he stepped out of his way purposely, to throw his stones and insinuations at the Builders, to their intended injury, but they now recoil on himself and others whom the cap may fit. Mr. Examiner, an Architect is an honourable and gentleman-like calling, and such it should be; but it is now disgraced by Architect Builders, who have pushed "out of fashion Builder Architects," if any such there was. I know them not at the present day: the Architect is now the Builder, who audits his own accounts, and uses Trans-Atlantic instead of timber from the Baltic: there is nobody to make the objection, unless the employer is cunning enough. If these Architects are not directly the builders, they introduce their own tradesmen, and from them receive a per centage for winking at the Yankey, instead of greeting the Barbarian, or a place instead of a stock. Out of six and thirty eminent Architects, as formerly numbered, only eleven now remain as independent professional men: even a theatrical Smirke of the pen catches the contagion, and is tainted by its influence.

The Architect has no doubt the right of making the pretty picture, but it is left to the Builder to bring the work to uniformity, utility, and practicability; it is then only unite in general the theory with the practice, and the Architect gets the credit for it. But now, Mr. Examiner, remark the observation of your Correspondent, which proves itself to be without foundation, as it is contradictory in itself, that the Carpenters and Builders audit their own accounts, without one atom of knowledge, and realize enormous fortunes, without the least particle of taste; he might as well have added, without the least possible satisfaction to the employers. I really wonder how they could go on so long (unless the employers were all blind and had no friends to help them) without taste, judgment, education, or man-

THE ATHANASIAN CREED.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—No living being ever understood this juggling, obnoxious Creed, and, I believe, there are very few in the present enlightened day who would undertake to defend it—though nothing is more common than to see people defend things they clearly do not understand. The Times of to-day mentions the instance, from the Bishop of Landaff's Life, of the King declining to respond to this Creed, and the Clergyman was under the necessity of substituting another. The rule of the Church is, that this Creed shall be read thirteen times a year—but a vast number of the liberal Clergy throughout the kingdom omit it altogether. I know several who observe this conduct; and I am informed, on good authority, that it is systematically excluded from the service by nearly all the Clergy officiating in the British Colonies. Perhaps it is not generally known, but it is a fact, that this creed has heretofore been, by ecclesiastical authority, expunged from the Ritual; and the great Lord Clarendon (one of the most excellent men that ever lived) after it had been so expunged, solemnly affirmed in a Speech in the House of Lords, that if he should ever live to see that unintelligible and intolerant Creed introduced again into the service, he would that instant renounce his connection with the Established Religion. Unhappily, since Lord Clarendon's time this Creed has been restored; and it is left to the present liberal and intelligent Administration to maintain its principles and explain its meaning.—Yours, &c. T. B.

SCANDALOUS INCIDENT.

SIR—I was little aware that my statement of certain occurrences which took place in the burying ground of Pentonville Chapel would have subjected me to so furious an attack as is made upon me by R. Lockwood, Chapel Clerk, in your paper of the 20th instant. He there charges me with gross and scandalous misrepresentation, as well as ignorance and malevolence, and all this for stating that he would not suffer a female corpse to be buried, unless he was paid 2s. 6d. I now repeat, that what I before stated was true, and I know that he has admitted it to be so in a public company, not far distant from my house; but indeed he has not attempted to contradict any part of my statement, but tells a tale about the undertaker having failed in his duty; perhaps he has. I am neither clerk nor undertaker, and most likely very ignorant of their general duties; but I will say, that if R. Lockwood acted on that occasion (which I much doubt) only as his duty as Clerk required, he gave a most convincing proof that he is totally ignorant, or destitute of the duties of humanity. It was really a heart-rending scene to see four females weeping the loss of a near relative, standing in the mud and rain, whilst a long contest was carried on by the Undertaker and Clerk, which it seems nothing but money could put an end to; and the Clerk has not been ashamed to say, that the corpse should have remained unburied the whole night if the money had not been paid; observing, the rain would not hurt it. All this may not have been a violation of his official duty, or of orders from his superiors; but I venture to say, that it was a clear violation of common decency, and that the public will see it in that light, in spite of the abusive language used towards me. Truth often contains a sting.—I am very sorry to request the favour of you again to fill any part of your valuable pages with the inclosed, yet you will much oblige me by inserting this, and I shall not give you further trouble.

I remain, Sir, your's very respectfully,

Jos. READ.

ON THE COAL TRADE.

"Detect his fib, his sophistry, in vain;
"The creature's at his dirty work again."

SIR,—Before I notice the Letter which appeared in the Examiner of Sunday last, professing to be written upon the alledged abuses in the Coal Trade, but which is, in reality, a letter of mere personal abuse of myself and others, I beg to recall to the recollection of your readers two notices which appeared in your paper, some time since, relative to the said abuses. On the 13th of July, the subject was, I think, first brought before the public by you, in the following paragraph:—

"COALS.—It has become a question, we understand, whether the present system of Coal Metage is not rather an evil than a benefit to the public. Such, we learn, is the habitual neglect of duty, that in fact not half the Coals delivered are really measured at all; so that the consumer may be grossly defrauded, and yet be induced to imagine that he is certainly receiving his full measure, on the oath of the proper officer.—We shall most likely have something to communicate soon on this subject, which is highly important, as it relates to so costly and necessary an article."

Although a useful and very deserving class of persons were then alluded to in a manner not at all consistent with the usual candour and gentlemanly feeling which distinguishes the Examiner, yet I remained silent, under the conviction, that when the subject came fully and fairly before the public, you would discharge your duty as an impartial journalist. From some cause however, of which you have not favoured your readers with an explanation, nothing was forthcoming from that time till the 28th of September, when the usual notices to Correspondents announced, for the following Sunday, "THE VERY USEFUL exposition of the shameful FRAUDS in the COAL TRADE."—What this useful exposition proved to be, is well known to those of your readers who recollect the tissue of personal slander which appeared on the 5th of October.

After recapitulating the most important parts of the Act passed in the 47th of his present Majesty's reign, for regulating the vend and delivery of Coals within the City and Liberties of Westminster, &c. &c. it stated, that those enactments would have been sufficient to protect the public from the frauds and knavery of roguish dealers in Coals, "had the Meters attended and exerted themselves, as they were sworn to do, in seeing them properly executed and complied with;"—adding, "whether they have so done, a few facts, of which proof,—good judicial proof,—can readily be had, will serve to shew."

From the above extracts, I think, Sir, it was reasonably to be expected, that your Correspondent (whose name is alike beyond my knowledge or even recollection) was prepared to prove,—1st, That the regulations of that Act of Parliament were rendered insufficient for the protection of the public, "from the frauds and knavery of roguish dealers in Coals." And, 2d, That the public were exposed to those frauds only, in consequence of the want of attendance and exertion on the part of the Meters; and, for the truth of which, he was prepared to adduce facts; of which facts, "proof,—good judicial proof,—could readily be had."

Of his "good judicial proof," we have not yet heard any thing;—of his charges and assertions, I gave my opinion, in a letter written by me on the 16th of October, and left by myself at your Office on the same day. As, however, the public curiosity has been, since that period, considerably excited upon this subject, I will, as briefly as possible, repeat the charges then made, with my observations upon them:—

1st, Your learned Correspondent charged one of the Principal Meters with carrying on the business of a Coal Merchant, and holding at the same time the office of Meter:—now, as to the fact, whether the Gentleman in question really carries on the business of Coal Merchant or not, is of no consequence to me, as I am not aware that I ever spoke to him in my life, nor do I think he ever saw me. I made, however, some inquiries into the subject, and the result justified me in the denial I then gave to the particular charge, and also to the general statement contained in the same paragraph. But his classical accuser says, that "proof,—good judicial proof,—can readily be had of the fact:—if so, I would gently suggest to him, if the tortuous construction of his mental eyes prevents his reading the Act of Parliament correctly, that by the proper use of his "good judicial proof," he may subject the Gentleman in question to the forfeiture of one hundred pounds; and as "solid pudding is better than empty praise," the moiety accruing therefrom to the informer will, I hope, be an inducement to him to produce his "good judicial proof" as soon as possible.

He next charged the Meters with "seldom if ever visiting the Wharfs, to see that the Labouring Meters are at their stations and doing their duty." Upon this charge, yourself and your readers must be perfectly aware, that if the Principal Meters do really visit the Wharfs constantly and regularly for the purpose above alluded to, there can be of course but one answer to give to such an unworthy aspersion. I repeat, that the imputation is groundless, the language is false; and declare, that for years I have constantly observed the Principals to be as vigilant and attentive to the conduct of the persons employed under them, as it is possible for persons in their situation to be.

Your judicial Correspondent proceeds to say,—"The next species of neglect chargeable upon the Principal Meters, and borne out by ample and satisfactory evidence, is, that they have, when complaints of improper proceedings have been made to them by the Labouring Meters, declined any interference; nay, have even forbidden a repetition of those complaints, on the ground of wishing the business to be done quietly and go on smoothly."—If there existed the smallest foundation for this charge, nothing in the world could be easier,—your readers will agree with me in saying,—than to prove it: it would be only to give us the names of the parties to whom such language was uttered,—the places, dates, &c.—and the point would be settled at once; but the "ample and satisfactory evidence" remains sub silentio; and your satisfactory Correspondent stands convicted of the meanness of preferring an anonymous charge, which he has it not in his power to justify.

I proceed to a few remarks upon his temperate and judicious production of last Sunday:—I beg, in the first instance, to remark, that his "good judicial proof," the attestations of his "most competent witnesses," his "ample and satisfactory evidence," are all suspended for the present, to make room for a war of words with your humble servant, the honour of which, with so profoundly learned an antagonist, I must beg leave to decline. A few words, however, en passant, and I have done with him as far as concerns myself:—I consider the pages of the Examiner to be much too valuable to be occupied in mere personal attack and defence between persons, for neither of whom your readers will probably care a straw. My adversary says, he shall say nothing of my "grammar or my figures." I thank him for his forbearance; he should have said the want of them: they are advantages not often bestowed upon persons in my station; and it is no disgrace to be deficient in them. I will gently whisper to him, that an ignorant coal-heaver is a more respectable character than any anonymous slanderer whatever.

Your readers will recollect, that, in my observations upon his former letter, I stated, that as he had not authenticated his assertions with his name, I thought it sufficient to meet his charges in the same manner. This passage, it seems, the crooked habits of observation in which he indulges, prevented his reading correctly; for he now dwells upon my having remarked, "in a tone of mingled chagrin and defiance," that he had not given his name, and proceeds to declaim at great length upon the subject, stating, that he shall continue to withhold it, "from a persuasion, that in matters of this nature, as he is not a public character, nor known perhaps to one in a thousand of your readers, it would be highly ridiculous, if not impertinent and vain in him, to act otherwise."—We are not favoured with his private ideas of impertinence and vanity, to guide us in estimating his motives: but I am sure your intelligent readers will not hesitate to designate his proceeding to be at once both despicable and cowardly.

I now take my leave of him, recommending him to employ the talents he possesses in a somewhat more respectable manner, than the indulgence of private animosity and personal rancour. If he thinks he can benefit the public by the adoption of any fresh regulations, let him propose them in a becoming and respectable manner, divested of those unworthy feelings, which would lead him to a repetition of the course I have been obliged to condemn. He knows, that the Wharfs between "Temple-Bar and St. Luke's, Chelsea," comprise but a small portion of the dealers, by whom this vast metropolis is supplied:—he knows, that any alterations in the existing state of the trade, to be beneficial to the public, must be general in their operation. If he is at all sincere, let him, the first day he can spare, extend the sphere of his observations from Temple-Bar to London Bridge, or as much farther as he thinks fit; and retiring from thence by the Surrey shore, he will, I dare say, find quite sufficient to convince him, that whatever reform may be necessary, must extend far beyond the boundaries of the Westminster District to be useful to the public. If my observations upon him have been harsh or severe, they were caused by the manner of his attack. My letters have been written without concert or co-operation with any one: I am as much unknown to Messrs. Baker and Tulloch as any indifferent person among your readers; but having been for years in the constant habit of seeing the former as assiduous as possible, and having every reason to believe the other to be equally so in that part of the district to which he usually attends, I felt it to be no more than justice to those Gentlemen to state that fact.

For the sake of the Labouring Meter, whose name has been so frequently mentioned, I am sorry his advocate could not make out a better case for him:—however I may regret his individual case, there can be no doubt that his dismissal was highly proper under the circumstances. I can only repeat the wish expressed in my former letter, and am sorry I cannot follow it up in a more efficient manner, as he is certainly described to have been generally very attentive to his duty heretofore.

I have to express my thanks to yourself, Sir, for your insertion of my former letter, and to request you will favour me with space for the present as early as possible. To your respectable readers I state, that if they are deceived in their purchase of Coals, it is greatly their own fault; and beg to conclude with a few sentences, extracted from a Tract published some time since*, and which they will do well to keep in mind.

"Almost every instance of improper conduct in the Coal Trade may be traced to undersellers. Those buyers, who are unwisely eager after bargains, are the best supporters of these persons, and are peculiarly open to the designing and dishonest, who easily entrap them with the bait of under price. Good souls! Chuckling over a contract made at 5s., or, perhaps, even 10s. per chaldron under the current rate! Be no longer happy in your fancied shrewdness, either in measure or quality, or in both; you are abused and robbed; undersellers are the bane of the trade: from the very nature of it, it is impossible to undersell and make a profit honestly: use common sense, and always suspect the dealer who offers at an under rate. The charges on delivery are well known: the market prices are furnished in printed lists three times a week: if the supply exceed the demand, you will buy cheaper; if it is less, you must be satisfied to buy dearer."

Feeling that I can add nothing to the force of the above extracts, and apologising for the length of the present letter, I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. C.

RELIGIOUS BOOKSELLING.

SIR,—The Minister of the Chapel, where the pious feelings of the "Nonconformist" seem to have been so much scandalized, is incapable of the sordid motives which he alleges against him. This I assert with all the confidence permitted to one human being in speaking of another. The fact alluded to is simply this:—The Preacher, as may be seen from the advertisement to his Sermon, which I know to have been the composition of only a few hours, had no other view, than by its delivery from the pulpit, to mingle his regrets on the calamity which occasioned it with those of his fellow-countrymen, to show his unfeigned, unbought attachment to the House of Brunswick, and to avail himself of the opportunity for religious improvement. The publication of the discourse was extorted from him by the solicitations of his friends and numerous hearers. In yielding to their solicitations he calculated on no pecuniary benefit whatever, but being fully aware that those for whose gratification he had consented to print, had resolved without his suggestion to guarantee him against any consequent loss, he was the more desirous, on their account, of ascertaining the number of copies likely to be wanted. The following notice was accordingly given by himself:—"That having been obliged to comply with the earnest and repeated solicitations of many friends, to publish the Sermon occasioned by the lamented death of the Princess Charlotte, he should be glad to ascertain how many copies would be wanted, and that for that purpose, two or three friends would be in attendance near the door, to take the names of such as wished to have them."

This, Mr. Editor, is the true statement; and I can further add that the greatest possible avoidance of merely temporal concerns is habitually observed at that Chapel on the days sacred to public worship, a part of two evenings in the course of the week being appropriated to that purpose.

Whatever may be thought by some of the propriety or impropriety of even the best meant notice of the above nature from the pulpit, it requires no critical acumen to perceive, in the distorted report of your Correspondent, and the comments which he has, seemingly with much self-complacency, made upon it, a spirit of mischievous industry at work to hold up the worthy Minister and his friends to ridicule and reproach. Had this Minister been as notorious for a mercenary temper and practice, as he is for every thing of an opposite description, your anonymous Correspondent could not have dealt in terms more unmeasuredly criminating, than he has actually adopted. Grant that his "righteous soul was vexed" with what he deemed a profanation of both the time and place; would he not have acted much more in the spirit of the Scriptures, which he has misapplied, if he had privately communicated his mind on the subject to the Preacher, or to one of his acting friends? I think I can answer, that in such a quarter, a respectful and Christian-like remonstrance would have met with a kind reception;—the evil, if any, would have been acknowledged and corrected; and the candour of the monitor would have been duly appreciated. He may reply, indeed, that the prevention of a public evil was his object, and that a private communication could not operate as a check to the influence of the example. Rather let him reply, that nothing less than an exposure in the public prints could gratify his wish to vilify the character of a Minister of the Gospel, and to enjoy in secret the wounds which, with mightier aggravation, he could thus inflict upon him.

I am not, Mr. Editor, of that order of men who might be thought most likely to sympathize with a Minister under such circumstances, neither have I any connexion with the Chapel or congregation referred to in this correspondence; but I well know the circumstances of the occurrence and am perfectly assured of the truth of what I have stated.—I am, Sir, yours, &c. VINDICUS.

THE "FORTUNATE YOUTH."

The hero of the tale is now about 18 years of age, and is the youngest son of a respectable family residing on the Chippenham estate, near Newmarket. He appeared a boy of such promise, that no expense was spared to qualify him for the Church. He was sent to Dr. Butler's seminary at Shrewsbury, and Dr. B. gives him the highest character for general conduct whilst under his care. Young Cawston had stated, that he obtained more money than Dr. B. approved, and a letter was sent to his friends, remonstrating against his extravagance: it is now believed that he procured his money, if he had any excess, which may be doubted, from a family in the neighbourhood, although he sought to convert the incident of his riches at that time into one of the proofs of his subsequent fable. Still he pursued his education so as to acquire the reputation of an excellent scholar; and during his vacations he was always a welcome guest with a family who patronised him; and his manners were so prepossessing, that notwithstanding a countenance which was not, if strictly examined, a letter of credit, he became a general favourite with every visitor.

About three months since a report prevailed, that young C. had come into possession of an immense fortune under most extraordinary circumstances. The father first mentioned the general fact; and the son soon afterwards authenticated the statement, and gave the following detail of the adventure which rendered him so fortuitously one of the richest subjects in the world:—About 18 months previously he had been on his return to school. A school-fellow, who was to have accompanied him, had, by some mistake, preceded him the day before, and he was left to go alone in the stage. On his arrival at Birmingham, he was shewn into an inn-parlour where an old Gentleman was sitting, and who became his companion for the rest of the journey to Shrewsbury. In the course of it the old Gentleman and himself entered into a warm altercation on the subject of the South American contest. The dispute continued to the journey's end, and they parted as adversaries! The next morning, to his great surprise, the old man sent for him; and on his entering into the room, said, "young man, you were right in your argument yesterday. I admire your spirit, candour, and bold maintenance of your opinions. You shall find in me from henceforward a friend." From that time he lavished many favours on him; money to the amount which attracted Dr. B.'s notice and displeasure, and the envy of all his comrades, who, nevertheless, paid homage to the superiority which he acquired by the power of conferring favours; and thus in his boyhood he proved the irresistible influence of gold, and found that the word pecunia should have been substituted for that of prudencia, in the ethical maxim of the ancients.

Some months afterwards the old man, who had hitherto promised only a considerable establishment in the Church, sent for him, and declaring that he felt his life was ebbing fast away, announced his intention to make over to him immediately, by a Deed of Gift, the whole of his immense property.—"If," added he, "I should live, contrary to my expectations, I shall then be a dependant on your gratitude and bounty."—From that moment the old man initiated him in all his secrets, directed him how to conduct his extensive pecuniary transactions, gave him a list of the various names he was obliged to assume to conceal his property in foreign countries, and related all the adventures of his extraordinary, and, in some respects, criminal life. Many of these secrets he had sworn never to divulge; and others he should only unfold as the development became necessary for the execution of his trust and management of his fortune.

Six weeks afterwards the old man died at a nameless village near Shrewsbury; and in conformity with his last commands, a lawyer of great eminence and respectability at Liverpool (Mr. S.) was sent for, and who took back with him all the parchments, papers, &c. belonging to the old man, except the Deed of Gift, which young C. would never part with out of his own possession. At the expiration of six months, the lawyer (Mr. S.) returned and gave him up all the title-deeds, papers, &c.; and at the same time communicated to him that he had almost boundless wealth; but the preservation of the greater part depended on his prudence, secrecy, and conformity to the injunctions and proceedings of the old man, his deceased benefactor. The title-deeds were immediately buried in a garden of one of the estates; and the only person (except one of his school-fellows of eleven years old, who saw the interment of the strong-box), to whom he confided any part of the momentous story of his fortune, was his mother, and who avowed she had been in possession of the secret of his affluence without ever having betrayed the confidence.

The moment was now arrived when he might extend that confidence, but not yet give full publicity to the amount of wealth he possessed. Indeed, some of his property was derived from sources which affected the most serious interests of the highest personages in every country.

The great object of the old man, his benefactor, had been to acquire secret influence, by getting as many people as possible into his trammels; nay, the desire of this mysterious dominion had been in him a stronger passion even than avarice. Most of the foreign Sovereigns, therefore, owed him money. The Empress of Russia was a debtor to the amount of 100,000*l.*, but she regularly paid 6000*l.* per annum interest. Prince Eugene was also in his list for a large sum; and on the King of Spain, he had immense claims. His principal estate lay, indeed, in that country; but he had also large estates in Germany, Italy, Sicily, and in England. Exclusive of three millions in the Funds, he had palaces in Madrid and Naples; many sets of diamonds; and he intimated that the old man had been largely concerned in the diamond trade, and that he owed the foundation of his fortune to that traffic. At another time he stated, that his benefactor had been the soul of the South American insurrection; and that he had solemnly sworn to him on his death-bed to continue the same aids; he was now, therefore, sending out great supplies of ships, arms, &c.; he named two ships, the Asia and Fortitude, as belonging to him, and represented that he met a deputy on the high road, whenever he wished confidential communication, as he dared not trust the utterance of his secrets where there was any possibility of his being overheard or suspected. When speaking on the South American subject, tears came into his eyes at the mention of two of his Spanish friends, who had perished in that country under the most cruel tortures. At every communication he however concluded with the most solemn injunctions of secrecy; since he must leave the country if any of the above particulars transpired, being resolved never to submit to any legal jurisdiction, which would infallibly be attempted. To frustrate inquiry, he had forbidden all his agents, bankers, &c. to acknowledge any transactions with him; but still he was in continual anxiety on that subject, and had reason to apprehend that attempts had already been made to intercept and peruse his papers and correspondence. He, however, had warned those of his family whom he suspected, against the indulgence of a curiosity ruinous to himself, and inevitably fatal to them.

Some few days afterwards, most of the above details having appeared in a Country Paper, and been copied into the London Papers, young C. pretended to be almost frantic, and accused his family of having betrayed his interest to gratify a pernicious vanity; but when he was appeased, he pledged himself to continue the liberal arrangements he had resolved on making, for the provision of his relatives. Half a million of money was to be appropriated to this noble object, and the details of appropriation were such as augmented the general estimation of his principles and knowledge. His brother immediately took suitable measures to enter into Emanuel College, with an income of 6000*l.* per ann. and young C. on being asked what his father had said on the information being given, that he was to have an estate purchased for him with the 100,000*l.* destined to be his portion, replied with emotion, "he burst into tears."

For some reasons which young C. would not assign, the realization of his promises was to be deferred until the 1st of January, 1818—but to sustain his statements in the interval, and all the suspicions of an anxious suspense, he desired his father to take him to Mr. Weatherby, of Newmarket; who, after the first introduction was over, and the father had retired, received directions from young C. to make his will. To the observation that he was a minor, he replied, that the property being personal, he had a legal right. In the next interview, he desired Mr. Weatherby to be one of the executors; to which he agreed, if the father or brother were joined with him; and at the third interview he insisted that Mr. W. should accept of a legacy to a considerable amount; but this Mr. W. refused, although young C. always affirmed he had acceded to the proposition. The will was made, and a copy given young C. From that time the interviews with Mr. W. became more frequent; and Mr. W., receiving instructions to purchase various estates, opened a correspondence with the agent of Lord Cholmondeley, &c. The knowledge of this fact made proselytes of the most sceptical; and applications from all quarters, and on all subjects, were addressed to young C. in the view of deriving benefit from the distribution of his treasures. Negotiations were opened at the same time for change of name, armorial honours, and such distinctions as his pride suggested, or his wealth seemed to justify; but although he sometimes affirmed that a British Earldom would be added to his Spanish titles of Nobility, it is not believed that he was warranted in such an assertion by any direct arrangement with his Majesty's Ministry.

The want of ready money was, no doubt, for some time, a subject of much solicitude to the Cæsar of 1817; but his tale had acquired so much confidence, that a relative to whom he said 100,000*l.* had been promised on the great-pay day, intreated him to make use of 1200*l.* lying idle in Oaks's bank at Bury.—The offer was accepted; and young C. was so eager to grasp the prize, that his servant arrived with the check at the bank before the doors were opened. This circumstance, and the employment of a common groom as the receiver of such a large sum, excited some suspicion, and the clerk was sent over to young C. with the money. Young C. gave him 1*l.* for his trouble, put 99*l.* into the purse, which was soon carelessly left about, to be seen for of bank-notes, and 1100*l.* were placed in the bank of Messrs. Hammond and Eden, at Newmarket, who afterwards opened a credit of 1000*l.* in favour of young C. with their correspondents, Messrs. Cox and Biddulph, Charing-cross.

The 1100*l.* placed in Hammond's hands was augmented by report of others to 5000*l.*; and the source from whence the original sum was obtained, although known to several, was never mentioned; for, in the conviction of young C.'s story being true to its fullest extent, it should seem it was thought right to give him all possible consequence that might tend to impress the neighbourhood with similar belief.

The young man now saw himself the object of general interest, not merely in a Newmarket circle, but amongst all ranks, in every part of the kingdom, and he also found that even the most exaggerated absurdities fascinated more than probable narrative. Still he was not indifferent to the dumb shew of the drama.

With his intimate friends he avoided all conversation about his affairs; and before strangers he appeared to be retired in his habits, absorbed in thought, and overcome by his intense application to business, and the anxieties attending the management of his important concerns at home and abroad.

He generally read great part of the night, wrote and received many letters, pretended to dispatch couriers to London and Liverpool, but without ostentation, and kept a German Secretary (who once travelled with Lord Darlington) in constant employment. His expenses were not considerable, but still he was sometimes profuse, and his allowance of 200*l.* per annum to his groom appeared a culpable extravagance, until he justified it by stating that it was no more than a just compensation for the confidence he was obliged to repose in him, and the fatigue he encountered in carrying his most secret dispatches to their various destinations.

Sometimes a draft was accidentally suffered to fall from out of his pocket-book, and he appeared eager to recover it, but not before the figures representing a considerable sum had been seen by some of the company.

Amongst those drafts was one on Hanbury and Lloyd, in favour of the Duke San Carlos, and in the name of Puerta, for 335,000*l.*; another on the same firm for 150,000*l.* after date, as he stated he had overdrawn the house 100,000*l.* for the moment, to make a Spanish loan. Occasionally he embellished his tales with appropriate anecdotes, then expressed great apprehension that avarice would become his predominant passion, said that he felt it growing, and that the only antidote in his case was the acquisition of power.

He rejected all questions about the old man, but once he said that he had a sister living in Kent; that she was a lady of rank, but he could not mention her name, as it would endanger her happiness and interests; but that the estate she now enjoyed would devolve to him at her death. He also spoke of two Noblemen, who had put themselves so completely in the power of the old man, that even their lives were compromised.

Adverting to tenderer connections, he admitted an early attachment and indiscreet engagement with a Lady at Shrewsbury; but as he had lent the family large sums of money, he had controlled their resentment at his subsequent defection from the Lady's charms. He might have married a young Lady of high rank in Scotland, connected with a person from whom he pretended to have received another incidental legacy of 3,000*l.*; and General Bolivar, in gratitude for the services rendered by his benefactor, and continued by him, towards the South Americans, had recently offered him his daughter in marriage.

Matrimony, however, was his professed object, and to ingratiate himself still more into the favour of a family who had countenanced him through life for his promising talents, and modest, unassuming manners, he insisted on being the adopted parent of a little boy, to whom he had once expected to be the tutor. Before the consent was actually given, he took the boy from his school, and removed him to the care of his own original instructor, the Rev. Mr. O. to whom he held out the assurance of a very large compensation for the attention he required of him, and which compensation would blend with a debt of gratitude which had been contracted on his own account. Some time afterwards he solicited an union with the family, and, with the consent of the respective parents, he was allowed to express his admiration "where for so many years he had confined his feelings to the language of acknowledgment for protection." The family being obliged to go to town, young C. affected a low nervous state, and earnestly requested permission to accompany his friends.—In the first instance he occupied lodgings near Pall Mall, where he was attended by Mr. P. and Dr. H. to the latter of whom he almost immediately proposed the appointment of travelling physician during his journey to Spain (where he was to go to take possession of his estates) with a salary of 10,000*l.* per annum, as compensation for the sacrifice of his professional business.—His nervous affection appearing to continue, his medical advisers recommended his removal to the more comfortable residence of his friend, who immediately wrote for his mother to come up to him, but received him in his house, on the 25th of November, until her arrival.

From his first coming to town he had entered freely into conversation with all classes of persons who approached him, and related particulars of his history, fortune, and prosperity, with many inconsistencies, as have since been discovered; but still he imposed on all hearers, and by exhibition of parchment documents (which there is a suspicion he engrossed himself, as blank parchment had been seen in his possession) and of fictitious drafts of immense amount, he paralyzed completely that good common sense, which, if once exerted, must have discovered the imposition.

As the 1st of January approached, his character seemed to change; instead of his usual gentleness, he displayed great violence of temper; and an irritation on the most trifling subjects, that greatly alarmed all about him for the state of his mind. At length his language was so extravagant, that it was feared the acquisition of fortune had overpowered his faculties, and his Physicians were consulted; but they contradicted the opinion, and vouched for his sanity of mind. It was nevertheless resolved, on the 30th of November, to remove him, and terminate an intercourse which could no longer exist, with any prospect of happiness, whatever might be the wealth at his command; and Mr. W. the Solicitor, was sent for, that a painful personal explanation with young C. might be avoided.

Before, however, this determination had been carried into execution, young C. had sent for the lawyer of the family, Mr. E. of Gray's Inn, and, after making him execute another will, gave him various instructions; amongst which was that of advertising for all claims on the estate of Gaspar Quintella*, as the old man, his benefactor, had possessed an estate in that name; and, from his books, it appeared, owed to some creditors about 60,000*l.* which he, young C. was anxious to pay immediately. This trait of honesty, and imagined proof of redundant money at command, added to the circumstance of the Solicitor being sent for to the house of the family by whom he was regularly employed on their own important affairs, stifled every doubt of his mind, and he proceeded accordingly to execute the directions he had received.

Young C. foreseeing the hour of detection must arrive, had always insisted on the necessity of a journey to Spain, that he might enter into possession of his property in that country.

A day or two afterwards the foreign Secretary came to the family and announced his departure the same night on a mission to the Continent, to collect 700,000*l.* which belonged to young C. The Secretary accordingly took his leave, and remained in London, notwithstanding a person subsequently declared that he had gone to Dover to embark, but with an irregular passport, so that he was sent for to town again by the Alien Office—a declaration which on inquiry at the Alien Office, proved not to be true.—Such is the baneful influence of delusion, that few can resist the contagion of misrepresentation when veracity is to manifest their error.

At length, on the 3d December, Mr. W., who had been too much occupied to attend the first summons on the 30th of November, arrived, and the letter was put into his hands which announced the necessity of his client's immediate removal. Some conversation ensued at the instigation of a person present, which on Mr. W.'s own denial of propositions attributed to him by young C. established still more clearly the fact of his being a lunatic, or an impostor, and Mr. W. was expressly requested to make that statement to the father, with delicacy but candour, that he might take suitable measures to prevent further mischief being hazarded to the detriment of the young man, his family, and society.

Mr. W., young C. and the father (who had come with Mr. W. but who had not been present at the conference, as it was wished to spare him the pain of such an interview), withdrew from the house, and Mr. W. soon afterwards acquainted the family that young C. would not return, but would leave town that night, which he did in a post-chaise and four (the chaise he took away without the consent of the owner), accompanied by the German Secretary and Groom.

So many circumstances having transpired which gave cause to suspect that the whole story of young C. was an invention, sustained by a fabric of falsehoods and disingenuous acts, every person whom he had named in the course of his narration as a banker, agent, &c. was applied to for information, and all disown knowledge of him, except from public report or school-boy connexion; every fact affirmed by him was examined and not one was authenticated, which related to money transactions.

The whole was visionary, but still most artfully wrought; and so successfully was his manner in making dopes, that to this hour there are many who confide in his re-appearance with all the treasure to which he has pretended.—One very respectable person affirmed that he had seen a remittance of young C. from Spain amounting to 350,000*l.*; a draft of frightful amount from Liverpool; and that he knew he possessed two millions in the Funds; nay, that a banker, within a few doors of him, had but the day before said, he would have paid his bill for 100,000*l.* if it had been presented, instead of the 300*l.* bill which was cashed. Other persons had heard a respectable Solicitor declare he knew young C. had great estates in Scotland, from which 45,000*l.* had been received; that he had many diamonds at Rundle and Bridge's, and altogether 700,000*l.* per annum. Others, that he meant to buy an estate, and pay 500,000*l.* for it in gold, and some offered large bets he would be in possession of Houghton by the 1st of January: others cited Noblemen and Gentlemen of the greatest accuracy, who had known the old man at Shrewsbury, and who had heard it said at the time, "that he would cut up, when dead, for more money than any man in the empire;" others, that they had known those who had dealt in diamonds with him, and almost every one professed to have an authority which justified original and still unshaken belief.

Even those to whom property purchased by young C. but not paid for, had been returned, seemed to think an injury more than a service was likely to be done them by the restitution, and no statement of detected falsehood could counteract or weaken the imputation.

In the course of a visit near Newmarket, young C. had announced the expected arrival of some Sicilian wines from his estates on Mount Etna: a hamper came, but he did not appear anxious to revert to the subject. When it was mentioned, he affected pleasure at being reminded of the circumstance; ordered the sample bottles to be brought in, descanted on the advantages he should derive by the improved cultivation of the Sicilian grape, and requested opinion as to the quality he should encourage;—the Surchall, the Tinta, and the Crema di Vino, especially, were approved. Young C. promised to allow his friends to partake of the quantity already imported by his agent, and to direct abundant stores to be supplied in future from his vineyard. One of the guests had at the time observed "Edwards, Crutched-friars," written on the cork of the bottles. To Edwards application was now made, and it resulted from that inquiry, that the son-in-law of Mr. Edwards was named Cawston, and had employed himself for some years in the Sicilian vintage; "that, presuming on his name's sake, he had written to recommend his father's Sicilian wines to young C., as doubtless he was about to stock the cellars of his various mansions." No proposition could ever come more happily, and an order was instantly given for samples to be sent; 14 bottles, containing seven different sorts, were dispatched accordingly, and the memorandum remains this day existing in Mr. Edwards' books, as evidence Bacchi decipulis.

All these discoveries were communicated to Mr. W. who admitted that they authorised a bad opinion of the young man, but still he had faith in him; and as a proof, had paid that morning a bill on his account of 40 odd pounds, without security: for he reported again, as he had done the preceding day, that he never had any reference given him, nor was any document ever shewn him, to authenticate the boy's story. Never, indeed, was any confidence more sincere than that of Mr. W., for he had not only been in treaty for Houghton, with Lord C. and for other estates, but he had employed Mr. H. and Sir S. R. to make his client a ward in Chancery. Mr. W. has himself mentioned, that he had directed his banker to open two accounts in his name, representing the account, No. 2, as one that would be of a greater magnitude than any which was ever brought into the house. On the 10th of December, however, on reference being made to it, there appeared the solitary item of—No. 2. debtor to No. 1, 47l. 11s.

In consequence of what had transpired, it was thought a public duty to disconcert any further machinations which this young man might have in view, and therefore, in the Morning Chronicle, a caution was inserted against the "Fortunate Youth," who was designated an Impostor. This caution produced a letter from the Solicitor and Confidential Friend of the Fortunate Youth; in which the youth's character was vindicated, and a threat of prosecution was hazarded. An answer was published, in which the charge of imposition was mentioned, and the pledge made of proof being given to substantiate the charges before the menaced Tribunal.

Instead of returning to London to investigate the accusation, Mr. W. set off with the young man's father and brother to Houghton, and at the same time, in his own name, addressed a letter to the Public, in which he stated, "he had no reason to disbelieve the story of the much abused youth; but if he ever did discover him to be an impostor, he would give him no longer countenance."

This letter was considered by many not merely a public defence against the charge, but an admission that Mr. W. had no proof to offer that he was not the dupe of his client. Still the journey to Houghton, the correspondence from thence with the Conveyancer, on the subject of the purchase; the declaration that the contract should be concluded, and that this act would be the best answer to the calumniators, and the high language held with regard to the prosecution of the Newspaper Editors, fortified many in their errors, and indeed some of the most respectable persons, who had been made acquainted with every particular, to confess they were again wavering in their opinion, a confession which certainly does the highest honour to the character of Mr. W. Nevertheless Mr. W.'s agents were not satisfied that his confidence was justified, and at length they persuaded his return to town, when a letter which young C. had given to Mr. W. with orders that it should not be opened until the 1st of January, was, under the urgent necessity of the case, examined (the father thereto consenting), and that letter being found to contain only false references, Mr. W. suffered the bandage to be drawn from his eyes, which a generous confidence had so perseveringly maintained.

A letter from Messrs. S. and E. of Liverpool, removed the last lingering doubts, and Mr. W. immediately wrote and published the acknowledgment of his having been deceived by a lunatic or depraved impostor. The charm being broken, a letter written by young C., and dated Paris, in which he anticipated the discovery of his false references, but yet affirmed the general truth of his story, although received the day preceding the publication of Mr. W.'s recantation, had no effect upon his decision; but it was so far satisfactory as to remove some of Mr. W.'s uneasiness as to the course taken by young C. after he reached Calais, since it is said he had letters of recommendation, which, if he had gone direct into Germany, he might have used to the great prejudice of Mr. W. who had rendered himself responsible, by his first published Letter, for the money he might take up abroad, as well as the debts he had incurred in England.

Of the original 1,100l. advanced by the relative, young C. had drawn out all but 10l. by London and Newmarket checks; but he has left several hundred pounds to be paid by his family. There is indeed a report that the relative alluded to had previously advanced 800l. but this report wants confirmation. At all events, it is certain that this young man spent above 1600l. in two months, without being at any expense for house, equipage, &c. But although this sum was large for one whose previous expenditure had been so very limited, still it is not of sufficient magnitude to justify the supposition that his objects were merely pecuniary. If they were, he had not time to mature his designs, and adventure on their consummation. But whatever might have been his motives, however splendide (and possibly ingly false), parts of his history may be, and many of his actions omitted, for they required the actor to give them a certain plausibility, still this young man, if he really possesses his faculties unimpaired, in making his family the sport of his fiction, the victims of his fraud—in deliberately converting the tears of gratitude and joy into the brine of disappointment, sorrow and shame, has evinced a want of principle and callousness of heart, which almost extinguishes the hope of reformation, and a laudable use of those talents which he undoubtedly possesses.

We have thus endeavoured to give a faithful and accurate narrative of the two months' career of the Fortunate Youth; but as the wind is not more variable than a liar, and there is no barometer by which his words can be weighed; it is very possible that much may have been said to others, at variance with anecdotes in the present relation. Still, as the camelion is the same animal, notwithstanding his changes of hue, so "the Fortunate Youth" may be recognized as a most mischievous impostor, under every representation and colouring of his story.—We understand "the Fortunate Youth," on arriving at Paris, in conformity with his system to patronize his relations, engaged one whom he knew to be established there, as his travelling Physician into Spain, viz Dr. H. cashiered in London. This Gentleman was, however, so startled at the amount of the salary proposed, that he requested to make the arrangement with the youth's father, and obtained leave to come to England for that purpose, where he arrived a few days since.—Morning Chronicle.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Mr. Brown applied to the Magistrate on behalf of a poor girl, 12 years old. Mr. B. had sent to Westwood, a sweep, of St. Pancras, to have his chimney swept. The girl came, and ascended the chimney, habited as a boy; and having performed the job, she told Mr. B. he never had his chimney swept by such a sweep. She then discovered her sex; and stated, that her uncle had turned her out of doors to look for work, and she had engaged herself to a sweep rather than be chided, as she could get no other work. She expressed her willingness to work, and the Magistrate directed her to be passed to her parish, Marylebone.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Thursday se'night, Mrs. Greator, 63 years of age, the wife of J. Greator, a small farmer of Alvaston, near Derby, was barbarously murdered in a cow-house, where she went for the purpose of milking. She was discovered about seven o'clock, with her head shockingly bruised and cut in many places. Though not quite dead, she was speechless and insensible, and died in a few minutes afterwards. Suspicion has fallen upon a person named Jackson, of the same village, who is in custody.

A monster of the name of Francis Jackson, of Carlisle, a hatter, was last week committed to gaol, for an assault on his own daughter, of the age of 15!

On Sunday afternoon, M. Hirst, about 44, the son of Mr. Hirst, of the Three Hats, Islington-green, came to his death in the following manner. He had returned from boarding-school home to spend the holidays, and was playing with his brother and sisters, all younger than himself. He said to them, "I will shew you how they hang men at the gallows," and procured a rope, which he tied to a hook, and having got upon a stool, he fastened the other end round his neck. He either kicked the stool, or it fell accidentally from under him. The children seeing his face black and distorted, went to the bar to their mother, and said, "Mat is hanging himself to frighten us." The mother, thinking the children were merely at play, took no notice, until the porter went into the kitchen, and found him suspended. He was cut down, but too late to be resuscitated.

An Inquisition was held on Thursday week, at the Non's Head, Peckham, on the body of a man who was found dead, and entirely naked, in a ditch at Peckham.—W. Cooper, of Newcross, stated, that as he was passing along a field at Peckham, he observed the body of the deceased lying in a ditch. He was on his right side, and his head was bent nearly under him; the body was covered with scratches, apparently from the brambles of which the hedge was formed. Near to the body was a breach in the hedge, which appeared to have been recently made by some one forcing through.—G. Lewis stated, that having received information that some clothes had been found in the field of Mr. Holcomb, at Peckham, he went to the spot, and from thence traced the impression of a naked human foot to the breach in the hedge, near which the deceased was found. Verdict—Found Dead.—It is conjectured that the deceased was a Military Officer on half-pay.

On Monday, an Inquest was held at the Horns, in Shoreditch, on the body of W. Williams, who died in the cellar of a cottage in Margaret's-fields. It appeared that the deceased had been in the habit of selling pamphlets about the streets, and had obtained permission of the occupier of the cottage to sleep in the cellar, as he could not pay for a lodging. On Christmas-Day his landlord gave him his dinner, and on Saturday morning he was found dead in the cellar, on a bedstead, without any bedding. A certificate was read to the Jury from a Surgeon, who examined the body, that there were no marks of violence on it, or any thing indicative of his having died from cold or hunger.—Verdict—Died a natural death.

A woman was run over by a man riding a horse at a smart trot, on Wednesday afternoon, down Oxford-street. The woman was crossing in the thick of the fog. The horse trod upon her breast. She was conveyed, senseless, to a house in the neighbourhood. The man rode on unnoticed.

Tuesday, the body of a youth, genteelly dressed, was taken out of the Regent's Canal. He had been skating, when the ice gave way, and he fell in, in the presence of his companions, who were unable to render him assistance.

On Tuesday night, as Mr. W. P. Dowse was returning from transacting business in town to his house at Newington, he was robbed by three fellows, on the new road leading from the Waterloo-bridge to Stamford-street, Blackfriars. They took from him his watch, money, a deed, and a transfer of stock. He was so maltreated by the ruffians that he was obliged to have medical aid when he got to a friend's house in Blackfriars-road.

Monday Mr. Tollurst, of Nashenden Farm, in Kent, having been shooting, left his gun in the yard, while he was engaged in some business; during his absence two boys came to the spot, one of whom took up the gun, and presenting it at the other, jocosely said he would shoot him, and at the same time pulled the trigger, when the contents went through his heart, and to the inexpressible grief of the unthinking lad he fell dead at his feet: and a few days since Mr. Johnston, of Kirkhampton, in Cumberland, having come home from shooting, put his loaded gun on a rack in the kitchen, whence it was soon taken by his son, ten years old, who laid it across a chair, and was playing with the lock, when the piece went off, and the contents entered the side of his sister, who was standing within four yards of the muzzle, and caused her death in about four hours.—We cannot too strongly impress on the minds of Sportsmen the necessity of discharging their pieces before they enter a house.

An Inquest was on Wednesday held at St. Giles's Work-house, on the body of T. Stockton, a cabinet-maker, who shot himself through the head at his lodgings, in St. Giles's. When the deceased was found, the wadding of the pistol had set fire to the bed-clothes, which were burnt to tinder. Although the report of the pistol was heard by the people of the house in which he lodged, it was considered by them as proceeding from the next house. Before his death he wrote three letters to a friend, desiring him to call at different places and get clothes, &c. belonging to him; and this friend on the Inquest proved that the deceased had been melancholy, in consequence of his wife having left him, and his having lost or been robbed of the property his mother lately left him. Verdict—Shot himself in a fit of insanity.

Wednesday, a young woman of respectable appearance, suddenly expired as she was passing over Westminster-bridge.

Thursday last, as Mr. Brown, of Denmark-alley, was returning home from Hampstead to London, accompanied by a little dog, as they proceeded along the Hampstead-road, they were met by a cow driven by a boy; in consequence of the dog barking at it, the infuriated beast made an attack upon the dog, which Mr. B. endeavouring to check, he was tossed instantaneously some yards from the ground, and falling on some brambles on the opposite hedge, he remained in a state of torment; till, by a sudden effort, he extricated himself. Mr. B. labours under several severe contusions.

The Birmingham Chronicle says—"The Holyhead Mail, which left London on Monday night last, contained some boxes of gold coin, amounting to about 1000*l.* each. Upon opening the seat depositaries, in the inside, at Coventry, one of them was ascertained to be missing, though secured by a patent lock. It is supposed to have been stolen by an inside passenger, who remained in the coach by himself during the supper-time at Redburn."

MARRIAGES.

On the 31st ult. at St. Mary's, Lambeth, Baptist William Hickey, Esq. of Berkeley, in the County of Gloucester, to Rachel, youngest daughter of the late John Morgan, Esq. of Bishopsgate-street, and of Brixton-place, in the County of Surrey.

Dec. 17, John Sherlock, Esq. Paymaster in his Majesty's 87th regiment of foot, to Miss Catherine Pomeroy Buckingham, of Plymouth.

Dec. 23, the Rev. Thomas Sayers, A.M. of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, to Maria, youngest daughter of the late Thomas Barton, Esq. of Bracondale Hill, Norwich.

Dec. 23, Mr. Thomas Hall, of Camberwell Grove, to Mary Anne, eldest daughter of James Atlee, Esq. of Deptford.

Dec. 29, Thomas Newman, Esq. of Nelling, Essex, to Eliza Ann, daughter of T. Hall, Esq. of Cumberland-street, Portman-square.

Dec. 25, Mr. R. Taylor, of Maida Vale, Paddington, to Eliza, daughter of William Williams, Esq. of Clarendon-place, Marylebone.

DEATHS.

Dec. 24, at Bath, Ann, widow of the late Thomas Sommers Cocks, Esq. of Downing-street.

Dec. 25, at Hampton Court Palace, in her 83d year, the Right Hon. Lady Caroline Herbert, relict of Chas. Herbert, Esq. and sister to the late Duke of Manchester.

Dec. 26, in his 29th year, Frederick Gosling, Esq. youngest son of George Gosling, Esq. of Bedford-square.

Dec. 28, aged 60, the Rev. Dr. Burney, Rector of Deptford.

Dec. 28, at his house in Harper-street, Daniel Braithwaite, Esq. aged 86, F.R.S. and A.S. formerly Comptroller of the Foreign Post-Office.

Dec. 19, at Newburgh (Fife), within an hour of each other, Mr. David Henderson, aged 74, and Mrs. Jean Taylor, his wife, aged 71, after a matrimonial union of 45 years.

Dec. 27, at Southampton, aged 77, Sir Richard Ouslow, Bart. B.C.C.B. Admiral of the Red, and Lieut. General of the Royal Marines.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN, AND DISTRESS OF THE POOR IN GENERAL.

EVER since the late war, thousands of sailors have been in a very distressed condition. Many persons must have seen them crossing the country in rags and disease, and begging their way to their respective parishes; and in London the sights have been a great deal worse. A Meeting was held in consequence last Monday in the City, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the best means of affording relief to unemployed and distressed Seamen, and for aiding in the enforcement of the laws against impostors assuming the appearance of Seamen for the purpose of begging." This latter resolution is an excellent one, when coupled with the former. To detect impostors is to do great service to those who are none; but then it should be made manifest, that the object in detecting impostors is to do service to the really suffering. All that has ever been complained of on this head is,—first, that persons are quick to cry out against or detect impostors, and to go no farther; and second, that impostors in the abstract, that is to say, impostors as far as some particular pretension is concerned, are sometimes in great want of charity upon other grounds, and sometimes driven upon that very species of imposture by real want. When the husband in the Taller fell down by the side of his second wife during one of her pretended fits at being denied a coach or some such thing, and whispered in her ear, "This will never do, my dear," he acted like a man, and a really kind one; but if the same husband had shewn himself insensible to faded cheeks or a wasted figure, and had not at least inquired into the causes of it and ascertained whether it was owing to circumstances which he could relieve or not, he would not have done his duty even towards a person who had endeavoured to impose upon him in other respects. Nothing is more common, when a crowd collects about an object, than for some of the bystanders to say,—“Ah,—drunk:—an impostor!—an old offender no doubt!”—and a great many other phrases which would make any of themselves as mad as fury, if they had cut their little finger;—but while it is acknowledged that there are many impostors, how many of these bystanders are impostors themselves? That is to say, how many of them are there, who in pretended zeal for sincerity and the really afflicted, are quick to make themselves these excuses for doing nothing, whether the object be afflicted or not? It is enough, we should think, for people to find out occasionally, in their rums through this life, that they have hurt the feelings of fellow-creatures out of the pale of their own particular habits and associations, and thereby subjected themselves, with greater or less degrees of justice, to charges of self-love or of selfishness; but to turn wilfully away from the sight of persons suffering under misfortunes, which our common nature may easily lead us to apprehend,—under cold, hunger, pain, and the failing spirit of disease,—and to go from all this into warm and curtained rooms, where the fire welcomes our feet, and plenty is to be served up at a ring of the bell,—this indeed shews a want of feeling rendered callous by bad habits, or a want of imagination whose best excuse is stupidity. Those, who have been merely irritated into a neglect of such scenes by imposture, would, we are sure, hasten to prove the cause to their own consciences, by not neglecting them very long.

At the Meeting in the City, a Captain in the Navy (Capt. GORDON) drew a picture of the state of the seamen in the metropolis, that should stand in stead of a thousand arguments. “One evening, he went to one of those miserable places in St. Botolph, Aldgate, where these creatures spent the night. In four small rooms, 14 feet by 16, he found fourscore wretches, in a state, to describe which was truly impossible. He could discern among them few men, for they were really skeletons, Seamen's skeletons as he could well perceive. He questioned them about what exertions they had made to procure a ship, when one and all expressed with eagerness their wish to serve, but that from their naked appearance no one would employ them. Willing to work, they were alone prevented from doing so by their miserable appearance. Nothing he was confident could have induced them to resort to that place, that noxious place, but their being reduced to the last shift. He might well call it a noxious place, for the smell was intolerable, and the air most baneful. That it could not be otherwise might easily be seen from what he had stated respecting the size of the miserable holes they were placed in, as those who could pay three-pence a night were allowed a bed, that is, allowed to lie on an old torn mattress on the floor, without a covering, and those who could pay only two-pence, were allowed to come in but not to lie down; while those who could not afford that miserable pittance, were debarred from entering. On his return from this miserable place, he found five in the streets, who had not been fortunate enough to raise this two-pence. They were standing in the streets in a cold frosty night, shivering in the cold, while their uncovered limbs were exposed to all the severities of the weather. One of them was lying with his tongue out, in a very great fever. Numerous were the instances which had occurred of these brave defenders of their country, these men who were worthy of a better fate, perishing from actual starvation. One was about three weeks ago found dead; another carried to St. George's Hospital, where he died; while a third yielded up a miserable existence on Greenwich beach. When such things were thought of, when such things were known to be facts, it became every man to be active and do his duty.”

It does indeed. We are surprised, we confess, that no one would employ them on account of an appearance which was one of the greatest proofs of their want of employment; and we recommend to the consideration of those who are so ready to pass on with the word impostor in their mouths, the account of the five houseless ones, who had not been "fortunate" enough to raise two-pence a piece for a night's-lodging. But what surprises us most, or rather what would surprise us, if the Constitution were preserved as it ought to be, is, that Government seem to act, and even to talk, as if they could do nothing on these occasions. We are told in the course of the speeches at this Meeting, that an application had been made to the Lords of the Admiralty,—not, observe, that the Admiralty had of their own accord taken any steps to relieve these dreadful cases;—then we are informed, that in consequence of the application, "their Lordships would concur with the wishes of the Committee as far as they could with propriety;"—and that this propriety consisted in offering a ship or two for the use of the Committee, but without officers, "their Lordships' reason for not giving officers to the vessel being, that they could not enforce orders on board of such a vessel, the men not being entered as usual!" Now really, unless some explanation be given on the subject (and explanation is the least which their Lordships can give), this excuse must be considered as the very paltriest on record. They could not enforce orders! And what can the Committee do? Can they enforce orders? Or do they think orders necessary to be enforced? Or would their Lordships, the Lords of the Admiralty, have us believe, that a direction,—a request,—an implied wish, from Government,—especially on an occasion like this, would not have its full effect on hundreds of officers, from whom they might select the small number requisite? It is well known what pains the late Lord Mayor took on this very matter a year or two back. He and some of his fellow-magistrates were roused to its consideration, in common with others of his fellow-creatures (their Lordships of the Admiralty excepted) by the shocking sights of distress throughout the metropolis. They waited on their very unshocked and placid Lordships accordingly; and were received, saith Sir JAMES SHAW ("as it is but justice to say") "with the utmost politeness and attention." Oh, doubtless;—politeness and attention on such occasions cost nothing but what is very pleasant and repaying;—and besides, it would be very shocking if a Lord of the Admiralty were not very polite,—not to say condescending,—to a Lord Mayor. Doubtless had his Lordship made a little mistake, and called upon their Lordships while drinking their Burgundy and cracking their walnuts, they would not to have contented themselves with begging him to partake of some empty hulls;—they would doubtless have begged him to take some of the kernels, and even invited him to save his teeth with crackers, albeit they could not enforce the use of the said crackers. Well;—the Lord Mayor proposed to have a vessel stationed in the river, and to use it for the purpose of clearing the streets of the distressed sailors; and their Lordships very graciously consenting, the plan was carried into execution, and the naked clothed (which was something) from the government stores. Yet this vessel had since been removed, though how it had been removed the above-mentioned Sir JAMES could not say, "neither" (which is very awful) "would he attempt to say;" yet the Worthy Alderman had no difficulty in asserting, from the kind attention thus shewn by his Majesty's Ministers, that it would now succeed were an application made to Government, and that similar good would follow." But, we repeat, why does it become necessary that Government,—that the Admiralty,—should be eternally applied to? Ought not the distress of the seamen, of "the gallant tars,"—of those whose exploits are so exultingly as well as justly cried up, when there is need of them,—to be considered as under the Admiralty's peculiar jurisdiction? Where are the funds out of which the creature CROKER was to have his war salary in time of peace? Where, also, as Lord COCHRANE asked, are those "funds which are the exclusive property of seamen?" Where are the Droits of Admiralty? "And why was no meeting heard of for the relief of soldiers perishing in the streets? Why, in the name of God," cried his Lordship, agitated, "is this German difference made?"

We shall conclude this article next week; and if any ministerialist, as will most likely be the case, shall take up our paper from motives foreign to any proper species of sympathy, we will try if he has not a little decent humanity left in him nevertheless. The other subject we have put at the head of our paper for the present, chiefly to shew that we do not overlook it. We shall have too many opportunities, we fear, of returning to that.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JAN. 3.—It is asserted in an article from Berlin, dated Dec. 24, "that Prince Hardenberg and the Count de Zichy have had, at Weimar, a very important explanation with the Grand Duke, relative to the events at Wartberg, and the licentiousness of the works printed in the States of his Royal Highness."

By an ordonnance of the 31st December, the King has created a preparatory military school, for the purpose of instructing, at the public expence, the sons of officers; without property, who are distinguished for their services; and at the expence of their families, such young men as their relations may wish to initiate into the studies and pursuits of the said school. The total number of pupils will be five hundred; of whom 300 are to be educated at the public charge.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, DEC. 13.—The Prussian Councillor of State, Von Jordan, who is expected this evening, will probably make a long stay here, as his mission is said to embrace very important objects. Among other things it is stated that measures will be concerted between our Court and that of Prussia, to check the abuses and licentiousness of the Press, which threatens Germany with incalculable evils, unless wise and energetic measures are speedily adopted. In order to secure to the nations of Germany the enjoyment of a reasonable liberty of the Press, and in general a high degree of civil and political freedom, it is necessary, before all things, to oppose a powerful barrier to the license of the Press and lawless insubordination which begins to shew itself in so many places. By the Apostles of liberty who now preach every where from the house tops, Germany can only be plunged either into the most dreadful anarchy, or the most frightful despotism, either of which would stifle for many years the seeds of improvement in our country.

SWITZERLAND.

ZURICH, DEC. 24.—The diplomatic note from the Ministers of France and Austria, which has been transmitted from the Council at Berne to all the different Governments of the Cantons, as well as the observations of the said Council, with respect to the journals and pamphlets, have been taken into consideration by the inferior Councils and Supreme Authorities of most of the Cantons. The decision which has been distinctly come to by the Swiss Governments, is, that nothing shall be published in that country which can give the slightest offence, or be in the least degree unpleasant, to the great Powers.

RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURGH, DEC. 10.—It is said that a proposal has been made to the Government in order to put a final stop to the ruinous and detestable contraband trade, without the use of violent measures, which are, besides always insufficient, to open Negotiations on the basis of the Holy Alliance, of which the result would be, "That every Power which takes a part in the Holy Alliance should have to provide, that no goods should be conveyed from or through its territories to those of another State in which those goods are contraband." As cheating, cunning, and covetousness, the chief motives of the smugglers, on the one hand, and on the other, the scandalous inclination of the consumers to extravagance, are directly opposite to the spirit of Christianity. Commercial Treaties concluded on this principle would certainly be the only means conformable to this spirit. The lawful intercourse of the different Nations of the earth would be secured by them.

NORTH AMERICA.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

WASHINGTON, DEC. 9.—This day, at 12 o'clock, the President of the United States transmitted to both Houses of Congress the following Message, by Mr. Joseph Jones Monroe, his Secretary:—

"Fellow-Citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives,

"At no period of our political existence had we so much cause to felicitate ourselves at the prosperous and happy condition of our country. The abundant fruits of the earth have filled it with plenty. An extensive and profitable commerce has greatly augmented our revenue. The public credit has attained an extraordinary elevation. Our preparations for defence, in case of future wars, from which, by the experience of all nations, we ought not to expect to be exempted, are advancing, under a well digested system, with all the dispatch which so important a work will admit. Our free Government, founded on the interest and affections of the people, has gained, and is daily gaining, strength.—Local jealousies are rapidly yielding to more generous, enlarged, and enlightened views of national policy. For advantages so numerous and highly important, it is our duty to unite in grateful acknowledgments to that Omnipotent Being from whom they are derived, and in unceasing prayer that he will endow us with virtue and strength to maintain and hand them down in their utmost purity, to our latest posterity.

"I have the satisfaction to inform you, that an arrangement, which had been commenced by my predecessor, with the British Government, for the reduction of the naval force, by Great Britain and the United States, on the Lakes, has been concluded: by which it is provided, that neither party shall keep in service on Lake Champlain more than one vessel; on Lake Ontario more than one; and on Lake Erie and the upper Lakes, more than two; to be armed each with one cannon only; and that all the other armed vessels, of both parties, of which an exact list is interchanged, shall be dismantled. It is also agreed, that the force retained shall be restricted, in its duty, to the internal purposes of each party; and that the arrangement shall remain in force until six months shall have expired, after notice given by one of the parties to the other of its desire that it should terminate. By this arrangement useless expense, on both sides, and, what is of still greater importance, the danger of collision between armed vessels, in those inland waters, which was great, is prevented.

"I have the satisfaction also to state, that the Commissioners, under the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent, to whom it was referred to decide to which party the several islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy belonged, under the Treaty of 1783, have agreed in a report, by which all the islands in the possession of each party before the late war, have been decreed to it. The Commissioners acting under the other article of the Treaty of Ghent, for the settlement of the boundaries, have also been engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, but have not yet completed them. The difference which arose between the two Governments under that Treaty, respecting the right of the United States to take and cure fish on the coast of the British provinces north of our limits, which had had been secured by the Treaty of 1783, is still in negotiation. The proposition made by this Government, to extend to the Colonies of Great Britain the principles of the Convention of London, by which the commerce between the ports of the United States and British ports in Europe had been placed on a footing of equality, has been declined by the British Government. This subject having been thus amicably discussed between the two Governments, and it appearing that the British Government is unwilling to depart from its present regulations, it remains for Congress to decide whether they will make any other regulations, in consequence thereof, for the protection and improvement of our navigation.

"The negotiation with Spain, for spoils on our commerce, and the settlement of boundaries, remains, essentially, in the state it held, by the communications that were made to Congress by my predecessor. It has been evidently the policy of the Spanish Government to keep the negotiation suspended; and in this the United States have acquiesced, from an amicable disposition towards Spain, and in the expectation that her Government would, from a sense of justice, finally accede to such arrangement as would be equal between the parties. A disposition has been lately shewn by the Spanish Government to move in the negotiation, which has been met by this Government; and, should the conciliatory and friendly policy, which has invariably guided our Councils, be reciprocated, a just and satisfactory arrangement may be expected. It is proper, however, to remark, that no proposition has yet been made, from which such a result can be presumed.

"It was anticipated at an early stage, that the contest between Spain and her Colonies would become highly interesting to the United States. It was natural that our Citizens should sympathize in events which effected their neighbours. It seemed probable also, that the prosecution of the conflict along our coast, and in contiguous countries, would occasionally interrupt our commerce, and otherwise affect the persons and property of our Citizens. These anticipations have been realized. Such injuries have been received from persons acting under the authority of both the parties, and for which redress has in most instances been withheld. Through every stage of the conflict, the United States have maintained an impartial neutrality, giving aid to neither of the parties in men, money, ships, or munitions of war. They have regarded the contest, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral powers, equal rights. Our ports have been open to both; and every article, the fruit of our soil, or of the industry of our citizens, which either was permitted to take, has been equally free to the other. Should the Colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state, that this Government neither seeks, nor would accept from them, any advantage, in commerce or otherwise, which would not be equally open to all other nations. The Colonies will, in that event, become independent States, free from any obligation to, or connection with, us, which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair reciprocity.

"In the summer of the present year an expedition was set on foot against East Florida, by persons claiming to act under the authority of some of the Colonies, who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of St. Mary's River, near the boundary of the state of Georgia. As this province lies east of the Mississippi, and is bounded by the United States and the Ocean on every side, and has been a subject of negotiation with the Government of Spain, as an indemnity for losses by spoliation, or in exchange for territory of equal value westward of the Mississippi, a fact well known to the world, it excited surprise that any countenance should be given to this measure by any of the Colonies. As it would be difficult to reconcile it with the friendly relations existing between the United States and the Colonies, a doubt was entertained whether it had been authorized by them, or any of them. This doubt has gained strength, by the circumstances which have unfolded themselves in the prosecution of the enterprise, which have marked it as a mere private unauthorized adventure. Projected and commenced with an incompetent force, reliance seems to have been placed on what might be drawn, in defiance of our laws, from within our limits; and of late, as their resources have failed, it has assumed a more marked character of unfriendliness to us, the island being made a channel for the illicit introduction of slaves from Africa into the United States, an asylum for fugitive slaves from the neighbouring States, and a port for smuggling of every kind.

"A similar establishment was made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description, in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galvestown, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana. This enterprise has been marked, in a more signal manner, by all the objectionable circumstances which characterised the other, and more particularly by the equipment of privateers, which have annoyed our commerce, and by smuggling. These establishments, if ever sanctioned by any authority whatever, which is not believed, have abused their trust, and forfeited all claim to consideration. A just regard for the rights and interests of the United States required that they should be suppressed; and orders have accordingly issued to that effect. The imperious considerations which produced this measure will be explained to the parties whom it may, in any degree, concern.

"To obtain correct information on every subject in which the United States are interested; to inspire just sentiments, in all persons in authority, on either side, of our friendly disposition, so far as it may comport with an impartial neutrality; and to secure proper respect to our commerce in every port, and from every flag, it has been thought proper to send a ship of war, with three distinguished citizens, along the southern coast, with instruction to touch at such ports as they may find most expedient for these purposes. With the existing authorities, with those in the possession of, and exercising the sovereignty, must the communication be held; from them alone can redress for past injuries, committed by persons acting under them, be obtained; by them alone can the commission of the like in future be prevented.

"Our relations with the other Powers of Europe have experienced no material change since the last Session. In our intercourse with each, due attention continues to be paid to the protection of our commerce, and to every other object in which the United States are interested. A strong hope is entertained, that, by adhering to the maxims of a just, a candid, and friendly policy, we may long preserve amicable relations with all the Powers of Europe, on conditions advantageous and honourable to our country.

"With the Barbary States and the Indian Tribes our pacific relations have been preserved.

"In calling your attention to the internal concerns of our country, the view which they exhibit is peculiarly gratifying.—The payments which have been made into the Treasury, shew the very productive state of the public revenue. After satisfying the appropriations made by law for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Military and Naval Establishments, embracing suitable provision for fortifications and for the gradual increase of the Navy, paying the interest of the public debt, and extinguishing more than 18 millions of the principal, within the present year, it is estimated that a balance of more than six millions of dollars will remain in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, applicable to the current service of the ensuing year.

"The payments into the Treasury during the year 1818, on account of imposts and tonnage, resulting principally from duties which have accrued in the present year, may be fairly estimated at 20 millions of dollars; internal revenues at 2,500,000; public lands, at 1,500,000; bank dividends and incidental receipts, at 500,000; making in the whole, 21,500,000 dollars.

"The annual permanent expenditure for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Army and Navy, as now established by law, amounts to 11,500,000 dollars; and for the Sinking Fund to 10 millions; making, in the whole, 21,500,000 dollars; leaving an annual excess of revenue beyond the expenditure of 2,700,000 dollars, exclusive of the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1818.

"In the present state of the Treasury, the whole of the Louisiana debt may be redeemed in the year 1819; after which, if the public debt continues as it now is, above par, there will be annually above five millions of the Sinking Fund unexpended, until the year 1825, when the loan of 1812, and stock created by funding Treasury Notes, will be redeemable.

"It is also estimated that the Mississippi Stock will be discharged, during the year 1819, from the proceeds of the public lands assigned to that object; after which the receipts from those lands will annually add to the public revenue the sum of 1,500,000 dollars; making the permanent annual revenue amount to 26 millions of dollars, and leaving an annual excess of revenue, after the year 1819, beyond the permanent authorized expenditure, of more than four millions of dollars.

"By the last returns from the Department of War, the militia force of the several States may be estimated at 800,000 men, infantry, artillery, and cavalry. Great part of this force is armed, and measures are taken to arm the whole. An improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia, is one of the great objects which claim the unremitting attention of Congress.

"The regular force amounts nearly to the number required by law, and is stationed along the Atlantic and inland frontiers.

"Of the naval force, it has been necessary to maintain strong squadrons in the Mediterranean, and in the Gulf of Mexico.

"From several of the Indian tribes inhabiting the country bordering on Lake Erie, purchases have been made of lands, on conditions very favourable to the United States; and, as it is presumed, not less so to the tribes themselves. By these purchases, the Indian title, with moderate reservation, has been extinguished in the whole of the land within the limits of the State of Ohio, and to a great part of that in the Michigan territory, and of the State of Indiana. From the Cherokee tribe a tract has been purchased in the State of Georgia, and an arrangement made, by which, in exchange for lands beyond the Mississippi, a great part, if not the whole of the land belonging to that tribe, eastward of that river, in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee, and in the Alabama territory, will soon be acquired. By these acquisitions, and others, that may reasonably be expected soon to follow, we shall be enabled to extend our settlements from the inhabited parts of the State of Ohio, along Lake Erie, into the Michigan territory, and to connect our settlements by degrees, through the State of Indiana and the Illinois to that of Missouri. A similar and equally advantageous effect will soon be produced to the South, through the whole extent of the States and territory which border on the waters emptying into the Mississippi and the Mobile. In this progress, which the rights of Nature demand, and nothing can prevent, marking a growth rapid and gigantic, it is our duty to make new efforts for the preservation, improvement, and civilization of the native inhabitants. The hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form, and greater force, of civilized population; and of right it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort. It is gratifying to know, that the reservations of land made by the Treaties with the tribes on Lake Erie, were made with a view to individual ownership among them, and to the cultivation of the soil by all, and that an annual stipend has been pledged to supply their other wants. It will merit the consideration of Congress, whether other provision, not stipulated by the Treaty, ought to be made for these tribes, and for the advancement of the liberal and humane policy of the United States towards all the tribes within our limits, and more particularly for their improvement in the art of civilized life.

"Among the advantages incident to these purchases, and to those which have preceded, the security which may thereby be afforded to our inland frontiers, is peculiarly important. With a strong barrier, consisting of our own people, thus planted on the Lakes, the Mississippi, and the Mobile, with the protection to be derived from the regular force, Indian hostilities, if they do not altogether cease, will henceforth lose their terror. Fortifications in those quarters, to any extent, will not be necessary, and the expense attending them may be saved. A people accustomed to the use of fire-arms only, as the Indian tribes are, will shun even moderate works, which are defended by cannon. Great fortifications will, therefore, be requisite only, in future, along the coast, and at some points in the interior, connected with it. On these will the safety of our towns, and the commerce of our great rivers, from the Bay of Fundy to the Mississippi, depend. On these, therefore, should the utmost attention, skill, and labour, be bestowed.

"A considerable and rapid augmentation in the value of all the public lands, proceeding from these and other obvious causes, may hereafterward be expected. The difficulties attending early emigrations will be dissipated even in the most remote parts.

Several new States have been admitted into our Union, to the west and south, and territorial Governments, happily organized, established over every other portion in which there is vacant land for sale. In terminating Indian hostilities, as must soon be done, in a formidable shape at least, the emigration, which has heretofore been great, will probably increase; and the demand for land, and the augmentation in its value, be in like proportion. The great increase of our population throughout the Union, will alone produce an important effect, and in no quarter will it be so sensibly felt as in those in contemplation. The public lands are a public stock, which ought to be disposed of to the best advantage for the nation. The nation should, therefore, derive the profit proceeding from the continual rise in their value. Every encouragement should be given to the emigrants consistent with a fair competition between them, but that competition should operate, in the first sale, to the advantage of the nation rather than of individuals. Great capitalists will derive all the benefit incident to their superior wealth, under any mode of sale which may be adopted. But if, looking forward to the rise in the value of the public lands, they should have the opportunity of amassing, at a low price, vast bodies in their hands, the profit will accrue to them and not to the public. They would also have the power, in that degree, to control the emigration and settlement in such manner as their opinion of their respective interests might dictate. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in the sale of the public lands, with a view to the public interest, should any be deemed expedient, as in their judgment may be best adapted to the object.

"When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States, the great amount and value of its productions, the connection of its parts, and other circumstances, on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantages to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them, by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them. As this subject was acted on by Congress at the last session, and there may be a disposition to revive it at the present, I have brought it into view, for the purpose of communicating my sentiments on a very important circumstance connected with it, with that freedom and candour which a regard for the public interest, and a proper respect for Congress, require. A difference of opinion has existed, from the first formation of our Constitution to the present time, among our most enlightened and virtuous citizens, respecting the right of Congress to establish such a system of improvement. Taking into view the trust with which I am now honoured, it would be improper, after what has passed, that this discussion should be revived, with an uncertainty of my opinion respecting the right. Disregarding early impressions, I have bestowed on the subject all the deliberation which its great importance, and a just sense of my duty, required; and the result is a settled conviction in my mind, that Congress do not possess the right. It is not contained in any of the specified powers granted to Congress; nor can I consider it incidental to, or a necessary mean, viewed on the most liberal scale, for carrying into effect any of the powers which are specifically granted. In communicating this result, I cannot resist the obligation which I feel to suggest to Congress the propriety of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, which shall give to Congress the right in question. In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for an explicit grant of the power. We may confidently rely, that if it appears to their satisfaction that the power is necessary, it will always be granted. In this case I am happy to observe that experience has afforded the most ample proof of its utility, and that the benign spirit of conciliation and harmony which now manifests itself throughout our Union, promises to such a recommendation the most prompt and favourable result. I think proper to suggest, also, in case this measure is adopted, that it be recommended to the States to include in the amendment sought, a right of Congress to institute, likewise, seminaries of learning, for the all-important purpose of diffusing knowledge among our fellow citizens throughout the United States.

"Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge acquired in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation.

"Although the progress of the public buildings has been as favourable as circumstances have permitted, it is to be regretted that the capitol is not yet in a state to receive you. There is good cause to presume that the two wings, the only parts as yet commenced, will be prepared for that purpose at the next Session. The time seems now to have arrived when this subject may be deemed worthy the attention of Congress, on a scale adequate to national purposes. The completion of the middle building will be necessary to the convenient accommodation of Congress, of the Committees, and various offices belonging to it. It is evident that the other public buildings are altogether insufficient for the accommodation of the several Executive Departments, some of whom are much crowded, and even subjected to the necessity of obtaining it in private buildings, at some distance from the head of the Department, and with inconvenience to the management of the public business. Most nations have taken an interest and a pride in the improvement and ornament of their metropolis; and none were more conspicuous in that respect than the ancient Republics. The policy which dictated the establishment of a permanent residence for the National Government, and the spirit in which it was commenced, and has been prosecuted, shew that such improvement was thought worthy the attention of this nation. Its central position, between the northern and southern extremes of our union, and its approach to the west, at the head of a navigable river, which interlocks with the western waters, prove the wisdom of the Councils which established it. Nothing appears to be more reasonable and proper, than that convenient accommodations should be provided, on a well-digested plan, for the heads of the several Departments, and for the Attorney-General; and it is believed that the public ground in the city, applied to those objects, will be found amply sufficient. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in it as to them may seem proper.

"In contemplating the happy situation of the United States, our attention is drawn, with peculiar interest, to the surviving officers and soldiers of our revolutionary army, who so eminently contributed, by their services, to lay its foundation. Most of those very meritorious citizens have paid the debt of nature, and gone to repose. It is believed that among the survivors there are some not provided for by existing laws, who are reduced to indigence, and even to real distress. These men have a claim on the gratitude of their country, and it will do honour to their country to provide for them. The lapse of a few years more, and the opportunity will be for ever lost: indeed, so long already has been the interval, that the number to be benefitted by any provision which may be made, will not be great.

"It appearing in a satisfactory manner that the revenue arising from imports and tonnage, and from the sale of the public lands, will be fully adequate to the support of the Civil Government, of the present Military and Naval Establishment, including the annual augmentation of the latter, to the extent provided for; to the payment of the interests on the public debt, and to the extinguishment of it at the times authorised, without the aid of the Internal Taxes; I consider it my duty to recommend to Congress their repeal. To impose Taxes when the public exigencies require them, is an obligation of the most sacred character, especially with a free people: the faithful fulfilment of it is among the highest proofs of their virtue, and capacity for self-government. To dispense with Taxes, when it may be done with perfect safety, is equally the duty of their Representatives. In this instance, we have the satisfaction to know, that they were imposed when the demand was imperious, and have been sustained with exemplary fidelity. I have to add, that however gratifying it may be to me, regarding the prosperous and happy condition of our country, to recommend the repeal of these Taxes at this time, I shall nevertheless be attentive to events, and, should any future emergency occur, be not less prompt to suggest such measures and burdens as may then be requisite and proper.

"Washington, Dec. 2, 1817.

JAMES MONROE.

THE NEW CABINET.—The judgment of the President has been, we think, remarkably displayed in the selection of his Cabinet Officers. He could not have united a greater mass of talent and information. The gentlemen who now compose the Cabinet Council of the nation have been long before the public, and are distinguished alike by their literary taste and political intelligence:—

Mr. Adams, the present Secretary of State, has distinguished himself in the literary and political world, as a writer and a statesman. In both he has evinced ability and knowledge, and deserved well of his country. In addition to his mental qualifications, he possesses a habitude for business, and discharges the laborious duties of his present office with great regularity and despatch.

Mr. Crawford is a man of strong and discriminating mind, balancing with accuracy, and deciding with promptitude. Like the present Attorney-General, he owes his elevation to his own intellectual powers and individual exertions; and offers another instance of the excellence of our Government, in affording an unlimited field to the operation of intellect, and a free goal to the attainment of virtuous ambition. He was a good Secretary of War, and is as good a Minister of Finance. The same energies and powers are displayed in every thing he undertakes, and age is all useful to his country.

Mr. Calhoun, now Secretary of War, is a young man of fine genius and singular talent. While a leading member in the popular branch of our national legislature, he astonished all who heard him by the rapidity and fire of his eloquence, and the quickness and accuracy of his mind. He may, perhaps, from his youth and the character of his intellect, be too fond of novelties that are only calculated to surprise and dazzle; but age will mellow his mind, and render its efforts more beneficial and salutary. We doubt not he will execute the duties of his present station with ability and satisfaction, and be a very useful member of the Cabinet.

Of Mr. Wirt, it is scarcely necessary to add any thing to what we have already said of him. He is so well known as a profound lawyer, a fine speaker, and a classical and elegant writer, that to say more in his praise would be a work of supererogation. It may only be observed, that he has risen to the situation of Attorney-General of the United States, from obscurity and indigence, by the superiority of his mind, and by his own unaided and individual exertions.

These gentlemen form a halo of reputation around the President, and hold out to the country promises of utility and advantage, in which all will participate, and with which all must be gratified.—Washington City Gazette.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JANUARY 11.

The most important arrival from abroad this week is the Message of the NORTH AMERICAN PRESIDENT. It has met with an unusually favourable reception in this country, having been applauded by the Ministerial as well as other papers; and there are so many curious as well as important subjects of reflection connected with it, that we cannot possibly undertake to give our observations upon it yet, as we could wish. A former article of ours upon a Speech of the new PRESIDENT's gave, we understand, great offence in a quarter, which we certainly could not but be sorry to disturb, and the good opinion of which we should always be anxious to maintain; but without being subjected to the slightest external influence of any kind on the side of American politics, and though not even yet made republicans by all the pains-taking of the Allied Powers, we feel the political freedom and happiness enjoyed by the Americans too strongly, and have seen the horrible consequences of encroachment upon a popular constitution too indignantly in our own country, not to feel all the jealousy of the warmest American republican in watching the movements of the higher powers; and if we thought he discovered some symptoms of a nature a little too lordly in the new PRESIDENT, we are certain, that in proportion to his own zeal for the liberties of his country, he himself would be the first to forgive us, if he knew the unbiassed and utter sincerity of our motives. The tone of the present Speech appears to be considerably different from the last, in any thing that might excite the jealousy we speak of; though, to say the truth, we have not been altogether easy respecting the progresses which the PRESIDENT made not long ago, through the States, and the style in which he was welcomed in various quarters. The Speech chiefly consists of felicitations to the Congress on the flourishing state of the country and its relations; and the picture drawn is luckily as creditable as it is happy. A people enjoying the fruits of their labour, possessing equal rights, and with arms in their houses to use if they chose it; a government, prosperous in its external relations, discharging its old debts, and able to repeal every external tax whatsoever;—a territory, promising to occupy the whole northern part of the Western Hemisphere, contemplating and evidently anticipating the successful issue of the struggle of its southern neighbours for achieving the independence of which it set the example, and affording to the whole of the deceived and dissatisfied European world a spectacle more, much more than imposing,—such is the state of the North American world, as described in the PRESIDENT'S Speech, and as felt by every body who is not absolutely ignorant and stupid. The new lights talked of by philosophy in modern times, have been at one time received with terror by the unjust and despotic, and sometimes, when the latter have supposed their power to be secure, with sneers and silly bravado; but when philosophy and great physical power come together,—when the Government of a powerful nation, not in the hurry of a new enthusiasm, but in the calmness of experience and conscious strength, assists in darting these lights upon the world, how must the unjust and the despotic feel then? How must they feel when they read such a passage as the following?—

"The earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort."

"And kings sat still with awful eye,

"As if they surely knew their sovereign lord was by."

In the mean time, by way of emulation perhaps with the Message of the AMERICAN PRESIDENT, a gracious message has been sent to the various secret-imprisoning jails in the Mother Country, for the release of the fifty (only fifty, as the Courier said) State Prisoners confined without a trial, and now dismissed without one!

The latest advices of the state of affairs in New Guyana, have been received by way of Trinidad. It appears that the operations of the Patriot Chiefs had been obstructed, by the disobedience of PIAR and MARINO to the orders of BOLIVAR, as Commander-in-Chief. The former was arrested by BOLIVAR, tried by a Court Martial of which Admiral BRON was President, adjudged to capital punishment, and shot on the 16th of October. MARINO had been superseded in his command, and was also to be brought to trial; but it was supposed he would not be so rigorously dealt with. It appears, that neither of the rebellious Chiefs had been able to seduce any body of the troops under their command, from their allegiance to the Republic of Venezuela. An expedition was about to proceed up the Oroonoko, to expel the Spaniards from several posts which they occupied on the banks of that river, above Angustura. Its success was confidently anticipated, in which event the Patriots would have a free communication opened to them by water, with the interior of New Grenada, and the Brazils. The whole of the Province of Maracaybo, with the exception of the capital, was up in arms against the Spaniards. The letters from Trinidad continue to predict a favourable issue to the exertions of the Colonies in the cause of Independence; and enlarge on the advantages which this country would derive from a free trade with them.

Boston papers arrived yesterday morning. Hostilities between the army of the United States and the Seminole Indians have commenced. General GAINES was surrounded and blockaded in one of the forts on St. Mary's; he had dispatched an express, requesting immediate reinforcements. Some Spaniards are reported to have joined the Indians.

Sir JOHN LEACH was on Friday sworn into the office of Vice-Chancellor, at Lincoln's Inn Hall, Sir THOMAS PLUMER having been appointed Master of the Rolls.

We understand that Lord SIMON, some days since, signed warrants for discharging all the remaining State Prisoners, upon their giving their own recognizances to appear to any charge which might be brought against them next Term, a condition with which they all most cheerfully complied, except two London prisoners, and a man of the name of BENBOW from Manchester, who insist upon being brought to trial, or being discharged without any mark of suspicion attached to their characters.—Courier.

Mr. HONE.—The subscription for this persecuted man is, we are right glad to see, going on very well. The Earl of DARLINGTON has sent him 100 guineas; and we perceive among his supporters the names of many persons, respectable alike for condition and ability. Still, no one who thinks the acquittal of Mr. HONE a triumph in the cause of Civil and Religious Liberty, should relax in his endeavours. Mr. HONE has long been a struggling man; he has a wife and seven young children,—the two eldest females, and the next, a youth in ill health,—to support in these hard times. Not having been hitherto successful in trade, he has of course some debts to meet, and they will necessarily absorb a portion of the money raised.—Even if this worthy individual and his large family were quite out of the question, still, in a public view of the case, the subscription should be a large one, to mark the sense of the country. Let all, therefore, who can give, give freely, as well for the sake of humanity as for the sake of liberty—both struck at by the hypocritical and the slavish.

A large body of the Common Freemen of Oxford having expressed their wishes to make known to Mr. ADAMS, who served the Office of Mayor in 1805, and who is one of the Magistrates of that City, their approbation of his conduct in the various civic situations he has filled, came to a resolution, a short time since, to present to him a public testimony of their regard. A meeting of the Freemen, not being members of the Council Chamber, was therefore convened, when it was resolved that a Piece of Plate should be presented to that gentleman, and a subscription was entered into. On Monday last, a Deputation from a General Meeting of the Subscribers waited upon Mr. ADAMS with a very elegant Cup, of the value of fifty guineas. It is of silver, richly gilt, very tastefully executed, and has the following inscription:—"Presented to JAMES ADAMS, Esq. by the Independent Freemen of the City of Oxford, to testify their personal attachment to him, and to commemorate their gratitude for his constant exertions to maintain the rights and privileges of his fellow-citizens."—Oxford paper, Dec. 22.

The QUEEN has been down to Bath again, to the great joy of the shopkeepers; with dragoons trotting before and behind her, as usual. Queen ELIZABETH, we are told, had no guards except her people. The REGENT is at Brighton; living, we are informed, very secluded; and we hope studying retrenchments for the relief of the people.—Dundee Advertiser.

CHURCH CRAFT, OR NOT?—A Correspondent,—(B. C.) writes,—“I live in the very extensive parish of Lambeth, and have lately had an increase to my family: as my wife is not a very strong woman, I was desirous of avoiding the danger of exposure to the damp of a Church, and applied to the Clerk of the parish to know upon what terms she might be allowed to return thanks at home. He told me that the Rector's fee, for her being churched, was half a guinea;—for naming the child, half a guinea; and his own, for both, five shillings. I should feel obliged if any of your readers would inform me, by what authority the Rector claims these fees; and if the exaction of them be legal, whether he might not make them ten guineas, or any other sum? It is to be observed, that he does not perform the duty himself, but leaves that to his Curate—certainly, from what I saw of him, a very kind and respectable man.—With the fee paid to the Curate, it cost 14 16s. 6d.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

OZYMANDIAS.

I MET a Traveller from an antique land,
 Who said, "Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
 Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
 Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
 And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
 Tell that its sculptor well those passions read,
 Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
 The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed;
 And on the pedestal these words appear:
 "My name is OZYMANDIAS, King of Kings."
 Look on my works ye Mighty, and despair!
 Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
 Of that Colossal Wreck, boundless and bare,
 The lone and level sands stretch far away.

GLIRASTES.

THE POOR LAWS.

PLYMOUTH DOCK, OR PARISH OF STOKES DAMEREL.

From their peculiar situation, all sea-ports are more or less subject to the influx of strangers; but such places as Plymouth, Port-mouth, &c. feel the weight of the evil, as connected with the Poor Laws, in the extreme; as it is to those places the destitute make for, in the hope of finding employment, either on board the King's ships or merchant vessels; whilst many calculate to a certainty on being employed in his Majesty's arsenals; but after having travelled perhaps two or three hundred miles, and expended their last penny, their hopes are blasted, and their disappointment arrived to the highest pitch, they are compelled to apply to the parish.

Others again, arriving in the different vessels from abroad, disabled or enfeebled by age, are discharged to make room for more active and efficient men. These set themselves at the first place where they land; as also do women and children who have lost their husbands and fathers, and who have been sent home from the Continent or our Colonies.

To this distressing list may be added women with their families, who have followed their husbands to the place of embarkation, or who have come to visit them when there.

All these must be provided for by the parishes of such sea-ports, until their examinations are taken as to their different settlements.

This is the first and a very difficult step; for one half of the poor creatures who would wish to be removed, know no more about their husbands' or fathers' right of settlement, than the person who asks the question; whilst the other half, not wishing to be sent to their own parishes as paupers, contrive by every means to deceive.

After having made the necessary enquiries, by writing or otherwise, in this or that direction,—and in which it is as requisite to be as particular and cautious as if searching for the titles to an estate,—a clear settlement often appears to be made out, the paupers are forwarded to the place of destination, and the expence of conveyance and maintenance on the road is paid by the Overseers.

It is, however, two to one but a notice of appeal is given—something has occurred which was not known or could not be discovered, perhaps informality in the wording of the order, or what is worse than both, the paupers have been sent to the right parish; but a Township in that parish maintains its own poor, and the order should have been directed to the Overseers of such township.

This last calls loudly for some alteration, should nothing else be altered; the townships and parishes should be combined, or there should be a book printed by authority, stating the different hamlets, townships, or parishes who maintain their own poor.

No such book is extant; neither can Overseers by any means get at certain information on the subject; which is to be regretted more than any other defect in the Poor Laws; for in all cases parishes will and do take advantages of one another in this respect, urged on by their Solicitors, who are sure to gain by the contest.

It often happens, that rather than risk the enormous expenses of an appeal, distant as we are nearly fifty miles from the place where the Sessions for the County are held, this parish takes back paupers who do not belong to it; which circumstance is the more galling, inasmuch as the persons never resided in the parish, or ever did one act, by labour or otherwise, to benefit the town, but merely slept a night or two, on their transfer from the ship to the shore.

Two cases occurred lately, which will fully explain the above. William Johns, a seaman, was landed here ill; he was maintained a considerable time before his settlement could be found; when this was ascertained, a suspended order was made out, and he was kept in the Work-house on a charge of four shillings per week, until fit to be removed to the parish of Madran. On his arrival at Penzance, which is in the parish of Madran, the Overseers gave notice of appeal, the grounds of which were, that his settlement was in the township of Penzance. This case was settled, by sending a person to the spot, who arranged it, with the loss of the suspension and expenses.

The other case was that of J. Dunn and family, born and settled in the parish of Falmouth. He was also ill, and remained in the Work-house under a suspended order, till being removed, notice of appeal was received, at the same time stating that Dunn was born in the town of Falmouth, but that the township maintained its own poor. Expenses of settling this were paid by this parish, who lost the suspension.

Enough, one would suppose, has been said, to convince every mind, that sea-ports labour under disadvantages, as the Poor Laws now stand, and that something ought to be done to ameliorate their condition, and lessen, if possible, their burthen, by either establishing County Workhouses, and collecting an equitable Rate for their support; or by Government taking the whole under their superintendence, and collecting a Rate, in the manner the Assessed Taxes are now collected.

Lest that conviction should not be produced, the following case is added:—

A soldier, named Garland, returned from abroad a few months since, whose wife and child had been in the work-house eighteen years. On taking his examination, it appeared that he had previously gained a settlement in Whitechapel, by renting 12l. per annum; and also a subsequent settlement in Gosport, of which circumstances his wife was not aware.

Thus have this Parish expended (calculated at only four shillings per week each) 374l. 8s.; which expence ought to have been borne by some other. To add to the regret felt on the occasion, the child, at the proper age, was bound an apprentice, and gained a settlement under that binding, when the indenture was cancelled by the Magistrates, on the ground of his being non compos mentis; and consequently this Parish has to maintain him as long as he lives.

So much for paupers who come to sea ports, and perhaps only sleep a night or two in a town before they become chargeable.

One strong argument might be used to influence the Government to take the Poor under their own superintendence and management; which is, that, during the war, contracts were made at a time when beef was eight-pence or nine-pence per lb., to supply the prisoners at Dartmoor with provisions at $5\frac{1}{2}d.$ or $6d.$ per diem, say $3s. 6d.$ per week each—all of whom were strong, hale, young men, as it is usual to employ in the Navy. Our Workhouse contains at this moment nearly 900 souls, the expense of whom exceeds, at the best possible calculation, upwards of $5s.$ per week each, although the greater part of them are children, who cannot be supposed to require so much food; or they are old and impotent persons, whose appetites have decreased with their age.

To complete the contrast, this weekly expence continues at a time when beef is regularly sold in the market at $4\frac{1}{2}d.$, or at most $5d.$ per lb.

The same train of reasoning might be made use of, in support of the idea of having an equitable County Rate to defray the joint expences of County Workhouses; but it has this difference, that, under Government, Contractors are punctually paid by bills at ninety days: with those bills they go into the market, and are enabled to purchase and supply on the lowest terms possible.—This cannot be the case with County Clerks or County Overseers.

Another powerful reason, why the Poor should be placed under the especial care of Government, is, that the enormous expence of removals, with the disbursement for appeals, and law charges consequent thereon, would be entirely abolished.

All real cases of distress would meet prompt and ready assistance, without being bandied about like shuttlecocks for the profit and amusement of Lawyers.

A line of distinction would then be drawn between the real and necessitous Poor, and the idle and vagrant; and whilst the former would procure every requisite comfort and attention, the latter would receive the obloquy and punishment merited by their vices.

It is possible, some persons may, by an association of ideas not uncommon on such occasions, think that our own Poor ought to be fed better than French prisoners; and lest the motives of the writer may be misconstrued on the subject, the following scale of diet is added, by which it will appear, that the quantity of food served to the prisoners was considerably more than what is now issued to the Poor.

SCALE OF DIET.

Prisoners.		Poor.
Bread per week	10½ lbs.	Bread per week	5½ lbs.
Beef	2½	Beef	2
Potatoes	2	Potatoes	4
1½ lb. of other vegetables		Pease soup on Thursd.	1 quart to each ½ lb. beef, salt,		Meat soup 2 other do.	1 pint
onions, Scotch barley,		Milk broth, breakfast
&c. to make their soup.		and supper.

The bread for the Prisoners was made from whole wheaten meal; the bread for the poor from seconds;—say the latter worth $2s.$ per cwt. more than the former.

Public attention has of late been directed to the sums expended by Parishes in particular districts: the following is a pretty accurate account of Poor Rates and other local Taxes collected in this Parish, with the proportion it bears on the property, which is only leasehold, held (except two small estates) of Sir John St. Aubyn, and determinable on the death of three lives.

The assessment is made on one quarter of the Rack-Rent, taken about five years since; but in consequence of the great deterioration of property, may now be estimated at an average of one-third.

Poors' Rate from Michaelmas day last:—

ON HOUSES.

114 penny Rates, for 6 months, is	£0 19 0 per ann.
Streets lighting and watching	0 3 0 do.
Highway and Church Rates	0 1 2 do.
	£1 3 2

ON LANDS.

114 three halfpennies is	£1 8 6 per ann.
Streets lighting and watching	0 4 6 do.
Highway and Church Rates	0 1 9 do.

It must be observed, that the money collected for streets, watching, and highways, is but another name for Poor Rates; as the whole of the persons employed are Paupers belonging to the Parish.

No better idea can be formed of the increase of pauperism, than by shewing at one view the amount of the three last and the present assessments, the rates for which are always calculated by the expences of the preceding six months:—

First assessment for 6 months, 1816, 54 Rates,	£4301 18 6
Second do. do. 1816, 84 Rates,	6658 3 4
First assessment do. 1817, 96 Rates,	7569 0 0
Second do. do. 1817, 114 Rates,	9036 0 0

Thus are the Poor Rates more than doubled in a short space of time, amounting now to above eighteen thousand pounds per annum, whilst, within the same few months, all sorts of property have decreased more than one-half!

What are to become of us, Heaven alone knows! We are on the brink of an abyss, the ground of which crumbles under the feet of those whose misfortunes have impelled them nearest the edge;—every day we see one or other go off, the fall of whom only accelerates that of the next.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

NEXT to the avaricious and fatal mistake of building such large theatres, in which it is impossible for the spectators to see and hear, and the performers to act naturally, the greatest errors which the managers seem to commit are at Christmas time. They may feel the consequences less at that period for obvious reasons; and yet we suspect that even at that period they begin to feel them now, and that at Drury Lane in particular, such scanty Christmas audiences have seldom or never been witnessed. Misfortune as well as other causes keep some part of them away, and have instinctively put the others above the intellectual pitch of their entertainers.

First, for instance, comes the half-witted tragedy of George Barnwell, in which prostitutes are held up to detestation, and young men are warned how they kill their good old uncles for the sake of that all-precious and all-worthy commodity, money. Here the question is begged, as usual, in behalf of some of the most pernicious mistakes of society; a money-getter is made a virtuous man, and a victim of some other customs is made a wicked woman; that is to say, virtue is put on the side of the artificial and selfish appetites, and wickedness on that of the natural and social ones. We do not deny that virtue and vice are sometimes to be found where they say they are, and that a female who is made the victim of the perfidy of the other sex, or of a bad education, is likely to be embittered and hardened into a very vicious person; but we say, that vice and virtue are to be found also in very different places; that true morality goes to first as well as to fourth or fifth causes, as in the plot and all the sentiments of that divine tragedy King Lear, and indeed in SHAKESPEARE throughout; and that it is perfectly disgusting to see questions eternally begged in this manner against a sex, who are first made the dupes and victims of the bad habits and partial institutions of the other, and then held up by the old sinners as a warning to the young ones.

The next error which the Managers commit is in getting up new pieces of unestablished merit, instead of old ones; as if the Christmas audiences were made up of frequenters of the theatres, and would not be more taken with a fine old deep or gorgeous tragedy, that goes truly to the first feelings of their nature. We knew an old servant who had once seen Alexander the Great, or the Rival Queens. The Rival Queens!—think of that for all the earnest holiday maidservants and their sweet-hearts. You might have told our old acquaintance of fifty new plays; but her head always ran on “the Rival Queens;” and whenever she had a treat to the play, she was always sorry that it was not the Rival Queens. “Dear me! When will they do Alexander the Great, or the Rival Queens?”—Now there are many plays superior to this in point of moral instruction as well as in poetry, though lofty NAT. LEE was no mean person; but we mention the circumstance, to shew how little mere novelty has to do with the matter.

In pantomime, however, novelty has a great deal to do; and yet in this department, great tendency has been shewn of late years to repeat the old jokes; and the present pantomime of Drury-lane, Harlequin's Visions, or the Feast of the Statue, fastening itself by the way upon the story and not the music of an attractive opera, which story has been exhausted at all ends of the town, is decidedly the worst and dullest we ever saw. We never witnessed a tragic-comic non-descript, so “incapable of it's own distress,” or of it's mirth either. First there is a view of hell-fire, “which dies not,” (another amiable moral warning, we suppose, for the holiday folks), but which is discreetly shoved off upon the Pagan religion. Proserpine wants the soul of Don Juan to wait on her, and so he is to go through a series of wicked actions to gratify her Infernal Majesty,—very properly, as some theologians must think,—very shockingly, as many others think now-a-days. This idea might serve for good and useful reflection, were it possible to find out whether the pantomimist is joking or not. Perhaps he has hampered himself on this score between his intentions and other circumstances; and if so, is much to be pitied as far as theatrical success goes, though not perhaps inasmuch as the feelings with which the audience go away must infallibly be to the disadvantage of what a humane man would wish to bring into ridicule. If he had no other object than that of a sort of parody on Don Juan, it is not a happy one. Don Juan's mistresses are very insipid as well as low; and the Ghost is at one minute very ghostly indeed, and powerful, and alarming; walks on the water, and “rides the storm” on horseback; and at the next plays tricks with the Clown, and walks off surreptitiously with a beef-steak. The scene in which he appears on stilts, and stumps to and fro for a little space, rapping the guests on the head with a great ladle, is prodigiously tame and gratuitous. The best, which is indeed an excellent one, is the storm at sea, the tossing of the Clown about it, and his narrow escape from the fate of JONAH. The weltering of the waves is uncommonly well managed, and would be perfect if there were something of a little rim or pier on the side next the audience, to render the edge of them less abrupt and stationary.

The Covent Garden pantomime, Harlequin Gulliver, or the Flying Island, is much better;—and the scenery very beautiful. It is founded on Gulliver's Travels. The island of Laputa comes sailing through the air, and takes up by a ladder an English sailor, who runs away with a fair captive in possession of the king,—the king and his chancellor afterwards becoming Pantaloon and Clown, and the sailor and his mistress Harlequin and Columbine. The Laputians are a very queer old womanish sort of people, with long monstrous faces, and a hopping gait. The lovers fly from them into Liliput, where the little men and women are well performed by boys and girls; which, by the way, may be tolerated in an occasional pantomime; but to make children act in plays, as it has lately been attempted to do again, and to bring them in general on the stage, is what we always protested against, and always shall, as a thing in its nature incompetent to the task required, and above all, extremely hurtful to the health, simplicity, and present if not future happiness of the children. It is destroying all the unconsciousness and best bloom of their time of life. The Brobdingnagians are excellently managed by men built up into huge dolls, at least quite as well as it appears possible to manage them, unless perhaps the men could be placed at the top part of the figure instead of below, so as to move the arms better. But their good-natured huge faces are quite taking, though not altogether so intelligent as they appear in SWIFT. The scene in which the lovers first make their appearance in Brobdingnag, is the corn-fields mentioned in Gulliver; and the enormous golden corn cuts a beautiful magnificent figure, and makes us see for an instant as we may suppose insects to see; who, if they do so, must live in a glorious world indeed, of colours, and shapes, and over-topping splendours. It is almost impossible indeed for a spectator of this pantomime not to feel the best part of the lesson which is read us in Gulliver, and see how comparative things are, and how little human nature has to value itself exclusively. The astonishment of the Laputians at what appear to them our ugly face and manners; the pride and passions of the little Liliputians; the gentleness and beauty of the huge Brobdingnagians in spite of the coarse detail perceptible to minuter eyes; the smallness or largeness of ourselves, in proportion as we are measured with others; and the magnificent size as well as shape and colour of the commonest vegetables and weeds, when our sight is reduced to that of millions and millions of living creatures,—all help to impress upon us a strong sense of the force of ideas and of circumstances, to abate pride and exclusiveness of every sort, and to open our eyes to those infinite treasures, beauties, and blessings of Nature, which are not to be found in poetry alone, though poetry unfortunately is almost the only thing that finds them.

FINE ARTS.

MR. WEST'S DEATH ON THE PALE HORSE.

PRIORITY of praise is justly given to the sublime in Art, as it is a rarer because a more difficult reach of excellence—a difficulty chiefly arising perhaps from the sublime being further removed than other qualities from accustomed thoughts, objects, and impressions. Mr. WEST has in this entirely new subject on canvas, in part obtained such praise. It is, to a certain degree, a painting of the “terrible sublime,” and we think it must be so regarded by the greatest admirers of the unrivalled Italians. But we are nevertheless of opinion, that this novel and grand subject is capable of producing a more unmixed praise than that which it here so meritedly obtains from a crouching public. It is a subject which has never yet appeared on canvas, though it is essentially the same with many previous paintings: we shall in consequence consider its comparative merits and defects, both as to its execution and adoption as a painting. The ideal being called Death, the mighty power of destruction, or more philosophically speaking, of decomposition, “that walketh in darkness and wasteth at noon-day” unseen, is of a nature essentially the same in its abstraction and invisibility as Time, Virtue, Deity, &c., which have often been represented by substantial forms in Sculpture, and by lines and colours in Painting, though we think in most instances with much absurdity, if not in all, however mixed with the beautiful and the fanciful in shape, hue, and action, and however sanctioned by custom, by the practice and the talents of genius and of antiquity. To represent that to the eye, which has no visible existence, and which is never seen but in its effects, is an impossibility, and therefore absurd; for at best it will never in fact be any other than a portrait of something on earth, with its familiar limited powers of bodily action. In other words, it will be nothing but a representation of objects, which the being intended to be represented acts upon, and consequently no representation of the acting being itself. The figure of Deity will be nothing more than a venerable or powerful or placid man—a degradation of Deity, conveying an idea infinitely below what the imagination raises, not only as conveyed through the comprehensive and unequalled medium of poetry, but even through the humbler medium of a common intellect. The figure of Death, insubstantial and incorporeal, will be only a substantial falsehood, a painted incongruity. In endeavouring to paint that kind of subject, which is thus in fact unpaintable, Mr. West has, however, followed very grave authorities; and the only questions of critical solution on this head, which we shall now consider, are, Has he done it in the best possible way? A reference to MILTON's Death, in his Paradise Lost, and, above all, to Common Sense, that best arbiter frequently in cases that are often purposely involved and surrounded with false importance,—like lawyers in huge ugly wigs and solemn robes,—will answer these questions. MILTON, describing Death as seen by Satan, calls him “the grisly Terror,” “grim Death,” the “execrable Shape,” the “Goblin;” and after personifying Sin and speaking of Death, says,—

“The other Shape,
If Shape it might be call'd that Shape had none
Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb,
Or Substance might be called that Shadow seem'd;
For each seem'd either; black it stood as night,
Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a dreadful dart; what seem'd his head
The likeness of a kingly crown had on.”

This most poetical description is not only poetical, but homogeneous with the feelings and conceptions of us all respecting Death. It is a picture of an indistinct object, a Shadow rather than a Substance, arm'd, “black as night,” “fierce,” and “terrible,” with the indication rather than the reality of a crown on what “seem'd his head.” Indistinctness, ugliness, and terrific power, then, are the true properties to be exhibited in a portrait of Death; and surely these, under the hands of a painter of a vigorous and inventive fancy, might be rendered on canvas in a degree sufficient to excite a mysterious feeling, and present an object shadowy, yet armed with power; grisly or ugly, yet without being either caricature, or the common-place Death's head from the charnel-house. The smoke or cloud that might thinly shroud this “grisly terror,” and which might naturally accompany the stream of fire and smoke, with which Mr. West has judiciously enveloped the Fiends in the train of Death, would facilitate this representation of horrid indistinctness, and, incomplete and unsatisfactory as it still would be, however admirably managed, the Pale Horse, and He that sat upon him, would be recognised as more adequate and poetical portraits of a poetical subject. “Such indistinctness would not,” as the Descriptive Catalogue asserts, “be a defect, and imply that the Artist wanted the power to pourtray the conceptions of his fancy.” On the contrary, we conceive that the reverse would obtain, and that to give a palpable and well-known form to that which is essentially obscure and dimly seen, especially when it may be thus dimly seen in picture, is a defect and want of power in the Artist. The obscurity gives it an increased horror, inasmuch as it approximates it to what is supernatural and spiritual, and takes from it the finiteness and feebleness of mortality, of mere bones and muscles—those bones and muscles which it is no difficult thing for an able and long-practised painter to describe. The fiery darts issuing from such a dread, mysterious being, would carry with them more appalling fear, would be barbed with a livelier horror to the spectator, than those which were launched with distinctly seen and skeleton or muscular hands. To the passage in the picture where the infernal crew are following Death, the Painter has given a hideousness of visage and form, that reminds us at a glance of the text from which they are described,—“and Hell followed with him.” But though we thus differ from the highly accomplished Artist in his conspicuously-rendering of the figure of Death, we still admire it as a figure that pourtrays a terrific and wide-wasting power. It is a being that appears to preside over and to influence all the agents of destruction. If the fiat of Deity, unaccompanied with visible action, is indisputably the sublimest attestation of Divine Power,—“He spake and it was done,”—there is a fierceness of action and look, which, on the other hand, is grandly expressive of the immense and destroying energies of inferior, and especially of evil beings. So MILTON himself describes Death,—

“He shook a dreadful dart.”

The group of figures in white that are seen through a cloud, injure, by its spottiness, the solemn tone which the picture would otherwise have. They have too a weak effect, from the diminutiveness of their size, owing to the cloud which surrounds them standing before the smoke which envelopes the demons at no great distance from the front, and which brings them before those objects of a size ludicrously Lilliputian. This group represents “the souls of them which were slain for the word of God,” and is the opening of the fifth Seal in the Revelations. We think that the picture would be improved by its erasure, especially as it is more of an appendage than an essential to the main incidents. The other superhuman beings described are the Riders on the White, Red, and Black Horses. The first is described in the Scripture as having a bow, and that a crown was given unto him, and “he went forth conquering and to conquer.” Here is a dignity and power that we do not at all recognize in the pictured figure; but the Horse is beautiful and Grecian, as is the contiguous one, the Red Horse. Their particular look and action remind us of those passages in the highly poetical description of the Horse in the Book of Job:—“He rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men: he mocketh at fear and is not affrighted, neither turneth he back from the sword: he saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battel a far off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.” The Pale Horse, too, brings to our recollection that other glowing passage,—“The glory of his nostrils is terrible.”—Indeed, Mr. West, in all the Horses in this picture, shews that he is feelingly sensitive to the beauties of Grecian Art, as seen in those glorious fragments, the Phidian Marbles, brought to England by Lord ELGIN. The Rider on the Black Horse has that look of firmness and sedateness, which is consonant to the character and circumstances he may be conceived to allegorize by the scales in his hand. All the other groups represent the inflictions of the power given to Death “over the four parts of the earth, to kill with sword, with hunger, with death, and with the beasts of the earth.” If our opinions or feelings, while we view these groups, may be credited, the power of the great and dreaded Destroyer has, in Mr. West's pencil, a potent delineator. For whatever the deficiencies may be, each of these groups tell touchingly on the soul, and consequently their connected force is intense on the feelings. “The gay licentious proud” might here for a time become strangely acquainted with thoughts of sympathy, and feel a thaw in their hearts from the glowing genius before them. Death, with his spiral crown, his agitated hair, and serpent-entwined arm, a scriptural allusion to the origin of Death, seems to be advancing like a black wave, to overwhelm

"This vital world, this house of happy spirits;"— to strike into all hearts

"A deep and sickening dread;"— to infix "savage pains," and to wither the principle of life with a look. His Horse, too, exhaling as he does a livid pestilence, and with his terror-streaming hair, has a dread look, and a rapidity and impetuosity of action symbolical of the irresistible and universal progress of the Mighty Power he conveys. The figures of Famine and Despair thrill in our nerves, not so much from their cadaverous, gaunt, and shrivelled bodies, as from their deep abstraction from the moral and physical tempest that raves around them, and that forms even a more pathetic contrast to the family group of affection, innocence, and beauty, that has just fallen under the Destroyer's hand, than even the groups of graceful and vigorous youths and men, who are grappling with the more successful strength of fiercest animals, or who are struck with the thunderbolt. But these latter passages, feeling and science both tell us are grandly effective. The conflict is dire. It is the discord of immense and conflicting physical and moral power, of mental rage and stupendous bodily strength. This is the governing impression made by the subject, and the style with which it is given by our venerable Artist. This is what makes its way to our bosoms, in spite of whatever errors the canvas may display.

For the arrangement of the parts in groups, singly, and together,—a part of painting for which the President has always been admired,—he obtains our unqualified praise. For the general, and in some instances detached colouring, he has the praise of an enlarged intelligence. The Romans, under Titus, returning with the spoils of Jerusalem, and the Crusaders contending with the Saracens, are well-conceived and suitable adjuncts to the main and foreground scene, and so is the dove deploring its stricken mate. These unite in completing the idea of universal desolation by death, producing the emotions of pity and terror. This idea strikes on our feelings at the first sight of this great work, with an interest that can arise only from its having issued from a mind glowingly impressed by its subject, in the powerful and particular view it has taken of it. We continue to look at it with unabated earnestness. We steadily contemplate each separate part; and having gone through the whole, we go over it again. We repeat the inspection again and again. We walk away from it lingeringly and ruminating. We talk of it among our friends with earnestness, and think of it when alone.

CASTS FROM THE ELGIN MARBLES.—A set of casts from the Elgin marbles are to be immediately prepared for the Imperial Academy of Arts at Petersburg, under the direction and superintendence of Mr. Haydon, to whom M. M. OLENIN, the President, has written in the most flattering terms for that purpose. M. OLENIN has also, as a mark of his estimation for Mr. HAYDON's talents, presented him, for his own private study, with some casts from the Imperial collection of a bust of Achilles, a beautiful statue of Venus, and one of Silenus, which are considered as the finest things in the collection of the Emperor. M. M. OLENIN concludes his letter, so honourable to Mr. HAYDON, by hoping that the correspondence thus begun will not end, and that "Mr. HAYDON will continue it for the benefit of the arts in Russia." It is remarkable, that while Mr. HAYDON is held in such just estimation on the Continent, he seems to be systematically opposed by the Royal Academy of England, though that Institution was created for the express purpose of establishing those very principles of Art they now do their utmost to thwart.

It appears therefore that

The Total Net Revenue for the year 1816 was	£57,360,694
Ditto, for 1817	47,277,450

Diminution in the last year, as compared with the year preceding	£10,083,244
--	-------------

But from this deficiency must be deducted the difference of the sums received on account of the Property Tax in the above two years, that for 1816 being above 11,000,000*l.*—ditto, for 1817, above 1,000,000*l.*, the exact difference has been

9,917,086

Reduction of remaining branches of Revenue in the last year	£ 166,158

Upon this subject the Courier says:—"We must congratulate the Public on the improvement which it exhibits in every branch almost of the Revenue. In the Customs, under the head of Consolidated Fund, there is an improvement in the whole year of more than 1,910,000*l.* and in the Quarter just ended, over the corresponding Quarter, of 1,141,000*l.* In the Customs, under the head of Annual Duties, to pay off bills, there is an improvement in the whole year of 478,000*l.* though the last Quarter is less than the corresponding Quarter. The Excise (Consolidated Fund) presents a diminution which is easily to be accounted for, upon the whole year, but the last Quarter is better than the corresponding Quarter. The Stamps give us an excess of 368,000*l.* upon the Year, and of 100,000*l.* upon the Quarter. The Assessed Taxes an excess of 344,000*l.* on the Year, and above 126,000*l.* upon the Quarter. The Land Taxes and Miscellaneous have increased; and though the Unappropriated War Duties are less, as was to be expected, last Quarter than in the corresponding Quarter, they afford upon the whole Year an excess of 678,000*l.*—Thus the total Consolidated Fund is upon the whole year better by above two millions than it was the year before, and the excess in the last Quarter is 1,369,000*l.* beyond the corresponding Quarter last year. If we add the Annual Duties, a great improvement will be found in them upon the whole year's receipt, and upon the last Quarter—2,200,000*l.* upon the former, and 752,000*l.* upon the latter. In the War Taxes there is a great diminution, and for a very obvious reason, that the War Customs have been taken off, the War Excise reduced, and the Property Tax abolished. They produced in the year ended 5th January, 1817, 16,656,000*l.* (the Property Tax alone produced 11,185,000*l.* of that sum) and in the year ended 5th January, 1818, only 4,364,100*l.* a difference of 12,291,000*l.* In the Quarter which ended on the 5th January, 1817, the Property Tax arrears produced 1,292,000*l.* and in the last Quarter only 389,000*l.*; yet, with all these diminutions, the total net Revenue for the last Quarter was only 164,000*l.* lower than the Quarter last year. The total net Revenue for the year is less than the net Revenue for the year ending on the 5th of January, 1817, by 10,083,000*l.* because War Taxes had been taken off, which, as we have already shewn, produced above twelve millions more than they did in the year just expired. Had they been to be added to this year, they would have made the Revenue above 59,500,000*l.* or above two millions more than the Revenue of the year which expired on the 5th of January, 1817. This, then, we say, is a cheering statement, upon which we shall take leave to congratulate the Government and the country. The charge upon the Consolidated Fund for this Quarter is 13,200,000*l.*; about 1,280,000*l.* beyond the amount of the Quarter's Consolidated Fund revenue."

The Times, on the other hand, makes the following reflections:—"But the true question for the country to consider is, how stands the proportion between the receipt and the expenditure? The total expenditure was estimated by the Finance Committee at above sixty-five millions in round numbers—the Revenue, we find, is above forty-seven millions—there remains, therefore, a deficiency to be provided for of about eighteen millions sterling per annum. The Irish Revenue is reckoned on by the Ministerial Papers, as going some length towards the supply of that formidable deficiency. We are yet unprepared to say how far we can place confidence in such an expectation, bearing in mind the deplorable condition of the Irish Treasury for some years past. But take the net receipts from that country at four millions, there will remain an excess of expenditure above income in this, the third year of a general Peace, to the amount of 14,000,000*l.* sterling! Most gratifying to us will be any well-founded explanation which can shew the necessity for a reduction of our national expences to be less urgent and forcible than this brief comparison has made it."

MELANCHOLY EVENT.

The tranquillity of a family of respectability, near Manchester-square, a few days since experienced interruption by an attempt of one of its members to put end to her existence, and by the sudden disappearance of another, a young Gentleman. The young Lady is a native of Lincolnshire, where her father was an opulent landholder. About eight years ago she had the misfortune to lose both her parents within a few weeks of each other; she was then 15 years of age, and her aunt, a widow Lady, took her to her house. The only son of her aunt at that time returned from Ireland, and an attachment was soon perceptible between them. This was sanctioned by the mother, and they were about to be united, when the match was broken off by an uncle of the young Gentleman, from whom he had considerable expectations. The intended bridegroom, almost distracted, purchased a commission in the army, and remained abroad until after the Battle of Waterloo. His attachment continued, and they only waited for some favourable event to bring about their union. The uncle, however, continued inexorable; but this obstacle was about three months ago removed by his death. By this event considerable property devolved to the young Gentleman, and his marriage was to take place at as early a period as decency would permit. This, however, was suddenly stopped by the young Gentleman himself, who to his mother declared that circumstances had arisen which rendered a marriage with his cousin utterly impossible; but the urgent entreaties of his mother failed to draw from him the cause of this extraordinary change. He could only say, that such a change had actually taken place, and desired that his cousin might be made acquainted with it. His mother disclosed this in the most cautious manner; but it had such an effect upon her niece, as for several hours to deprive her of sense. She continued in a desponding state until Friday week, when the aunt, fearing, from the length of time her niece remained absent, that she was worse, proceeded to her room, and found her suspended from one of the bed-posts. Harrowed as her feelings were, she had firmness sufficient to catch her niece in her arms, and hold her up until her cries brought others into the room, and the young Lady was cut down; and, by medical aid, animation was restored. The unfortunate girl has, however, since continued in a state the most melancholy. On Monday last a letter was received by the twopenny post from the young Gentleman, expressing the deepest regret for the distress of which he had been the cause. He concluded by stating his determination to quit the country for ever. Arrangements had been made with the persons in whose hands the greatest part of his property is invested, for a regular remittance of cash to a house at Paris. This information, it is hoped, will lead to a discovery of his retreat, and be the means of restoring him to his distracted parent and sisters.

MENDICANT SAILORS.

On Monday there was another Meeting at the City of London Tavern, to take into consideration the wretched situation of numerous seafaring men, now in the streets of the metropolis.

Mr. WILBERFORCE was called to the Chair, and opened the proceedings by stating that the object of this Meeting was known to all who walked the streets of this metropolis, as well as the necessity of devising some mode of immediate relief for a hardy and most valuable order of men, many hundreds of whom had gallantly fought the battles of their country in the late eventful war. Owing to the termination of that war, and the present state of our naval commerce, they were thrown out of employment, and had been long reduced to the necessity of begging through the streets for the means of prolonging their existence, reduced to nakedness and famine, and exposed to all the inclemencies of the season. This could not fail to bring their case home to the feelings of every British heart; for of all the claims of mendicity none were more peculiarly attractive to the sensations of benevolence. He felt it unnecessary, therefore, to detain the Meeting by details too obvious to require explanation; and therefore he would read the first of the Resolutions intended to be proposed to the Meeting. He then read the Resolution, which was merely declaratory of the general and most distressing state of mendicity in this metropolis at the present moment, and more especially with regard to distressed Seamen, which peculiarly called for speedy relief.—The Resolution being seconded,

Mr. BUCKLE rose to ask, as well for his own information as that of several other Gentlemen present, whether the object of the subscription now intended, was for the general relief of mendicity, or to be conferred particularly on Seamen?

Mr. ROWCROFT said, the best principle to pursue, on this occasion, was divide and conquer. Distress amongst the poor was very general, and most deplorable. The purpose announced for this day's Meeting was merely confined to Mendicant Seamen, and that was quite enough at once to occupy the consideration of the assembly, and would give quite occupation enough to the Committee, who had been some time engaged in measures for so laudable a purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS stated, that he himself, as the Proxy of the Committee, had waited on the First Lord of the Admiralty, to submit the object in view for the relief of those unfortunate men, and intreated the co-operation of the Lords of the Admiralty in a purpose so truly desirable; and he had the pleasure to acquaint the Meeting of the prompt and humane attention of that Nobleman, and the Board at which he presided, and of their assurance of every co-operation that could reasonably be expected from the Admiralty with the objects of the Committee; that they were ready to assign a frigate for the reception of those unfortunate men, and to afford them relief by clothing and food, until means might be found of procuring employment for such as were able seamen, and otherwise disposing of those who, from years, infirmities, or incompetency, could not be employed. Mr. Stephens read to the Meeting the letter he had received from Mr. Secretary Croker, confirmatory to this purpose.

Sir J. Shaw being called on to detail the result of those measures adopted, about two years since, for the same purpose, said, that on that occasion the Lords of the Admiralty had given to the Committee their most prompt co-operation, in appointing a ship for the reception of distressed seamen; and that all who were found in the streets were sent on board by the Lord Mayor; they were clothed from the Government stores, fed, and fitted for service on board merchant ships. All foreign seamen were placed under the protection of their respective Consuls, to be returned to their several countries. The men of colour were sent either to Sierra Leone, or the West India Plantations. Such British seamen as could not procure employment in London, were passed to their respective outports, or inland parishes; and the streets were effectually cleared of mendicant seamen. He could not tell how so many of them had returned again to crowd the streets; but he understood it was because most of them preferred a life of mendicancy to work, and that most of them had sold the money they had received, and again returned to the streets. The Receiving-ship, however, had since been unemployed, and was now at Deptford; but he was sure the Admiralty would be ready to do their duty, and would receive every aid from the Navy Department. It only required the Magistrates and Parish Officers to co-operate in doing their duty, by clearing the streets of these men; and disposing of them as before; that the streets would thereby be cleared—the real seamen would be selected from impostors, and provided for—and that without the necessity of subscribing a single shilling at this Meeting.

Lieutenant GORDON and a GENTLEMAN who had been a Captain in the India service, drew a deplorable picture of the distress, the nakedness, the misery, sickness, and famine, which at present universally prevail in the quarters where those wretched men chiefly frequent. They both were convinced, from strict personal examination, that much the greater number of those Mendicant Seamen were not impostors, but meritorious men, whom nothing but the bitterest misery could force to beg—men who had fought the battles and bled in the cause of their country; but worn out in the service, and worn with age, Captains fitting out ships rejected them, preferring young and able men. But they were sure that many who were rejected for want of decent apparel, might procure employment if they were provided in that respect; and they warmly approved the subscription.

Lord COCHRANE spoke in favour of the subscription; but said Government had it in their power to afford them effectual relief by appropriating to the purpose the Droits of Admiralty. The Noble Lord was proceeding to some length, but was interrupted by a cry of "No Politics! No Politics!"

Mr. STEPHENS doubted the statement of Alderman Sir J. Shaw, and said it was opposed by facts hourly, palpable to every man's observation.

Mr. ROWCROFT concluded the Debate, by earnestly deprecating the mixture of political with charitable feelings, which had so frequently been introduced in that room, to the defeat of purposes the most benevolent.—He totally denied that the Magistrates of the City of London were competent to remove, by all their activity, the evil complained of.

The Resolutions were all carried;—a Committee of Merchants and Members of Parliament was then chosen, and a subscription entered into, and placed at the disposal of the Committee.

MENDICITY.

On Thursday a Meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for the purpose of adopting certain Resolutions, appointing a Committee, and entering into a subscription for the purpose of clearing the streets of the metropolis of the immense number of Mendicant Poor who hourly infest the streets.

Mr. WILLIAMS (being voted Chairman) stated the object of the Meeting.

Mr. MARTEN said, a Resolution had been put into his hand, which he begged leave to read to them. The substance of it was, that Mendicity had become so prevalent and alarming, that it was a duty incumbent on them to mitigate the evils of it. In offering this Resolution to their attention, he was sure there needed not much argument to impress upon the minds of a benevolent British Public, the great necessity of alleviating the distresses of those miserable objects, whom they could not fail to meet at every turning of the streets. His experience had taught him, that, although many were impostors among the thousands who presented themselves as objects of distress, yet by far the greater part were paupers, some of whom died for want, and most of whom, for the want of the necessities of life, had their days prematurely shortened. Certainly a great deal of artifice was used by some paupers, and it was much to be regretted, as it tended very much to steel the hearts of the loveliest part of the creation against their necessities.—Their principal object now was to appoint a Committee for the suppression of Mendicity; and it would be one province of that Committee to make very nice distinctions.—The Poor were either parochial or non-parochial, and the greater part of the mendicants in the Metropolis belonged to some of the parishes in it. Those would, therefore, be sent to their parishes without difficulty, and thus two-thirds of the poor in the streets would be got rid of; those whose parishes were in the country would require greater discrimination, and that would be the duty and province of the Committee. There was a third set; those who had no regular parishes, and those who were foreigners. The non-parochial poor were therefore Irish, Scotch, and foreigners. The Irish must be assisted in getting home to their own country; because it would be hard on Ireland to burden her with the removal of her own poor. The Scotch were few, and those would be sent for relief to the Scottish Society; and the foreigners would be sent home by arrangements to be made with their Consuls. No doubt, if the Committee acted in co-operation with the Parish Officers, &c. much good might be done. He needed not to harrow up their feelings by tales of distress; but however much the practice of giving alms in the streets was to be deprecated, still it was certain that many of those unfortunate objects were in that state of distress, that if they did not receive alms to-day, they must die to-morrow. Parish Officers could in most instances apply but a tardy relief to their sufferings, as, after their return home for relaxation from business, their doors were besieged by the poor, to whom they could not attend so as to afford relief to all. He trusted, therefore, that the Meeting would be ready to support the Committee, in giving aid to the poor, and by so doing enable us to get rid of the greatest part of them.

Mr. HARRISON seconded the Resolution, which was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. HOME said, it was, in his opinion, impossible that any plan could be agreed upon at once, in an evil so general, so as to afford complete relief; but all must agree that a remedy of some kind was necessary. He was of opinion that the institutions and funds of this country were sufficient to relieve the poor, if, by a division of labour, we were enabled accurately to examine and discriminate among the objects who should present themselves for relief. This was to be done by Sub-committees, established in the different parishes, acting in concert with parish officers. The mover of the first Resolution had not noticed the Lascars who were left destitute in the streets. No European was authorized to bring an Asiatic to this country from the India Company's settlements, without entering into a bond of 1000 rupees for each individual, that proper care should be taken of him while in England; and that he should be sent back to his own country. One important duty of the Committee would be, to send these unfortunate men to the Company's depot, from whence to be carried home. Another class of Poor, more distressed than all, was the Africans. If the Society opened a communication with the African Institution, he was certain that the latter would open an asylum for those unfortunate men, and find the means of returning them to their own country. Part of the duty of the Committee would be to pass seamen, when they found any such, to the Society for the Relief of Distressed Seamen. Soldiers were found begging, many of them holding pensions from Government of from 10*l.* to 14*l.* a year. It would be a consideration of the Committee to add to that, in order to prevent their begging; and he was convinced, that if application was made to the Duke of York, some deserted barracks would be given for their reception. Thus they would get rid of much of the misery they now saw around them. But it was impossible that these things could be done without Local Committees, communicating with the general one. He then moved an amendment, that a Society be formed, to be called "The Society for Suppressing Mendicity." He trusted that the public Papers, so forward in promoting charitable purposes, would lose no time in giving full publicity to the laudable objects of this Society.

The motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. TOOKER moved a Resolution for the appointment of a Committee to issue tickets to Subscribers, to be given by them to Mendicants; which, he explained, were to be presented by them to the Sub-Committees, by whom the claims of the applicants for relief would be investigated. Subscribers might therefore give these tickets, instead of eleemosynary pence, to the poor, which were too often spent in debauchery. For his own part he anticipated from this plan the most complete success.

This Resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. FENNORD cordially agreed with the object of the Meeting. Society had been compared to a pyramid, of which the lower order was the base. If that was once weakened, the higher orders could not be safe. When they next met, he hoped that they would find some good had been done for the miserable objects they met in every street.—He had just been told by a Magistrate, that at the approaching Sessions for the County, between 3 and 400 wretches might be expected to be discharged, without the means of gaining livelihoods. He hoped the Committee would take that into its earliest consideration.

Thanks were then moved to the Chairman, and the Meeting adjourned.

POLICE.

DOW-STREET.

Mr. Mathews, the celebrated comedian, was charged with having used threatening language to Mr. G. S. Ford, of Lincoln's Inn, to induce him to commit a breach of the peace. It appears, that Mr. M. has of late been exercising his professional talents in France; and during his stay there, Mr. F. incurred his displeasure by some proceeding in Mr. M.'s house. On Mr. M.'s return, he went to Mr. F.'s office, accompanied by a friend, and in demanding satisfaction, called him a villain and a scoundrel. Mr. Mathews admitted that he had used the words; but said, the conduct of Mr. F. had richly merited language of the most degrading nature; and that he was determined to apply it to him wherever he met him.—The Magistrate thought such menaces might ultimately lead to a breach of the peace; and directed Mr. Mathews to find bail, himself in 100*l.* and two sureties in 50*l.* each; which he immediately did.

MANSION-HOUSE.

A middle-aged female was on Wednesday charged with creating a disturbance in the house of a gentleman of fortune, residing in the City. The woman, about 13 years ago, became acquainted with the complainant, and an illicit connexion ensued, the effects of which was the birth of a female child. The child remained with the mother until it was five years old; when the father took her, and has since educated her in the first style. He allowed the mother 20*l.* a-year, on condition that she should keep apart from her daughter, as he did not wish the latter to be acquainted with her origin. She, however, came a few days since to his house, insisted upon seeing the child, and on being refused, became excessively riotous; and he could not make her quit the house until he sent for an Officer. He was willing to continue the annuity as long as she lived, provided she would keep away from the child; and he wished much that she would return to her native country (Ireland), and remain there. The mother then said she would go to Ireland immediately, if the complainant would permit her to have an interview with her daughter. This request, however, was refused by the father; upon the ground that an interview would only add to the grief of the mother and distress the feelings of the child. It was then arranged that the mother should besent with an Officer to Liverpool, to embark for Ireland; with directions to pay her every attention on the road; and to this was added an order of rather an extraordinary nature: namely, that he should bring from the Captain of the vessel, in which she was to sail, a written receipt for the body of the woman!

QUEEN-SQUARE.

CASE OF CRUELTY.—Mr. Lockyer, an Overseer of St. Luke, Chelsea, applied on Monday to the Sitting Magistrate for his advice and authority how to act under the following circumstances:—Witness stated, that about five o'clock on Saturday evening he had received information as to the ill usage of the child which he had caused to be brought into Court. On going to the father's house on Millbank, to inquire for it, he found that the nurse who was attending the child's mother in her present lying-in, had carried the child to the workhouse. When he went thither, he found it in the state it now appeared in, or rather worse, because he had sent for surgical aid, which had somewhat assuaged the appearance of its wound, and the child had also been washed, and rendered more cleanly, since its admission into the workhouse. He had been extremely shocked at seeing such a poor human creature reduced to so miserable a state, at the tender age of only five years, and had given orders to have every care taken of it until it should be perfectly recovered; but the father, who was then in Court, had come to the workhouse and demanded to have the child; and it was to know whether the Magistrate would allow the father to take it away, or would authorise him to keep it in the house until it should be cured, that he made the present application. The Magistrate commended Mr. Lockyer very highly for his humane conduct, and ordered the child to be delivered to his care till cured.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR.—While passing through a certain town, about five miles from London, a few days since, I observed the following shameful instance of that want of true feeling towards our fellow-creature, so often remarked in your paper:—I saw, Mr. Examiner, a poor starved miserable woman (or rather the shadow of a woman) carried in an open chair, * and protected by an "official workhouse-animal," but she had no covering to protect her from the snow, which drove in torrents, upon a countenance interesting and respectable. Could they find no means to hide her from the public gaze, and shield her from the storm? Surely the frozen element might have taught them sensibility; it melted at the sight.—I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,

Dec. 5, 1817.

G. B.—N.

* I have heard, Mr. Examiner, of a sedan chair, but I suppose that is a luxury for the rich.

Numerous robberies have lately been committed in Hyde Park, and in the neighbourhood of the Regent's Park, by a gang of fellows, who assemble before the watchmen commence duty. On Friday se'nnight between six and seven, the following robberies were committed in Hyde Park:—P. Townsend, Esq. of Wigmore-street, returning from Brompton, was accosted by a sturdy looking fellow in a sailor's dress, who, in an insolent tone, solicited alms. Mr. T. refused and hurried on, upon which the villain set up a loud whistle, and in a moment the former was surrounded by seven men, who plundered him of his watch and about 18*l.* and afterwards beat him in a most severe manner. He lay for some time senseless, and on recovering with much difficulty reached home.—Mr. Jemmett, draper, of Oxford-street, experienced a similar attack about the same time. He was passing near the Basin when three men rushed out from beneath the wall, and rifled his pockets of three 1*l.* notes, and a check for 19*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* upon a Country bank. One of them produced a pistol, with which he threatened to shoot Mr. J. if he made any alarm, and followed him a considerable distance with the same threats.—Two young Gentlemen were stopped just within the gate at Hyde Park Corner, and plundered of every thing they had about them. The robbers offered them no violence.—The same evening, about five o'clock, as Mr. A. Sermon, of Quebec-street, and his son, about 12 years of age, were going along the foot of Primrose-hill, two men and a woman came up to them, and one of the men demanded his money. Mr. S. gave them a quantity of silver, but they asked if he had not a watch? He denied that he had; upon which the men seized him by the throat, and held him while the woman cleared his pockets. The little boy, by his cries alarmed some men passing, who came to the father's assistance. The depredators hearing them coming, threw Mr. Sermon with violence against the paling, and ran off. A labouring man was the same evening robbed of 3*s.* 6*d.* in silver, his hat, and a small tin case, containing a certificate of his discharge from the Navy, and a prize ticket.

DREADFUL OCCURRENCE.—Mr. Box, the City Surgeon, on Friday related the following melancholy circumstance to the Lord Mayor:—Daniel Cartwright, the City Marshalman, had a few days since gone down into Cambridgeshire. He left his wife in town dangerously indisposed, and scarcely had he arrived at the end of his journey, when intelligence overtook him that his wife was no more. The news induced him to return, and he took his passage by the Wisbeach and Cambridge stage, known also as the Royston Mail. On Tuesday, just before day-light, the coach, heavily laden, arrived at Tottenham Broadway, near London. A waggon drove on before, which being on the wrong side, forced its way by in such a manner, as to cause the coach to upset, and Cartwright, who was an inside passenger, having fallen beneath a man at least sixteen stone weight, he was dreadfully bruised, and his left hand and arm dislocated. The arm was literally driven into the socket. Several others of the passengers were bruised, but none so dangerously as Cartwright. The unhappy man being conveyed home, was put under immediate surgical aid. Soon after he exhibited strong symptoms of derangement, and in the course of Thursday he became completely mad. So desperate had the unfortunate man become, that he dashed to pieces every thing that came in his way. It was as much as the bodily strength of others could do to prevent him plunging through the window into the street. Mr. Box added, that the symptoms had since become, if possible, more dangerous, and that it was not now a question of health (for he had little hopes of the man's life), but of security. The Lord Mayor having consulted with Mr. Box, it was arranged that the unhappy individual should be removed to the asylum at Hoxton. By this double calamity five small children are likely to become orphans.

FIRE AT KNOLE CASTLE.—Early on the morning of Christmas-day, a fire was discovered by the housekeeper, in the state bedroom, called the Venetian Chamber, an apartment highly decorated. The flames were then raging along the wainscot on the eastern wall; she, with great presence of mind, flew to the chamber in which slept the Earl of Delawarre, instead of Earl Whitworth's; the cause of her selecting Lord D. was in consequence of her master's being confined by sickness. Lord D. immediately arose, summoned the domestic establishment, and coolly directed them to take steps to counteract the threatened devastation. By this judicious arrangement that venerable and magnificent pile was saved from almost inevitable destruction. A plentiful supply of water quickly reduced the flames, which did not extend beyond the above apartment. Greatly to be regretted is the loss of a part of the very fine Gobelin tapestry; also several pictures, particularly the exquisite portrait of Lady Hume, daughter of the fourth Earl of Dorset. The hangings of the superb state bed, and other articles, were saved. The damage to the room does not exceed 500*l*. The alarm produced no ill effect on Lord Whitworth; on the contrary, the shock seemed to have re-animated him, for he has been getting daily better ever since. The Duchess of Dorset conducted herself with the greatest intrepidity.

About six on Monday morning, a fire broke out at the house of Mr. Shaw, a baker, opposite the Church, at Newington Butts, which in a short time consumed the same, with three others adjoining. Happily no lives were lost.

A chimney-sweeper of Sheffield, last week, took one of his poor little apprentices, only eight years of age, four miles, very early in the morning, to the house of Sir W. Bagshaw, without refreshment, and forced him up the chimney, where the child was so much exhausted as to be unable to move. As soon as Sir William was acquainted with the fact, he ordered the chimney to be broken into, and the boy was taken out just in time to restore the vital spark. The master is held to bail to answer for the offence.

BIRTHS.

At Uttoxeter, on Thursday, the 8th inst. the Lady of E. Lloyd Williams, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, of a son.
Jan. 8, Mrs. Towers, of Warner-street, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

On Tuesday, the 23d December, at Winkfield, Mr. Frederick Pearce, to Miss Prudence Butler, of Egham, Surrey.
Dec. 24, at Paris, the Chevalier Victor de Marion Gaja, to Matilda, eldest daughter of the Right Hon. Lord Robert Fitzgerald.
Dec. 27, Miles Angus Fletcher, Esq. Advocate, to Charlotte Catharine, daughter of General and Lady Augusta Clavering.
Dec. 30, at Bath, Wm. Wingfield Yates, Esq. of Waresley House, Worestershire, to Cecilia, third daughter of the late J. Peel, Esq. of Fasluzus House, Derbyshire.

Dec. 31, Wm. L. Fox, Esq. second son of J. L. Fox, Esq. of Bramham Park, Yorkshire, to Caroline, youngest daughter of the Hon. John Douglas.

Jan. 1, Joseph Francis Bessy, Esq. of Earl's Court, Brompton, to Eliza, eldest daughter of Mr. Mann, of Parliament-street.

Dec. 30, Edw. James, Esq. of London, to Elizabeth, fourth daughter of the late Rev. J. Boucher, Vicar of Epsom.

Jan. 1, Fran. Lyne, Esq. of New Bond-street, to Elizabeth, only daughter of the late Peter Colt, Esq. of Stepney-green.

Mr. Jacob Valentine, jun. son of the famed Hebrew Bard, to Miss Levy, of Rathbone-place, at Meek's Great Rooms, Brewery street, Golden-square, on Tuesday last. Amongst the company were, Sir George Cockburn and his nephew, Lady G. Gordon, and Lady Franklin. When the bridegroom had signed an obligation, which compels him to protect the bride during his life, and her father and brother had bound themselves to protect her after his death, the happy couple next repaired to the middle of the room, under a rich canopy, borne by four near relations, where, amidst the chaunting of the prayers, the bride and bridegroom were each presented with a glass of wine. After this, however, the former broke her glass under her feet, in remembrance of the destruction of Jerusalem. An excellent dinner was then served up, and dancing continued till one o'clock.

DEATHS.

On the 4th instant, aged 64, with only two days illness, Mary, the wife of Mr. Hagan, of Derby-street, Westminster, regretted by all (says our Correspondent) who had the happiness of her acquaintance; she was an affectionate wife, a kind mother, a sincere friend, and cheerful companion.

Dec. 26, in Judd-place, New-road, aged 62, Sarah, widow of the late John Elwes, Esq. of Portman-square.

Dec. 28, at Hastings, Horatio Martelli, Esq. of Norfolk-street, Strand.

Jan. 2, in Hanover-street, in his 28th year, Capt. J. Prince, of the Coldstream Guards, son of Lieut.-General Prince.

Jan. 3, at South Lambeth, Surrey, aged 57, J. Bridges, Esq.

Jan. 6, in St. James's Palace, Mr. Eldred, in his 100th year. He was Page of the Presence to George II. which office he may be said to have filled during three reigns.

Dec. 29, aged 53, John Strong, Esq. of Silldown House, near Poole.—He was dressing himself when he fell on the floor and expired immediately.

Dec. 25, in the 81st year of her age, Princess Sophia Caroline Maria, Margravine of Bayreuth.

Dec. 31, after a few hours illness, in her 75th year, Mrs. White, wife of Mr. W. White, of Artillery-place, Finsbury-square.

Jan. 1, at Brighton, in his 56th year, Mr. Tatham, of Mount street, upholsterer to the Prince Regent.

Jan. 1, in Duke-street, St. James's, in his 56th year, Count Zenobio.—The Count was not only a Prince in the Venetian Republic, but a Prince of the House of Austria. He was the owner of two of the finest palaces in the world, Emo and Zenobio. As a man of fashion and gallantry, he took the lead at Versailles, when under the ancient regime; at Baxter's Club he usually risked 5000*l* every night.

Dec. 29, aged 23, Semima, wife of D. A. Talboys, bookseller, of St. Clement's, near Oxford.—At the awful juncture while her husband, with the rest of the family were assembled to witness her last moments, they were alarmed by the cry of fire from below, where the clothes of the eldest daughter, six years of age, had caught fire—she expired the next morning. A disconsolate father is thus left to mourn his double loss, with two remaining children, one of which is only six days old.

Dec. 31, in St. Thomas's Hospital, John Hooper, one of the State Prisoners tried with Thistlewood, Preston, and Watson, for High Treason; his remains were interred by the side of Cashman, according to his request.—He had been in a declining state of health ever since his acquittal.

Jan. 2, at Forest House, Chigwell, the son of the Rev. Mr. Wildman.

Jan. 4, at Cowes, the Lady of James Macdonald, Esq. M.P.

Jan. 6, at Fitzwalters, Essex, in his 61st year, T. Wright, Esq. of Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, banker.

At the advanced age of 99, John Smith, who has been porter at the King's Printing-house for more than sixty years. He wore a cocked hat, according to the ancient costume, and enjoyed uninterrupted health almost to the time of his decease.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

WE write in behalf of this gallant and suffering body of men, while the fierce winds, which they have so often battled with, are roaring about our ears. Those winds, which in their muttering intervals seem to be scorning human weakness, and then in their wilder contempt to come rushing over our petty affectations of pride and power,—what do they say to our rulers respecting the darers of storms and waves? They seem to say,—We sweep the ocean now as we will; the gallantest spirits among you are wanted no longer to contend with us, and you neglect them; they who dared us at our height, and who ran the race of the elements with us over the tops of the waters, you now suffer to be shrunk up with poverty and nakedness, and to be forced to hide from us under bulks and pent-houses! Do you pretend to be the master-spirits of the world! We roll over your heartless nonsense with disdain.

The conduct of Government indeed on occasions of this kind is most extraordinary. Whenever sailors are wanted during a war, we hear of nothing but their gallantry and infinite services;—"the gallant tars," the "hearts of oak," the lions in battle and lambs afterwards, the conquerors but to save, the heroes of "our wooden walls," the invincible maintainers of the British flag, the sweepers of the seas, England's impregnable bulwarks,—what should we do without them? Yes, that is the question;—What should we do without them?—and accordingly when we cannot do without them, we praise and flatter them to the skies; their virtues are every thing that is generous and fine-hearted; their defects are stuffed out into virtues; they are the representatives and epitomes of all that is truly English; they sail off among shouts and hurrahs, they meet the enemy, plunge into all the chaos of battle, get lopped, maimed, splintered, burnt, bruised, battered, blown up, drenched in water and in blood; return with thinned numbers, with tattered flags, and with wounds; and there is an illumination. The Boroughmongers have dinners together; some Officers get promoted, if they have interest; others commence a life of half-pay and tattered memorials; the Government papers talk of glory, safety, magnanimity, invincibility, proud day, and eternal gratitude; such of the "gallant tars," as have "had the luck to have their legs shot off," have a chance of getting into Greenwich Hospital; the rest, who have the merit only of courage and poverty, must congratulate themselves on having their legs to live upon; and a creature of the name of Croker begins speculating how he shall keep a war-salary in time of peace.

Such has been the case, more or less, during our naval

Wars and in the intervals. Whenever the necessity for battle comes again, then the trumpets and flatteries are revived, and we are to have eternal glory, and to shew eternal gratitude. When the necessity is over, the trumpets and flatteries are dumb, and we hear a vast deal about impostors. At last, the seas are absolutely swept clean of all our enemies; we say so, and boast of it; and shortly after, we hear that multitudes of Seamen are perishing in our streets. Twice, since the close of the war, has their condition been brought before Government; twice have others done what the Government ought to have done; and twice have the Government rather acquiesced in the proposal made for relieving them, than blushed for their previous neglect, and taken up the subject warmly. It was that active and meritorious person, the late Lord Mayor, who first urged it to them,—who first urged them to cast a gracious eye towards hundreds of their own saviours. A ship, with some coddiness, was granted for their accommodation,—one perhaps in which many of these saviours had fought and bled, and had their limbs torn asunder, that we might all enjoy ourselves safe and sound at home. What is better, they were relieved of their nakedness out of the naval stores; and for a time, people thought that the preservers of our homes had something like a bit of a home as well as ourselves. But somehow or other, this ship has disappeared; nobody can tell what has become of it; a grave and prudent Government Alderman says he cannot even venture to guess; and in the mean time, multitudes of shivering and starving sailors having again made their appearance, something must be done again by persons out of the pale of Government, and again the Government is applied to. It answers, it will do what it can "with propriety," a ship or two is granted as before, and hundreds of Seamen have already been relieved by persons, who have neither the means, nor the influence, nor the imperious duty upon them to interfere in such cases, which Government has.

Now, that these persons have so interfered, and that hundreds of the Seamen have been relieved in consequence, is a most excellent thing; but the public have a right to demand a most serious explanation from Government. Did the Admiralty and others mean then to do nothing at all, had others done nothing? It seems so. And how are they to account for their neglect, as it is? For our parts, we cannot, with all the ingenuity we can muster up, and really with all the sincerity we can add to it, present to our imagination one single excuse they can have to make. That they were not aware of the circumstances, they cannot possibly say; that it is not a case under their jurisdiction, the Sailors not being in actual service, they cannot with any decency say either, when we consider how they interfere with their press-warrants, and how they take cognizance of all things connected with the service that are at all to their advantage; though, now we think of it, we suspect that this will be their attempt at an excuse. That the country does not owe at least sufficient gratitude to Seamen to keep them from starving, the hardiest of these

(we mean the hardest-faced) will not venture to assert; and if the country owes thus much, which is the most decent medium through which it shall be paid? That they have no funds, is another thing impossible to alledge; for where, as Lord COCHRANE asked, are the Droits of Admiralty, and to whom do those misused funds belong, if not to the Seamen who won them? That they have no money to spare, can still less, if possible, be alledged; for they have several rank sinecures among their lordly offices, the existence of which is a scandal at any time, much more in times like the present. And granting that even that were not the case, there is not a Lord or Secretary of the Admiralty who ought not to forego at least the most unnecessary part of his luxuries, when such objects as these were brought before his attention. But this! Oh, this would be reckoned prodigiously romantic, that is to say, silly! We cannot but fancy Mr. CROKER chuckling over the idea. And yet these men and their masters are among the persons who call upon us, upon the rest of the world, for generousities and sacrifices of all sorts! They have succeeded, till lately, upon the strength of the world's being more generous and trusting than themselves; but cunning is not wisdom, though it may ape it for a time; and the world are so thoroughly disgusted and undeceived at last, that these generousities and sacrifices will not be found forthcoming much longer. And this is the time which the servants of the Boroughmongers select for disgusting the community with their conduct to one of the bravest parts of it: the time which they select for reminding us of their former flatteries and upurious congratulations, by looking cold upon their friends and saviours, and talking of doing what they can "with propriety!" Oh, if these gentlemen had been fought for, only as far as "propriety" went! If their respective natures and intentions had all been inquired into to see which of them could or could not have been kept safe and sound, and suffered to grow rich, with "propriety!" If their words, actions, possessions, or claims had all been made to undergo the test of "propriety!" Propriety means right of possession, what is proper or belonging to any one, own-ness; and by moral metaphor, it comes to mean decency, justice, what is becoming under such and such circumstances, what is due to this or that person, or set of persons, and may in moral as well as civil justice be called their own, whether all or in part. Now we should like to hear the inheritor of Lord FIELLIVILLE's fortune and titles, or Mr. CROKER who wanted to have so many salaries of widows in addition to his own, discuss to us the particular use of the word on the present occasion. We know not the talents of his Lordship this way, nor how far he could make the meaning and application of the term tally with the Droits and the Sinecures; but with Mr. CROKER, who has read SHAKESPEARE, propriety is doubtless—as it were—a sort of—as one should say,—propriety; that is, if one is very hard pushed, and obliged to face the matter out, propriety is letting hundreds of human beings, who have been the saviours of us, huddle together under pent-houses, cold, hungry, and sick,—and adding to one's own salary, already undeserved, in order that we may be able to give dinners to our great friends the Boroughmongers.

[To be concluded next week.]

ON BLASPHEMY.

Sir.—The topic of Blasphemy, considered as a subject for prosecution, having, in consequence of the late prosecutions, attracted that degree of attention which is so justly claimed by it, I take the liberty of sending to you for insertion, if you think proper, an extract relative to this subject, from a work, which comes from a pen not altogether unknown to you, and which, though it has for some time been in print, has never yet been published, but may at one time or other, perhaps, break through the shackles which hitherto have confined it.

Zealot. Well, Sir, you seem to be talking all this time very much at your ease, but will you find it altogether so easy to exculpate this talk of yours from the charge of blasphemy?

Graduate. This depends on what you mean by blasphemy. If it be language intentionally expressive of, or proceeding from, disrespect towards the Almighty, towards a Being believed by myself to exist, and to be Almighty—neither on this present occasion is any such blasphemy to be found in me, nor on any occasion, in any manner whatsoever, has any such blasphemy been found, unless the man were absolutely and literally mad. Not being mad, no such sentiment towards the Almighty do I entertain, of no such sentiment is this or any other language of mine intentionally expressive. In this sense, then, have I as easily as effectually exculpated this my talk from the charge of blasphemy. But if this be not what you mean by blasphemy,—then, unless you mean by it something that, under that name, is punishable by law, or deserving of disapprobation at the hands of public opinion,—which is what I believe you would not find it very easy to prove,—call it by that name, if it be any satisfaction to you, you have my free leave for it.

On every part of the field of religion, whether a man be in power or not,—but more particularly if he is,—this way of thinking, speaking, and acting, is unhappily but too generally prevalent. Whatsoever are the opinions which he entertains, or professes to entertain,—what he all along insists upon is, that they are God's, and as such ought by every man to be deemed and taken to be; yes, and accordingly spoken of by every man who takes the liberty,—a liberty on this hypothesis equally audacious and inconsistent,—of contesting them; yes, and this at the very time that he is contesting them; all this on pain of being subjected to the punishment, or, at any rate, to the reproach of blasphemy. Now, then, if so it be that the man in question,—the self-constituted and intolerating censor,—is the Almighty, then as above, true it is, that the language by which any disrespect is cast upon any such opinion of his is blasphemy, on this supposition, but not otherwise.

History speaks of a man, who, fancying or pretending to fancy himself to be Jesus, went about the country, declaring himself so to be to every body who would hear him. This man spoke out. For prostration of understanding and will, as towards himself, by this vagabond, supposing him impudent enough to call for obsequiousness in that shape, the ground was explicitly declared. Comes his Lordship of London, and,—addressing himself to the Clergy, his subordinates, and through them, by means of the press, to the public at large,—informs them of a case, in which obsequiousness, in that same abject and unreserved form will be due to, and as such may be called for by, themselves. To these men will it then really be due? Yes; if they be, each of them, Jesus; but not otherwise. Thus then does he encourage and virtually command them, each of them, to give men to understand that he is Jesus. Command them? How? In explicit terms as the vagabond did? No; only by necessary implication; nothing more; in that lies the only difference. To be himself the one Jesus, will even that satisfy him? Not it indeed; Jesuses must he have, and by hundreds, for his subordinates.

Dismissing the Bishop, take any controversialist at random, so he be a religious one, this assumption of his being God,—every one who on the points in question agrees with him, a God,—each of them the one only God,—is but too apt to run through all his discourses, and to be among the postulates, which all his demonstrations take for their ground. Nor will even this satisfy him; for, when you have a dispute with him,—you having the boldness to contest this or that one of his tenets,—what he virtually requires of you is, on your part a virtual admission that such is the case. Whatever assertions the tenet contains,—yes, and whatever assertions he comes out with in defence of them,—they must be, all of them, deemed and taken to be so many assertions made by God; and on that supposition must the language employed by you, in speaking of them, be grounded. Supposing them then absurd,—and that in such a degree as to be ridiculous,—may you represent them exactly as they are? No. Will he endure that you should? Not he indeed; for, as by the implied postulate he is God, his assertions are God's assertions, which being true, they cannot be, any of them, ridiculous; and to treat any of them as such is blasphemy; and you, so treating them, are a blasphemer; and blasphemers are such wretches, no treatment can be too bad for them. On every such occasion, all along, in giving expression to these opinions of his, he, on his part, takes care, of course, to employ such language as imports them to be so many just objects of the most prostrate veneration. In any defence he makes of them against any attacks, all along he thus keeps taking for granted that which is in dispute. In all this there is nothing but what, though not altogether logical, is, considering the nature of the subject, natural enough, and at least excusable. But neither will this satisfy him; for, on your part, the language used by you, in relation to these assertions of his, must be of such a sort as to convey an implied confirmation of the grant. In themselves they are so absurd as to be ridiculous,—representing them as venerable, what you would say of them would be a misrepresentation. Yet in this misrepresentation he insists that all along you shall join, or all your arguments are so much blasphemy.

The misfortune is, that if the notion a man has advanced is to a certain degree absurd and ridiculous, and it has fallen in your way to shew it so to be, in so doing you have unavoidably been testifying towards the man himself a certain degree of disrespect; for in proportion as what, on any occasion, a man says, is seen to be ridiculous, in that same proportion does he become the object of the sort of sentiment called disrespect—irritated, and, by the irritation, his judgment to such a degree disturbed, as to cause him, in the view he takes of the matter, to mistake one person for another, the disrespect thus shewn to him; and this notice of his he fancies, or pretends to fancy, is disrespect shewn to the Almighty. To the Almighty! Yes; if he and the Almighty are one and the same person—(a proposition which, by the by, may as easily be true as that any three persons are but one)—yes, if he and the Almighty are but one and the same person, but not otherwise. But as for you, you for your part do not believe him to be the Almighty; therefore, whatsoever disrespect you may unavoidably have been testifying, it goes no further than your antagonist; it reaches not the Almighty.

That to whatsoever object or objects applied, three and one are the same number; this for example (you say) is a notion so absurd as to be ridiculous: as such you accordingly, if you speak of it without misrepresentation, cannot avoid representing it. Alas! (cries he) this is blasphemy; this is blaspheming the Trinity; this is blaspheming God; this is treating the Almighty with contempt. Treat the Almighty with contempt! Not you indeed. With contempt enough, indeed, what is but natural, and indeed scarce avoidable, is, that on this occasion something or other should be treated by you; for example, that notion of his,—that in that instance, or any instance, applied to the same object, (or objects, shall we say?)—three and one are the same number. After putting on this occasion person for God, as on other occasions he would person for a man, to say that three God persons are but one God, is exactly the same absurdity,—exactly the same self contradictory proposition,—as to say of three man persons (three brothers for instance) that they are but one man: of a proposition thus self-contradictory,—by no evidence that ever was contained in a book, or ever could be contained in a book,—can the truth be proved. Away, away! cries he; what is all this but blasphemy! And so the dispute ends, by his going to a lawyer for advice, whether he cannot give himself the satisfaction of seeing you punished; and out of the Judge's tender mercy, forced to tell a barefaced lie under the name of recantation, to save yourself from further punishment!

[To be concluded in our next.]

BONAPARTE.

[From a Flemish Paper.]

M. de Las Casas, separated from a master, who has never ceased to be his friend, has brought to Europe an ample stock of anecdotes about that extraordinary man, who has united in his illustrious career all the chances of good and bad fortune. Bonaparte always fixes the general attention—he is a luminous meteor which it is impossible to conceal. The portrait of this great man has never till now been drawn but by a flattering or an exaggerating pencil; and it is likely that, during his lifetime, the resemblance will never be seized. In waiting this work, reserved for posterity, we present anecdotes that yield us some features of the moral physiognomy of the man whom sovereigns have now thrown into chains as a punishment for having enchaind nations. We derive them from an article which appears to have been communicated by Las Casas to the Journal of Antwerp.

Napoleon, at the commencement of his residence on the island, voluntarily received the English Officers, and admitted them at Longwood into social circles formed by the companions of his captivity, and two or three of the principal families of St. Helena. We are bound to say, to the credit of the English officers, that they never approached Napoleon but with that respect which his great misfortunes commanded. One would have believed that he saw the Emperor at the Tuilleries, surrounded with his courtiers. He made the English Journals be translated to him, and as he was allowed only the Ministerial Journals, he soon remarked those articles of corrosive gall and insipid irony, in which he was represented as successively surrendering himself to childish spleen, or disgusting caprices. He was so unjust as to believe that those even whom he admitted to his society, and from whom he received the most abject adulation, were caterers for the Times and the Courier. He then formed the resolution to see nobody, and did not even make an exception in favour of the Governor. Sir Hudson Lowe took a singular mode of overcoming this determination; he transmitted one day a request for an interview, under the pretext of having to communicate things of an agreeable and interesting nature. He was admitted; but what was the astonishment of Napoleon, when he perceived that the only object of his conversation was to inform him, that the expenditure of the captives exceeded by 1,200 louis the funds placed at his disposal by the Government, and to beg him to find the means of covering the deficit. He sharply replied, “M. le Gouverneur, I never intermeddle in such details. Never did any complaint of mine descend so low as you.—I command, or I am silent. If after this you allow me to want for necessities, I will go to seek them in your own camp (pointing with his finger to the English tents which are seen from Longwood), and these brave soldiers will not drive from their mess one of the oldest and the first soldier of Europe."

In the private conversations which he often held with Bertrand and Las Casas, he sometimes indulged in effusions of feeling which gave the lie to what has been said about the aridity of his heart. In speaking of the double catastrophe which deprived him of his crown, he sometimes said, "Have I done all that was my duty for that good people, the French? Ought I not likewise to have died for them? They did so many services for me; but they likewise abandoned me. I deceive myself; they abandoned me twice, in the most cruel manner. The first defection may be excused, but for the second, should they not have understood better?"

They asked him why, among the numerous expedients which presented themselves to him, he had adopted that of surrendering himself to his most cruel enemies? Without replying directly to the question, he said that he had had at one time the idea of proposing his abdication on condition of retiring into Corsica, and retaining the sovereignty of that island; "but," added he, "my enemies would not have failed to have said, that after launching France and Frenchmen on a stormy sea, I abandoned them after the tempests, to shelter myself in port."

He never speaks but in terms of eulogy of the city of Lyons, and on such occasions he discovers projects which were never suspected to be entertained by him. For example, he said, "It is useless to express how much I love that good city; but one thing I am certain of, that I have always been, and shall always be, beloved by it; I had formed great projects for its prosperity. It is so situated as to become the capital of Gaul and Italy."

He cannot believe that the two Emperors of Austria and of Russia entertain towards him personal animosity. "They only (said he) persecute in me the sword of that revolution which made them tremble on their thrones." He said of Ney and Murat, "they were, perhaps, the two bravest men that ever existed; but if they had had but two ounces of good sense more, they would, perhaps, have been the greatest of poltroons." The English journals, containing the details of the death of Murat, were read to him. When he heard the word shot, he abruptly interrupted the reader, and said; "the Calabrians were more generous and less inhospitable than the people of Plymouth—proceed;" and he listened to the details of the death of his brother-in-law without shedding a tear. The tone of these discourses, though in general severe, is not always remote from pleasantry. With General Bertrand and Count Las Casas in particular, he abandoned himself to all the communicativeness of confiding familiarity. One day he asked the former what party he was of at the commencement of the revolution? "Of the constitutional, Sire, (replied he), since I narrowly escaped death at the Tuilleries in defending the throne and the inviolability of the monarch." "And you, Las Casas," said Napoleon, pinching familiarly the ear of his Chamberlain, "I shall not ask what party you belonged to; you emigrated; you were essentially an aristocrat. Don't you allow it, now, to be very strange, that of us three I am the only republican?" "Very singular indeed," replied Bertrand; "but Sire, they made you pay dear for it." It is very true, he repeats frequently, "liberal ideas have ruined me;" but he adds, that mistakes prevailed over his ultimate views. "I wished," said he, "to restrain liberal ideas first, in order to make them burn with all their lustre afterwards."

Lucca, Dec. 25.—A passage in the proclamation of our new Sovereign, Maria Louisa of Bourbon, Infanta of Spain, and Duchess of Lucca, has singularly touched every heart. It is the following:—

"Our maternal heart eagerly seizes the means which may the most quickly enable us to extend our helping hand to our well-beloved subjects and children, without distinction of rank or condition. Consequently, we make it known to all classes of people, that on the Wednesday of each week, we shall hold a public audience. Every person who wishes to be admitted to our presence, need observe no other formality, than to deliver his name the day before to our private Secretary."

[From the Mexican Gazettes.]

The following is an extract from the Extraordinary Gazette of the Government of Mexico, of Saturday, November 1, 1817, inserted in a Journal Extraordinary of the Government of Havannah, of Monday, December 1, the same year:—

"Sila, Oct. 27, 1817, eight o'clock at night.

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR,—With the greatest satisfaction I congratulate your Excellency on my having taken prisoner, at seven o'clock this day, the traitor Mina, in company with 25 others, in the pass of Venadito, belonging to the estate of Tlachiquera, where he was with 200 men, nearly the half of whom are killed; among the rest, the rebel Pedro Moreno, whose head has been brought to this town, where I have just arrived; and as soon as I have an opportunity I will send the dispatch to the Mariscal de Campo Don Pasqual de Linan. I advise your Excellency of the success, on account of the interest you must take in it. God preserve your Excellency many years."

Dispatch of Captain D. Augustin Aguerre to Colonel D. Rafael Bracho, Political and Military Commandant of Queretaro.

"I send your Excellency the enclosed very interesting dispatch, which I have received for the Viceroy, which I beg you will transmit immediately. The enclosure contains the most important intelligence of the capture of the traitor Mina alive, the two Herreras, a Frenchman, and I bring the head of Moreno. The whole has been done by Colonel D. Francisco de Orrantia, who entered Silao yesterday, at seven o'clock in the morning."

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JANUARY 18.

A CONSPIRACY has been discovered at Rome, the "pretext" of which is said to have been the Independence of Italy, but "the principal motives of the chiefs, ambition and avarice." These are of course the motives which the "legitimate" would attribute to any political movement. They are their own. But it is well known, that there has long been an ardent desire throughout Italy for the independence of that beautiful and renowned country; and its present governors and usurpers are certainly not likely to render the desire less. Some State Prisoners have been made, among whom, the same account says, are "persons of superior rank." It adds, that the Chiefs of the Conspiracy are reported to be "members of the Association of Carbonari (Colliers), which had been introduced into the Marches from the kingdom of Naples." Probably, they are some of the principal persons in that kingdom, all the inhabitants of which, except the lowest vagabonds, are understood to have been disgusted with the return of FERDINAND, and the revival of the old corruptions, superstitions, and other vices and absurdities. The name of Colliers seems no very lofty one; but the Italian societies, which are very numerous of all descriptions, have always had a fancy for humble appellations.

An article dated Franconia says, that several chateaux and other habitations in that territory have been set on fire and destroyed, and that the incendiaries are supposed to be fanatics of the sect of PASCHEL. Our readers remember this man, who preached the necessity of occasionally propitiating the DIVINE BEING by a human sacrifice. Such are the consequences of representing the DEITY as cruel and absurd himself. Who is to wonder that men become so, when in consequence of such representations, and in spite of their phrases and pretensions, they cannot but so regard him?

The Earl of SEFTON has given a remarkable proof of the warmth and sincerity of his own political principles, and paid as strong a compliment to the late excellent self-defences of Mr. HONE, by enclosing 105*l.* for him in the following letter to Mr. WAITHMAN:—

"Croxeth Hall, near Liverpool, Jan. 11.

"SIR,—I address you from a sick bed, from which I may, perhaps, never rise, and take an advantage of an interval from pain to send you a draft for One Hundred Guineas, to be applied to the Subscription for Mr. Hone, of which you are Treasurer. I am happy, whatever may be the issue of my illness, to be able to mark my abhorrence of the tyrannical, vindictive, and persecuting spirit, which was manifested on the late Trials—my contempt for the spiteful imbecility which urged a continuance of them, after the failure of the first—and my admiration of the intrepidity and ability of the individual who so triumphantly defeated the greatest and most dangerous conspiracy of the year 1817.—I fear my letter will be hardly legible, as I have some difficulty in even holding my pen.—I am, Sir, your obedient humble Servant, "SEFTON."

The Ministerial Journalists have fallen into fits at this letter. They cannot contain their bitter chagrin at it, nor, we were going to say, their absurdities; but those they cannot contain at any time. They fairly groan and gnash their teeth; and the Courier in particular is "shocked," and "disgusted," and horrified, and thinks it "a detestable production." It is really curious to see how the person or persons connected with that paper go on talking gratuitously, taking their questions and assertions for argument, and avoiding all the while the only real state of the whole business. The following is a specimen: "His Lordship encourages a public belief that the Government, the Bench, and the Bar, were influenced by tyranny, revenge, and persecution; a belief which he must know would tend to weaken the respect of the people for the laws under which they live, and the Government by which those laws are administered.—Will his Lordship condescend to inform us where were the tyranny and the persecution? Were they shewn in the freedom given to rake up all the profane trash, and combine it into one disgusting mass of impiety and blasphemy? Were they shewn in the unparalleled attempts to intimidate the Bar and the Bench, in the determination of the mob to allow no freedom of speech, no power of being heard, to any but the Parodist himself? And on what grounds does his Lordship feel contempt for continuing the trials of HONE after the failure of the first? Is acquittal upon one charge to be the ground for abandoning all other charges against any person accused? Is it to be impunity for all other offences? And when his Lordship silly talks "of the greatest and most dangerous conspiracy of the year 1817" having been defeated by HONE, does he mean to say, that the proceedings in the capital to subvert the constitution, the disturbances in the country, the Spencean doctrines, the crime for which BRANDRETH and others suffered, were not conspiracies dangerous to that system of laws, the destruction of which would have made his Lordship's tenure at Croxteth Hall about as secure as the tenure by which a drowning man holds his life who has just caught at a straw? Would to Heaven that his Lordship had had another feeling, more appropriate to his situation, and more predominating than admiration for profane parodists; the feeling of charity and of candour, which should have taught him that the Government, and those who administer the laws, act only from a sense of duty, and not from any feeling of persecution and revenge—that they do not and cannot wish to bring down the punishment of the law upon any man, but from a conviction that they owe it to those public situations, which impose upon them the duty of taking care that the religion and the laws of the country shall not be assailed or insulted with impunity."

Lord! lord! And this is what the Allied Gentlemen call writing, and think to talk down the age with! This wretched shuffling hum-drum! Why do they not read the Court-Calendar to us at once, or talk gibberish, or hum an old song, or cry old clothes, or turn a wheel or a ventilator, or play the bag-pipe, or hire a parish-clerk to sing through his nose to us, or get a fly to buzz about our ears?—The whole question is as plain as a pike-staff. Parodies are published by all sorts of people, the Government people among them, and CANNING among them; but all of a sudden, the Government feel particularly stung and worried by some parodies on the side of Reform, and so, after saying nothing about all the parodies, nay, after even rewarding the "profane and pauper parodists," the CANNINGS and GILGAYS, they pounce upon the Reformers' parodies under pretence of Religion! The Juries are disgusted, like all the rest of the world, at this pretence; Mr. HONE is enabled to make three triumphant defences of himself, upon the strength of the clearness of the case to every honest man, as well as of his own talents; and then the Courier, never saying a word all the time about CANNING and the others, thinks to take the pike-staff from before our eyes with the help of all the grave, gratuitous, and stupid airs he can put on, begging the question at every sentence! It really is a singular specimen of the natural dullness of the people in power, that they do not see the folly of employing such advocates as these.

But the Courier has not done with Lord SEFTON. It must cant on every possible part of the subject, and disgust the awakened senses of the community, and so it falls to being especially shocked at the danger the Noble Lord runs in thus sympathizing with a fellow-creature and exhibiting the manly virtues, instead of being frightened out of his wits at the thought of going before the SUPREME COURT! These half-witted worshippers of power are equally happy, whether they abuse men or compliment the CREATOR! "Are these," says the Courier, "the qualifications of a Member of the Established Church and a British Legislator, doubtful whether he is not about to be called instantly to his great account."—Again—"His Lordship describes himself to be in the awful situation of a man confined by sickness to his bed, and doubtful whether he may ever rise from it. Yet, in that tremendous situation, he thinks a profane parodist, a man who has treated with levity that religion which is our eternal hope, worthy of public reward?" And again—"Believing himself on his death-bed; believing, we hope, that he might shortly have to appear before the tribunal of Heaven, he seizes an interval from pain, not to implore Divine mercy, not to propitiate his Creator, but to bequeath a probably dying legacy, in token of his expiring approbation of that from which all good men turn with horror."—Here the DEITY, the Creator of us all, and of justice, is represented, after the natural fashion of slavery, as a Being more dreadful than anything else, whose favour is to be implored and propitiated by feelings, which pay him after all the very worst possible compliment! That a man should feel serious on his death-bed is natural to such a departure; that he should in some instances feel terrified, may be also natural to the infirmities that have reduced him to it; but that he should still sympathize with his fellow-creatures is a desirable proof both of his virtue and of his courage; and on the other hand, that he should be frightened at God, and regard him, not as an all-wise and good Being who would not have made him for ultimate wretchedness, but as a capricious despot who values opinion and flattery more than any thing else, and will condemn his creatures to eternal tortures if they do not fall prostrate before him in horror of mind, and pay him the absurdest and most degrading of human compliments,—are slavish and horrible doctrines, which thousands and thousands are now sick of, and the world will be infinitely more truly pious, kind, and happy, when they are altogether exploded.

The following is an Extract of a Letter, dated Havana, Nov. 16, 1817, received yesterday:—"Accounts reached this city yesterday of a severe battle having been fought between Vera Cruz and Mexico,—the Independents victorious. Twenty King's Officers have fallen, who were natives of this city."

COURT MOURNING.—Second Change.—The second change of Court Mourning takes place to-day, and in another fortnight (Sunday, February 1) the Court, agreeably to the notice already issued, goes out of mourning; making its duration three months.

Mr. Serjeant BEST has been appointed Chief Justice of Chester, and has resigned the appointment of Attorney-General of the Prince as Duke of Cornwall.

THE NEW VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Although it is understood that Sir JOHN LEACH does not mean to sit in judgment on any causes, &c. in which he had been engaged as Counsel, yet it becomes a most important object to the public at large, to ascertain who is to determine such causes, particularly those that have been in great part heard before the late Vice-Chancellor? We know, for instance, that some demurrers, &c. which stood below those that have been in part heard, are already disposed of by the present Vice-Chancellor. This regulation of putting causes, where the parties are not forth-coming, at the bottom of the list, will be the subject of another question.

THE LATE RIGHT HON. JOHN McMASTON.—It has often been asked, and certainly not without just ground, how this indefatigable Smiler could have contrived to die worth nearly 100,000*l.* We know, that, among other means, he had those of military promotion. In April 1796, he sold his Majority in the 87th Foot for 3000*l.*—The regulation was, and is, 2,500*l.* But more of this hereafter. It is high time that the Creepers round exalted characters (we use the word exalted as a word of course) should be traced, through all their slime and filth. Even Princes may derive an useful lesson from the exposure.

The resignation of Sir BENJAMIN BLOMFIELD, and the appointment of Sir WM. KNIGHTON, the Physician, have given birth to a variety of conjectures. We shall not be surprised to hear that a certain hoary offender has also quitted the same circle. Is a great Personage tired of his old companions?

Can any of our readers inform us, what were the particular causes which led to the resignation of Mr. LICHFIELD?

DEMOCRACY AND DIVINE RIGHT.—The people (of America) quietly elect their representatives; they pay scarcely any taxes; they have no alien laws, by which the executive power can drive from province to province, or confine in fortresses or dungeons, wretched foreigners, who fly from despotism in their own country; the laws made for the welfare of the people are respected by the people; all the Offices of State are open to persons of all religious sects; the rulers are not afraid of the people, and the people do not hate their rulers; no persons are shut up in prisons without being brought to trial; the population increases rapidly, and wealth still more rapidly; strangers flock from all parts of the world to till the uncultivated land, and even enter into voluntary servitude for a time, to purchase the freedom of such a commonwealth. How kind it is in the Continental Sovereigns to prevent the spreading of the principles which formed the government, or anarchy, of America! How much preferable the state of things by which all the power of the nation falls into the uncontrolled hands of a FERDINAND; in which all actions must be conformed to his will, and all understandings reduced to the level of his understanding; in which one-heartedness in religion is produced by persecuting all who differ from the Monarch; in which all hearts curse the rulers, and none dare utter the most rational complaints; in which the stiletto is at work, and the pen is still; in which the greatest degree of insecurity is combined with the greatest degree of slavery, and bigotry and intolerance go hand in hand with immorality and crime. It is the duty of every Englishman to consider the different result of Democracy and absolute Monarchy, and consider whether it be better to strengthen the principles of our Constitution, which incline to the one or to the other of these extremes.—From the "Yellow Dwarf."

CAUTION.—A Correspondent under the signature of "Coffee," writes,—“As moist sugar agrees with me better than loaf, I generally give it the preference; and having observed some marked 9*d.* in a grocer's window, on the Surrey side of Blackfriars' Bridge, I called for the purpose of ordering a quantity to be sent to my lodgings. I was informed, however, that unless it was my intention to purchase other articles, I could not have the sugar, of which I had required a sample, at 9*d.* a pound, and which was reserved for the use of customers. Disappointed here, I went into the next grocer's shop, and on coming to an explanation, I found the price on the samples in the window a mere take in; indeed the grocer expressed his surprise with a sneer at my ignorance, in believing such sugar could be sold at ninepence per pound! By giving this publicity, you may prevent many of your readers from meeting with not only disappointment but mortification.”

PITTITE CONSISTENCY.—It is but little more than six months since we felt ourselves compelled, from an imperious sense of public duty, to reprobate the proceedings of a “knot of jugglers” at Louth, calling themselves a Pitt Club, over whom one Elmhirst, a Colonel, we believe, was thought to be the “most senseless and fit man” to preside; and we did not then expect so soon to have to return to the actions of these Quixotic heroes. By advertisements, however, in our Paper, we learn that some of them (and amongst the number the gallant leader) form part of Committees to promote the election of Mr. PELHAM, as one of the Parliamentary Representatives of this county,—a man diametrically opposite in his political tenets of those of the “great statesman now no more,” whose feats of blood and devastation these Louth Pittites met to commemorate last June. Disgraced as is the present age by political prostitution and degradation, the present example outdoes them all. “None but itself can be its parallel.” In June, 1817, the renowned Colonel and his associates meet at a tavern; and after a dinner composed of every luxury the country and season could afford, drink “The memory of Mr. Pitt, and may his principles always animate the councils of Great Britain,”—“A further suspension of the Habeas Corpus act,” and a string of other highly appropriate toasts:—in January, 1818, some of them again assemble at a tavern, (among men who are politically honest,) and not only join in a resolution that the Honourable Mr. PELHAM is a fit person to represent this county; but form part of a Committee to promote his election; the said Mr. PELHAM having opposed, in Parliament, all the principles and measures of the Pitt system; and the said Mr. PELHAM not only having voted against the further suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act (which these worthies prayed for), but against its suspension on the very first proposal of the despotic expedient!—Stamford News.

It is said that the quarrel between Spain and Portugal is not yet settled; and that CASTLEREAGH has in consequence been up to the elbows among papers in his office for three or four successive days. If so, woe to John Bull's purse! The Russian fleet which has been given to “our Beloved,” for weighty reasons no doubt, has actually reached a British port, on its way to Spain. We hope that not a single British seaman will disgrace himself by going in it; but, in lieu of them, we have no objections to the Russian's Ministers taking their passage on board. Some of them might, from their late experience, be highly useful in the department of the Most Holy Inquisition. CANNING, too, might again be sent Ambassador to Portugal, or to any other place where there was no use for him; and there is no reason to think he would so far neglect his duty as to omit drawing his salary.—Dundee Advertiser.

LECTURES ON POETRY.—Mr. HAZLITT commenced, on Tuesday last, a Series of Lectures on Poetry, at the Surrey Institution. Those who have perused this Gentleman's recent work on the Characters of Shakspeare, need not be told how well he is qualified for the difficult task he has now undertaken; and those who, like the writer of this paragraph, heard his Introductory Lecture of Tuesday, and listened to his energetic, eloquent, and philosophical description of the delightful art of which he was treating, can testify how much his hearers were gratified by his labours. It seemed to the writer, that Mr. HAZLITT wanted a little more confidence, as it might have given additional ease to his mode of reading his Lecture, which however was perfectly distinct.

LORD WALSHINGHAM died on Friday at Old Windsor, at an advanced age. This Nobleman was for many years Chairman of the Committees in the House of Lords.

The Printer of the Intelligencer is filling his columns with letters to show the distress of the British emigrants to North America; but when you come to examine the places mentioned in these letters, you find that it is in British America,—that is, in the country to which his Majesty's Ministers have been shipping their fellow-subjects, that all this distress prevails. Does this man think that he serves the cause of his masters by such an exposure? He is almost as unfortunate in his present essays on emigration as he was in his last, when he brought out the fact, that the Leeds emigrants on their arrival in Canada suffered considerable privations and failed to obtain employment, but that they no sooner got into the territory of the United States, than the wheel of fortune made a revolution, and they were placed in situations of comfort and comparative prosperity. What can be his motive for dwelling upon so unfortunate a contrast? Does he not know that Quebec and Montreal, from which the letters in his last paper are dated, are both dependencies on the British Government, or does he suppose his readers to be so destitute of geographical knowledge as not to possess that information?—Leeds Mercury.

REMEDY FOR BURNS AND SCALDS.—A Correspondent, on whose judgment and veracity we can fully rely, urges us to publish the following simple cure for Burns and Scalds:—Oatmeal and cold water, mixed up together to a poultice form, and laid upon the part burnt or scalded, gives instant relief from pain—when dry, wet the meal again, and do not suffer it to become hard; where possible, wrap the part up with the poultice upon it, and when closed, it will retain its own moisture—if not, a little cold water is at hand. Our Correspondent recommends its trial in bad cases; three times he has experienced its incredible effects upon himself. A rather deep burn with the hot handle of a pipe had continued inflamed and painful to the succeeding day, and a large blister would, when burst, have left a deep wound—upon the part he applied the Oatmeal and got instant ease, kept the poultice on two or three days, and occasionally moistened it with water. At the end of that time, he was much surprised to find the wound to have disappeared, covered over, where the blister was, with a dry horny substance, which soon came off, without any sore. If laid on before the skin or flesh are destroyed by the supervening inflammation, it prevents blisters and sores, and kept for a night by way of poultice, most assuredly cures. The grand point is to lose no time in the application.—Leeds Mercury.

ELOPEMENT.—A letter from Boulogne-sur-Mer states, that on Tuesday se'nnight, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, notwithstanding the vigilance of the French Police, who, it was understood, were directed to be on the alert, to prevent the circumstance being carried into effect, a gallant young Officer of Dragoon Guards, cantoned in the vicinity of Calais, eloped with a lovely and accomplished young Lady, niece to a worthy Baronet well known in the West of England; both in the disguise of domestics to some friends who accompanied them. On the following morning they were seen prosecuting their journey to the North of England, and probably ere this the indissoluble knot is tied.

POETRY.

THE MOSES OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—It is likely that your journal will contain some notice of the Cast, now exhibiting at the King's Mews, of the Moses of Michael Angelo, a statue justly, it is believed, esteemed the noblest monument of modern Art.

You probably know, that that work was the subject of a Sonnet of Giambattista Felice Zappi, a native of Imola, and a Roman advocate of the highest reputation for his professional attainments. In poetry, Zappi was no less eminent than in law. His writings published are very few; but they are such, as Tiraboschi observes, as to place him on an equality with the most illustrious poets: and Mr. Roscoe, if I recollect rightly, remarks, that the Sonnet I allude to is esteemed a work of genius, bidding as fair for immortality as the great production of the Sister Art.

The Sonnet may be acceptable to your readers who visit the exhibition of the Moses. Should it lead any there who would not otherwise have gone, I shall be happy to think, that, by communicating it, I have been instrumental in contributing to the reward of the exhibitor, to whose great exertions and good taste the public seems to me to owe a great deal.

The Statue and Sonnet are mentioned, with the highest praise, by the late Mr. Eustace, in his Classical Tour. A translation of the Sonnet is given by Mr. Roscoe, in his Life of Leo the Tenth, but I have not the book here; so I have sent you another version, which perhaps you will think equally liberal, and not less true to the spirit of the original.—I am, Sir, your faithful servant, N. N.

Hamstead, Dec. 11, 1817.

PER IL MOSE COLOSSO DI MARMO DI MICHEL ANGELO NEL TEMPIO DI T. PIETRO IN VINCOLI.

Ch'è costui, che in sì gran pietra scolto
Siede Gigante, e le più illustri è conte
Opere dell' arte avanza, e ha vive e pronte
Le labbra sì, che le parole ascolto
Questi è Mosè. Ben mel' diceva il folto
Quor del mento, e'l doppio raggio in fronte:
Questi è Mosè, quando scemdea dal monte
E gran parte del Nume avea nel volto.
Tal' era allor, che le sonanti e vaste
Acque ei sospese a sé d'intorno, e tale
Quand' il Mar chiuse, e ne fé tomba altrui,
E voi sue Turbe un rio vitello alzaste,
Alzato aveste imago a questa eguale
Ch'era men fallo l'adorar costui.

TRANSLATION.

SCULPTUR'D in stone, what Giant form sits here,
Excelling all renown'd that Art affords,
Whose lips so pregnant and alive appear,
That I, unconscious, listen for his words?
Well does his flowing beard declare the name;
And double rays of glory on his brow,
Of Moses,—such as from the Mount he came,
His face yet beaming with celestial glow:
Such was he, when the vast and sounding wave
Round him retir'd rebuk'd,—such when it flow'd
O'er the Egyptian Host,—a whelming grave!—
And you his flock, to a base Calf have bow'd;
Have rais'd it's image equal to this, sublime,
Which to have worship'd had been less a crime.

The original is copied from an Edition of the Rime of Zappi, and of Fausina Maratti his wife,—published at Venice, 1731.*

* It is to be found also, though with considerable variations, in the Parnasso Italiano, Vol. 42. p. 197. His wife the Poetess was a daughter of Maratti the Painter.—Exam.

EMBALMING.—We quote the following lines out of an Elegy just published on the Death of the Princess CHARLOTTE, not only because we agree with the author in his just reprobation of the barbarous practice itself, but also with a view to ascertain whether the embalment of the Princess's remains was not mixed up with a certain interested object; we mean the fee of 1000*l.*, said to be given to the King's Surgeon and Apothecary. We should be glad to know out of whose pockets this fee is drawn?

"Yet what avails it to embalm a frame,
Which now bears nothing but a splendid name,
Or strive to rescue from devouring Time
What Heav'n has doom'd to perish in its prime?
Alas! how little can our caution do,
Except to mangle and expose it too!
Foul, savage practice, which the modest state
Of wedded secrecy must loathe and hate!
Can spices lend a lustre to that eye,
Or teach that heart to beat, that breast to sigh?
The vanish'd crimson of those lips renew,
And softly touch them with ambrosial dew?
Recall the smile that dimpled on that cheek,
And play'd in kindness o'er the poor and weak?
Vain, foolish hope! the Muse alone can give Those beauties life, and make their owner live;
The Muse alone will man's past actions scan,
And force her lessons on surviving man."

WALTHAM FOREST.

Lines written on seeing the following jeu d'esprit in a Handbill posted up in Plaistow, as a "CAUTION" to prevent persons from supporting the intended inclosure of Hainault or Waltham Forest, viz.

"The fault is great in Man or Woman,
Who steals a Goose from off a Common;
But what can plead that Man's excuse,
Who steals a Common from a Goose!!?"

Does he, who seems to plead a Goose's cause,
Not read, or not believe, his Maker's laws?
Who says—"Set not thy heart on worldly pelf,
But love thy neighbour as thou lov'st thyself?"
Or may we gather from this smart excuse,
He'd starve his FELLOW-CREATURES while he feeds a Goose!

PACKED JURIES.

MR. EXAMINER,—Turning over the pages of Burnet's History of his Own Times, the following passage accidentally presented itself to my view:—"He (Sydney) desired the Sheriffs, that brought the warrant for his execution, would consider how guilty they were of his blood, who had not returned a fair Jury, but one packt, and as they were directed by the King's Solicitor: he spoke to them, not for his own sake, but for their sakes." One of the Sheriffs was struck with this and wept.

My motive, Mr. Examiner, for sending you this is, that you may circulate it in your Paper, that future Sheriffs may not be visited by such distressing compunction of mind, for base compliance with the interested views of a King's Solicitor.

MODERN ARCHITECTURE.

MR. EXAMINER,—Your Correspondent, "An Admirer of Architecture, but not a Builder," is, I suspect, a "Builder's Measure,"* for the slang with which his elegant epistle is interlarded, gives ample proof of his intimacy with the dishonest practices of the very lowest order of Builders; and his defiance of the grammatical concords, shows that his head consists of a material, whose specific gravity is much less than that whereof he would insinuate mine is composed.

* Many of this class are intelligent and honourable men; but, I am sorry to say, that a large portion do not stick at trifles, to use a vulgar phrase.

Though I am an Architect, as he assumes, the "cap" he has prepared does not fit me, whence, as well as from the circumstance of my never yet having had "to weep" for a deficiency of either practice or patronage, I have the vanity to conclude the "Admirer" has numbered me among his chosen few.

"An Architect," says this Admirer of our Art, "is an honourable and gentlemanlike calling"—Where got you that definition, Master Matthew? An Architect then is a calling,—"and such it should be."—Which, Master Matthew? the Architect or the calling?—"but it is now disgraced by Architect-Builders, who have pushed out of fashion Builder-Architects, if any such there was." That many of these Builder-Architects did exist, numbers could testify, and with sorrow. Were it decorous, or necessary, I would produce a list that might possibly put the "Admirer" to the blush. The Architect-Builders have, I believe, an existence in the "Admirer's" brain only, or he has merely rung a change upon the words, and exhibited the same animal, to silence me with a tu quoque. VASARI describes the species as follows:—"Architetti plebei, prosontuosi, e senza disegno, fatto quasi a caso, senza servar decoro arte o ordine nessuno prodotte tutte le cose loro, mastroose, e peggior, che le Tedesche che volgarmente si chiamano Gottiche." The right breed he distinguishes thus:—"Che lavorava più per desiderio di gloria che d'accumulare d'oro." VITRUVIUS knew something of these Architetti plebei; when he said "Animadverto potius indoctos, quam doctos gratia superare."—Pref. lib. 3.

I am apt to think that the Builders will not feel themselves much indebted to their champion, for his little effusion last Sunday, inasmuch, as if there exist such Builders as he seems to be acquainted with, who pay Architects a per centage for winking at their dishonesty, I know no epithet in the English language sufficiently strong to apply to such wretches. The Architect and Builder, in such cases, are rogues "whom stripes may move, not kindness." Bad as the "Admirer" thinks my opinion of Builders is, I confess he makes them much worse than I can for a moment believe to be the fact. Loose characters are certainly found attached to all professions and employments in life, but when the "Admirer" tells you, that out of one hundred and four Architects (for that is about the number now practising in London) there are only eleven honest enough to resist a bribe from an inferior for betraying their employers, I profess I do not attach any belief to his statement.

It is not at all to be wondered at, that an Architect should have a predilection for a particular builder.—I avow myself, Mr. Examiner, to be in this predicament: it is quite as natural as your being attached to your shoemaker or tailor, whom you will doubtless continue in your employ, as long as they conduct themselves properly, and while they enjoy your favours undivided; it will be their interest to pay the more attention to your orders.

I regret it has not however been my lot to meet with one of these Builders, who can bring the work to "uniformity, utility, and practability," (a new and curious division of the science.)—Much to my cost and loss of time, I have had generally to encounter very wooden-headed gentry, who, instead of assisting, have unintentionally, I doubt not, tried every way but the straightforward one, to carry my ideas into execution, when I have unfortunately left them to themselves.

The calumny levelled at Mr. SMIRKE confirms me in the opinion, that the Admirer knows little except of the practices of that class of builders which I have above anathematized.

No. 38.

ON THE DOCTRINE OF ETERNAL TORMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—You will, I think, agree with me, that whatever tends to weaken the iron rule of that ugly and savage bel-dame Superstition, should be noticed and cherished by those who wish to extend the fair and gentle dominion of Charity. To eradicate error, however manifestly pernicious, is not the work of a day; and, for my part, I am not one of those extreme persons, who, because all that is desirable cannot be obtained, either in Politics or Theology, will not consent to accept a portion, and thus fail to make any advance towards the wished-for end. On the contrary, I think it wise to accept the aid of all who will assist to expose what is of evil tendency, even though they stop a good way short of the mark which I have deemed necessary to aim at; just as, if going on a long and hazardous journey, I should be happy to avail myself of the company of a judicious traveller, who was only proceeding a third of my way.

But to my object. It is to recommend to your readers' notice a book recently published under the title of "Eternal Punishment proved to be not Suffering but Privation; and Immortality dependent on Spiritual Regeneration, &c." By a Member of the Church of England.* The writer has dedicated his labours to the present Bishop of Landaff,—Herbert Marsh,—deeming him "the first Theological Critic of the present day." I much doubt the accuracy of this opinion, and am apt to think, that the Dedicator himself will more than partake of such doubts, as soon as this polemical "Father in God" has vouchsafed to supply him with a criticism on his performance.

The main object of the author is to shew, as well from the light of Reason as from the general tenor and particular texts of the Scriptures, (for he is an earnest believer in every scriptural passage) the falsity of this doctrine of Eternal Punishment; and to prove also, on the same grounds, that there is no future punishment for the wicked, but the negative, though to some fearful, one of Annihilation.—This is therefore an attempt to root out a belief at once revolting to reason and nature, one which, as the writer says, has "shed a gloom over the closing hours of many Christians;" and I may add, what is worse, a belief which has but too often embittered their previous life.

One of the author's arguments is, that it is impossible eternal misery should be God's decree, since we are not able to obey it. It is thus forcibly stated:—

"It is man's duty to desire God's will to be done in all things.—That which is his duty he must be naturally capable of performing.—Man is incapable of desiring that the majority of his fellow-creatures should be eternally miserable in hell.—Then it cannot be his duty to desire it.—Then it cannot be God's will."—P. 27.

This is a tolerably fair specimen of his logic, and will give your readers some idea of his general reasoning. The argument itself, if pushed farther, would perhaps go to defend all infidelity and difference of religion, at least if it is admitted that belief is not a thing of choice; since every man may plead "God's will" in favour of his particular opinion.* The following passage is perhaps more conclusive with believers, granting, what the author thinks he has satisfactorily proved, that the sentence passed on Adam was simply death:—

* St. Paul sometimes talked like a philosopher:—"It is God," says he, "that worketh in us, both to will and to do, of his own good pleasure."

"If the death of Christ turns the sentence pronounced in mercy upon Adam's nature,—In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,—into a new grant of existence, productive only of eternal, unvarying misery, how can it be justified, as the word of him who cannot lie, that it is good tidings to those, who, but for it, would have known infinitely less misery both in kind and duration?"

How indeed!—The author elsewhere observes—"To shew that the doctrine is necessary to uphold morality, it must be proved that it is generally believed; and that, where believed, it is effectual to this purpose; because, if not believed, it confirms what I have said, that it is useless. If believed, and not effectual, it is worse than useless, because it must exclude the love of God,* the indispensable concomitant of spiritual life; for, however we may in submission kiss the rod that chastens us, it must be done, I think, in the hope of conciliating the hand that guides it; and, being the suggestion of hope, we should cease to do so when despair prevails."

The following Picture of Hell is drawn, I think, with considerable power, and may not be unworthy the attention of those who believe that the Eternal Spirit is indeed "a God of Mercy:"—

"This doctrine, unlike every thing that comes from God, in proportion as it prevails, excludes heavenly-mindedness,—it weakens faith,—it destroys love. In any one to whom it is proposed it must cause doubt; enforce it, you excite distrust; establish it, and you cause horror and despair. If this is the light of Scripture, enter with it a few steps into the dark profound; see the bituminous lake thickly peopled with such things as we are; see hatred and malevolence pervading all and towards all; see torturing agony filling every limb, every muscle, every nerve. To help your imagination; fancy you see all the inhabitants of this great metropolis assembled, swell your idea to the whole population of the empire, add Europe's millions, summon Asia's myriads, and when Africa and America shall have augmented the tide, plunge them all into this state of thankless, thriftless misery for some short period; contemplate them here; and if you have the heart to do it, wish them IMMORTALITY.—Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great wickedness? Can it be better to fall into the hands of man than of God? Since you would abhor yourself if you could but wish this, can you love God whilst you think it is his pleasure? You can, only by persuading yourself that there is some way, to us unknown, of reconciling this doctrine to the divine attributes; which would be admitting that for which I am contending,—that they are, apparently at least, inconsistent."

I shall quote no more, leaving those who like such inquiries to search for themselves, believing that they will be greatly interested, if not convinced, by the author's arguments, and, above all, by his mode of treating the question, which, as it strikes me, is very judicious and graceful, such as one might expect from a patient, painstaking, candid, and benevolent enquirer.

What this inquisitive "Member of the Church of England" expects, I know not; but that he will be loudly denied by the Orthodox I have little doubt, and what is more, will soon be denounced as being a theological mongrel,—something not far from a Socinian, or a disciple of Origen. The Socinians, I believe, are of opinion, that the torments of the wicked will at last terminate in the annihilation of their souls; and the learned Origen taught, if I rightly understand his doctrine, that God,

* The author has before observed,—"As perfect love casteth out fear, so I am inclined to think, perfect fear casteth out love." after judging that the wicked had suffered torment enough, would render them eternally happy. For which opinion, however, the "Established" of his day persecuted him with much Christian violence; and a pious Abbot declared, that "he saw in a vision divers heresiarchs in hell, and Ongen among the rest, covered with confusion, flames, and horror."*

For my part, Mr. Examiner, I believe in none of all this, though I certainly prefer the writer's idea of annihilation to the senseless and savage notion of Eternal Torments in Hell Fire! It appears to me, that God has in this world given to his creatures, on the whole, a happy existence; and if they are to live in another state, it seems nothing but rational to suppose that the GREAT AND GOOD BEING will make them at least equally happy there. At all events, I cannot for a moment imagine that the Omnipotent can be thwarted in his scheme, whatever it may be; and therefore I conclude that it is every way salutary to submit to the order of nature with complacency,—to make ourselves and others as comfortable as we can to the last,—and then to lie down calmly, and go to our last sleep, "hoping all things," but being terrified at nothing.

J. O.

* This satisfied Person was a Roman Catholic. He seems to have enjoyed the brimstone prospect with almost as much delight as a Methodist Missionary of the present day, whose Journal contained the following passages:—

Extracts from Brother Carey's and Brother Thomas's Journal:—
 "1793. June 16. Lord's Day. A little recovered from my sickness;—met for prayer and exhortation in my cabin: had a dispute with a French Deist. * 1794. Jan. 26. Lord's Day. Found much pleasure in reading 'Edwards's Sermon on the Justice of God in the Damnation of Sinners.' * April 6. Had some sweetness to-day, especially in reading Edwards's Sermon!"

MR. JUSTICE ABBOTT.

MR. EXAMINER,—The mildness of character attributed by the upholders of the present system to our religious Cabinet, who, out of horror forsooth, of profaneness and blasphemy, not from any political rancour, prosecuted a poor undefended individual; the vindictiveness which, according to their opponents, was evidenced, by their dividing into three indictments what in fact was only matter for one trial, has been already dwelt upon at length by all the political writers of the day. But a remarkable circumstance, that occurred during the first day's trial, has not even been adverted to by any: Mr. Justice Abbott, on that day, afforded an instance of a singularly convenient piece of simplicity. He was well aware of Mr. Hone's publications being blasphemous parodies of both the Bible and Common Prayer, but on Mr. Canning's parody from the Antijacobin being quoted, he defended the composition, on the ground of its being a parody of Milton, and not the Scriptures. Was this a premeditated quibble, or has Mr. Justice Abbott never then read the Benedicite ("O all ye works of the Lord," &c.) of our Morning Service; which is merely a copy of the Song of the three Children in the Apocrypha? It is a parody of both the Scriptures and the Morning Service. But Mr. Justice Abbott only felt aware of Mr. Hone's blasphemy, not Mr. Canning's. Mr. C.'s poetry is besides a parody of that fine passage in Job, "And thou Leviathan," &c. But notwithstanding this convenient simplicity of the Judge on that occasion, the two following days three different Juries brought in verdicts of Not Guilty. Ministers may learn from this result, that the cry of Religion in danger, which had so often served the purpose before, when urged as a pretence for political persecution, can be, and I trust will hereafter always be, successfully resisted, by the distrust due to tyranny and hypocrisy. X. O. F.

P.S. The Morning Post of this day considers Hone as found guilty,—saying, the verdicts are no acquittal, as a Judge decided that the parodies were blasphemous! Is it come to this, that the opinion of a Judge should be the criterion of acquittal, and not the verdict of a Jury?

CLERK OF PENTONVILLE.

MR. EXAMINER,—Your readers no doubt recollect, that, in your paper of the 21st ult., I received a gross attack from "Joseph Read, 15, Pleasant-row, Pentonville," for opposing the interment of a corpse, without the delivery of the necessary certificate, or (presuming it might only be left behind) the deposit of a small sum, as a pledge for its production in a few days, when that pledge was to be restored.

Joseph Read says, he deposited this sum in my hand; it therefore became him to see that the certificate should be forthcoming, rather than to attack an individual in the discharge of his duty, by "a gross and scandalous misrepresentation," containing a disgraceful charge. Your impartial readers will see the propriety of those epithets, when they notice, that he makes no mention of the certificate, nor of the piece of money being left as a deposit and pledge for its future production, but asserts, that it was required to be paid, in order to interment.

Now, Sir, though Mr. Read, in his second letter, which appeared in your paper of the 4th inst., appears to have been "little aware" that his first letter should call forth the answer, you did me the favour to insert in your paper on the 28th ult., and although he frankly confesses, that he is "most likely very ignorant of the general duties of either Clerk or Undertaker," yet, Sir, making the greatest allowance for the plenitude of his ignorance, he must surely know the difference between money being paid and money being merely deposited, or pledged, in order to be returned on the performance of a certain condition, namely, the delivery of the certificate; nor can this concealment have arisen from a worthy motive.

Mr. Read not redeeming his pledge honourably, by producing the document, and the parish searcher, on being applied to, being uninformed of the death of the party, it was then ascertained that no certificate was in existence, and the cause of death became involved, in doubt, from that circumstance, joined to the unjustifiable attempt at interment, when the Undertaker knew, that such paper could not be produced.—It then became a duty to give notice to the proper legal officer of that event, that he might exercise his discretion, who has no doubt obtained that satisfactory information, which has rendered the painful extremity of his duty unnecessary.

Mr. Read's "heart-rending scene" appears to be another specimen of misrepresentation, and seems to be an attempt to ascertain the magnitude of your readers' credulity, whose feelings are attempted to be wrought upon by a tale of fictitious woe. My informant (one of the mourners) assures me, there was but one relative attended, and smiles at the idea of "weeping females;" and further, that the deceased had occupied apartments in Mr. Read's house for some weeks, which she quitted about a fortnight prior to her decease. However, though Mr. Read has failed to produce the certificate, or to give any information of the subject, it has now been ascertained, on good authority, of what complaint the person died; and the end of its being brought forward, after interment, is attained; whereby Mr. Read's pledge is released, and will be restored to him, whenever he chooses to send for it.

Requesting you will do me the favour to insert the above. I now take my final leave of the subject, subscribing myself, Sir, yours, very respectfully.

CHURCH CRAFT, OR NOT?

SIR,—Before I reply to the question put by your Correspondent (B. C.) "By what authority the Parson of Lambeth claimed fees for churching and sprinkling?" I shall, as connected with the subject, briefly state, that before the 4th century of the Christian era, Marriage was considered a civil rite only. But the Laity having sunk "into a state of barbarism, the Clergy took advantage of their stupidity and superstition, and demanded offerings, (which before were voluntary) as due to them by the divine law; and in progress of their ecclesiastical jurisdiction, they brought the Contract of Marriage under their jurisdiction; and, to delude the ignorant, had it accompanied with religious forms and solemnities. And in this age, by the decrees of Pope Sylvester, Julius, and Sericius, all Marriages must pass the benediction of the Priest, and to be esteemed little less than sacrilege to omit it; so that this branch of jurisdiction by degrees offered a pecuniary revenue, which the Clergy did not fail to improve."

In the 3d century, when corruptions were creeping in, "Baptism was ordinarily to be performed by a Bishop, and the time limited for it was Easter and Whitsuntide, and the form was altered from dipping to sprinkling, and the place from rivers and fountains to baptisterrons, with divers superstitious rites;" some of which, in more enlightened times, would be considered blasphemous. But omitting the forms of words, which are too shocking to be named, your Correspondent may be amused by reading, that "Athanasius, in the 5th century, (playing the Bishop amongst his scholars) baptized a Boy in sport, which was confirmed, notwithstanding, by the Bishop of Alexandria. Pope John the 14th christened the Great Bell of the Church of Lateran, calling it John, which was done to drive away evil spirits, and to prevent any ill accident that might happen by lightning and tempest; and Pius the 5th baptized the Duke of Alvas' Standard, and called it Margaret."—"Isidorus, in the 7th century, said, that if children were not baptized, they were in a state of damnation; and so credulous were his disciples, that one of them, whose child had died and was buried, was taken up and christened, and had his father's name given him. Offerings at Easter were made to the Priests for their services on the innovation of Infant Baptism, which before was unknown to the Church; and Dr. Barlow, who formerly filled the Chair at Oxford, a person of great learning and eminency, in a printed letter hath these words, "I do believe, and know, that there is neither precept nor example in Scripture for Pædo-baptism; that Tertullian condemns it as an unwarrantable custom. The truth is, I do believe, Pædo-baptism, how or by whom, I know not, came into the world in the 2d century, and in the 3d and 4th began to be practised, though not generally, and defended as lawful from text grossly misunderstood, John 3. 5. Upon the like gross mistake of John 6. 53, they did for many centuries, both in the Greek and Latin Church, communicate infants and give them the Lords Supper; and I do confess they might do both as well as either."

Your Correspondent, from the foregoing statement, will, if he thinks for himself, infer, "by what authority" the Parson at Lambeth claims fees for churching and sprinkling, and probably will be ready to ask himself the question—"By what authority did I take my wife to be churched and child to be sprinkled?" And if he shall muse upon the subject, may complain, with Chaucer's Plowman, against the Clergy of his age—

"Their titling and their offering both
 "They clemeth it by possession;
 "Therof wil they none forgo,
 "But robben men by ransome."

THE COAL TRADE.

"Detect his fib, his sophistry, in vain,
 "The creature's at his dirty work again."—POPE.

SIR,—The above pleasant couplet must have struck you as wondrously appropriate to its position, in your Paper of last Sunday, as the motto to an essay from the pen of one, who (having on a former occasion presented himself, by implication at least, as decently skilled in logic, and then affecting to deprecate any allusion, such as had been made, to some rather indifferent grammar and worse figures which he had used; upon the plea of his being but an "ignorant Coalheaver") proceeds to repeat, in a style much altered for the worse, some of his former sayings, which I consider to have been already more particularly noticed than they merited, and certainly so far sufficiently answered as to require no farther attention from me. I shall however trouble you with a remark or two upon some parts of J. C.'s last letter; and he must excuse me, if, from the rounding of his periods and the turning of his expressions, I feel something like a doubt of his identity with an "ignorant Coalheaver;" though I am free to say, that the sentiments they were designed to express are perfectly in unison with such a character, and that he is so far consistent in his personation of it. In some other little particulars, his performance is rather at variance with itself: for instance, he charges me with "personal abuse of himself and others,"—with having written "a tissue of personal slander,"—with "indulging in crooked habits of observation" and "private animosity and personal rancour," and "unworthy feelings;" yet he avows (which is certainly true) that he has "no knowledge of my name;" and to prove that he has not, he works himself into a most outrageous passion, grows foul mouthed, and deals in most unseemly epithets, such as "mean, despicable, cowardly, anonymous slanderer;" and so on: and all for what? Because, for reasons which I stated at full in my last letter, I (very properly as I still think) declined his invitation to "authenticate it with my name;" which, I repeat, could have no weight with those who know me not, and could answer no direct purpose of my antagonist. For the abuse which I am charged with, as well as the slander and such like bad language, those who know me will never believe me capable of it. Those to whom I am unknown will seek it in vain in my writings. In truth, Sir, it is not my forte; nor have I any taste for it. With respect to the personality of which I am accused, J. C. will allow I cannot even guess at him; and I again declare (I believe I have said it before) the persons of Messrs. Tullock and Baker I have seen, as far as I can recollect, but once; sure I am I should not know were I to meet them.—I am no wise connected with them, nor do my personal interests clash with theirs; for I am neither meter nor dealer, nor otherwise affected by their practices, than as one of the public, and a consumer of coals; nor have I ever spoken or written of them but in terms fully warranted by what I have heard and seen, and what I know a host of witnesses were prepared to prove on oath before a Committee of the House of Lords, in the last Session of Parliament, had an opportunity been afforded. So much for the charge of "personal slander," "abuse, rancour," &c. which must be confessed to come, with a most unmentionable grace, from one who acknowledges, in the midst of his passion, that he knows not the man of whom he speaks; and were he asked for a description of me, would be equally incompetent to give one by which I could be known, as he would a true one of Confucius the Chinese Philosopher, or Nebuchodonosor the King of Babylon.

What spring then can have impelled him to the utterance of such a philippic, and in a tone so seemingly subdued by rage? Perhaps he has mistaken me for somebody else; or did he but indulge a natural propensity to calling ill-names? or did he feel empowered, by a blush-proof face, to tax another with faults of his own committing? or was he hurried to excess by his desire to set up to the character he assumed of an "ignorant Coalheaver?" Then has his conduct been silly in the extreme—excessively indecent—insupportably dull—or in very bad taste. His irresistibly delicate invitation to act the insinuator, however we may differ in opinion as to the meaning of the term, with, I fear, prove as successful as his more warmly pressed one to give him my name; nor could its acceptance possibly yield him more gratification.

His last letter has, I apprehend, been as unfortunate, in point of logic, as its predecessor; for I see nothing in his paragraph about the City or Surrey Districts, or his quotation from Robert Hills, but may be taken for proof, if not acknowledgment, of abuses in Westminster calling loudly for redress. To Westminster I have hitherto confined my observations, for the following amongst other reasons:—First, I could gain more extensive and credible information, and confirm it by personal observation in Westminster, without going out of my way:—Secondly, I had heard of certain jugglings and intrigues to get the Westminster Meters' Bill passed:—And, lastly, I read in that celebrated Bill a clause, investing the Lords of the Treasury with powers of summarily reforming any abuses of the kind, which might exist in Westminster: and I felt anxious that those powers should not lie dormant for want of due and public notice of the existence of abuses which required their exertion; for I hold it a most barefaced begging of the question to say—"Why speak of abuses prevailing in Westminster, when shameful practices are carried on in the City, or illicit doings performed in Surrey?"

Fearing that I have already occupied too much of your space in answering J. C., and not being at present sufficiently at leisure to apply myself to the curdling of this letter, or introducing, as I could wish, some few observations, more to my original purpose of exposing the frauds and connivances at frauds in the Coal Trade, I shall conclude with repeating my question as to the case of Mr. Clayton:—if his dismissal prove any thing, what is proved by no steps having hitherto been taken against the honest dealer of Arundel Wharf, either for the deficiency of measure, for the working at forbidden hours, or the improper procuring (not to say forging) of the Meter's name to the Tickets?—I remain, Sir, your very obedient servant,

DICKENS.

Jan. 8, 1818.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Sir,—Your Correspondent J. C., of whom I really expected we should hear no more after the answer which was given to his former letter, having chosen to renew his unqualified denials of the charges preferred against the Westminster Coal Meters, and to accompany those denials with much abuse of the person who, through the medium of your paper, first drew the notice of the public to this subject, calling aloud at the same time for names and witnesses and evidence, I hope you will oblige me by the insertion of this open declaration, that I know those charges to be well founded: that I am possessed of, what at least appears to me and to many others to be, good substantial evidence, capable of being supported by the testimony, on oath, of many credible witnesses, that the Meters have been guilty, and are still in the daily commission of the practices alleged against them; and that I can prove the truth of almost every individual fact stated by J. C.'s opponent, and of many more with which he is perhaps unacquainted.—Is it asked, why I have not produced these witnesses, and these proofs?—or, why their names are not declared? The latter, it may well be conceived, there are good and sufficient reasons for not doing; and the former I was fully prepared to do before a Committee of the House of Lords, had not the addition of the clause by which the power of rectifying these matters is given to the Lords of the Treasury,—(of the refusal to exercise which power, I may yet have much to say)—deprived me of the opportunity; though that clause was not of itself sufficient to secure the passage of the Meters' Bill through the House of Commons, had it not been strongly supported by that busy spirit of pettifoggery and intrigue (very proper and legal,—and perfectly constitutional and honest, no doubt) which is so well known to attend the passing of what are called Private Bills. The other mode of trying the sufficiency of my witnesses, which is hinted at by J. C., I shall exercise my own discretion in pursuing or rejecting; though, should I that way incline, I am not to be deterred from attempting it by his Italics, nor even Capitals, if he please to use them; nor by any idle fears of being stiled an informer by any miserable thing that is capable of committing or abetting such practices as he has stapt forward to defend:—nor would the moiety of the penalties, which he with such tempting grace holds out as an inducement, be found to influence in so doing the conduct of your obedient servant,

THOS. BRADFELD.

GUILDHALL.

Friday, Jan. 18.

UNDERHILL v. WEBSTER.—This was an information founded upon the Act of the 47th of Geo. 3. cap. 68. commonly stiled the Coal Act. The offence charged upon the defendant was, that, on the 19th of December last, he, having brought a quantity of coals to the house of the complainant, and the latter having desired that they should be measured, did unlawfully refuse to submit to the order, and drove away the waggon with its contents.

Mr. ADOLPHUS, who attended on the part of the complainant, stated that the defendant was a carman in the employ of Mr. Pocock, proprietor of St. Bride's Wharf. The complainant (a very respectable tradesman) wished it to be understood, that in laying the present information he was actuated by no other motive than that of public utility. He had repeatedly been a very material sufferer from the nefarious practices of carmen, or their employers, and he at length felt himself bound, for the protection as well of himself as the public at large, to step forward and endeavour, by the force of example, to check the depredations of a set of men, who were every day becoming more and more audacious in their dishonest practices. The Learned Counsel then called the following witnesses in support of his case:—

Mr. Underhill, glass-cutter, residing in Bartlett's-buildings, Holborn, deposed to the following effect:—Having ordered 43 sacks of coals of a Mr. Hedgeman (this gentleman is a collector of King's taxes and poor-rates!), living in Little New-street, near Gough-square, they were brought to his house in a waggon on the 18th of December, by the defendant, from Pocock's wharf, near Blackfriars-bridge. Having so often had reason to complain of short measure, he wished that the present load should be measured previous to being placed in his cellar; and on the arrival of the waggon, sent out his servant with an order to the carman to that effect.

James Humphries, servant to the last witness, deposed, that on being sent out with the order, as stated by his master, he observed two sacks in the waggon, which, from a certain look appearance, he imagined to be short of the legal measure. He accordingly requested that the carman would measure one of those two sacks previous to shooting them. The carman accordingly took one of the sacks upon his shoulders, for the purpose, as the witness supposed, to turn out the contents to be measured, but in fact he turned it over his shoulder, and pitched the coals into the cellar, where his fellow-servant in waiting, with a shovel, immediately commenced spreading them abroad. The witness then repeated his request with the second sack; but this was served in the same way. Mr. Underhill then came out, and insisted that the whole should be re-measured; but the defendant still endeavoured to evade the order. At length, however, he chose a sack which seemed to be better filled than the others, and placing it on one side, said he would measure that presently. The contents of this sack were accordingly shot out on the pavement, and afterwards re-measured, when, though it was one selected by the defendant himself, it was found to be deficient of the legal quantity by nearly half a bushel! The complainant on this went for the City Coal Meter, for the purpose of having all the coals legally measured. Before, however, the latter could arrive, the carman had driven off with the waggon, and the remaining sacks. The complainant immediately proceeded to the house of Mr. Hedgeman, the vendor, where he found the defendant employed in shooting the coals into Mr. H.'s cellar. About half an hour afterwards, the defendant returned with one of Mr. Pocock's clerks, who endeavoured to throw the censure entirely upon the carman, and wished much to compromise the matter; but Mr. Underhill, indignant at the offer, firmly refused, and expressed a determination to bring the matter before the public.

The Magistrate (Mr. Alderman BINGHAM) asked what penalty the defendant was subject to upon conviction, and how the money was applied?

Mr. PAINÉ, the Chief Clerk, read the clause relative to the penalty, and the application thereof. From this it appeared, that if the offence was satisfactorily proved, the fine to be inflicted was "any sum not exceeding 10*l*." the mitigation thereof being discretionary with the Magistrate. With respect to the way in which the money was to be applied, the Act directed that half should go to the informer, and the other half to the King.

The defendant did not appear personally, but a clerk to Mr. Pocock attended, and said, that the former could not attend in consequence of illness. He did not wish to deny the charge made against him, but pleaded ignorance of the law, and a large family, in mitigation of punishment.

Mr. ADOLPHUS, in reply to this plea, said, that it was a mere shift of Pocock the employer, out of whose pocket the penalty, whatever it might be, would eventually be paid.

The worthy MAGISTRATE, having considered a few moments, said, that there could be no doubt of the offence charged in the information having been committed, and it was important to the public that such practices should be visited with due severity, in order that they should be checked. His Worship then ordered that the defendant should pay a penalty of 8*l.* and costs.

Here the case ended. It excited considerable interest, and the Office was much crowded.

LAW.

"As if from a rubbish cart a continually increasing and ever shapeless mass of LAW is from time to time shot down upon the heads of the people; and out of this rubbish, and at his peril, is each man left to pick out what belongs to him. Thus, in pouring forth Law, does the Government, as it is written, rain down snares."—BENTHAM.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

THE CONDUCT OF SOLICITORS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, on Monday, in the case of Troward, a Solicitor, felt himself indispensably bound to make some observations, though the case had been fixed for the first Seal. It was necessary he should do it now, in order to correct any mistake which might exist on the question. It was simply this—whether a Solicitor, in the midst of a law suit, can refuse to go on, and at the same time not deliver up the papers entrusted to him for his client, merely because the client was indebted to him? This point was of some importance, not only to Solicitors but to suitors, and it was the bounden duty of the Court to see that the interests of the latter were not put into hazard by the caprice of the former. He held it therefore to be clear, that no Solicitor of this Court could, on any pretext, say that he had such a lien on the papers, that he would neither give them up nor proceed with the suit. The Court would never suffer the interests of his Majesty's subjects to be trifled with in that manner, for if a Solicitor chose to desist from his duty in the middle of a suit, he was indisputably bound to shew every paper to the new Solicitor in the cause, and to shew them at every time they were required. If an enquiry were found necessary before the Master, the said Solicitor was bound, if he did not give up the papers, to attend every meeting before such Master with the papers at his own expense; but he could never be presumed to have a lien of such a kind as was alleged. This was the rule of the Court, and to it he should peremptorily adhere.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY—My Lord, no blame can in this case attach to my client, he having no such intention.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR—Certainly not. I don't say one word against him; nor should I be justified in so doing. What I mean is, that the practice of the Court should be understood, both for the benefit of Solicitors and suitors.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Thursday, Jan. 15.

THE LATE RIOTS IN THE METROPOLIS.

BECKWITH v. WOOD, ESQ. AND ANOTHER.

This was an action brought by Mr. Beckwith, gun-smith, of Skinner-street, to recover from the Hundred a compensation in damages for the loss he sustained by the demolition of his shop, and the plunder of his stock, by the mob, on the 2d of December, 1816. The present action was brought against the late Lord Mayor, as nominal defendant, but in fact against the Hundred, under the Act of George I. The damages were laid at 1500*l.*—After much evidence, the Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for the full amount of the damages proved, namely, 911*l.* 19*s.* for arms missing; 305*l.* 14*s.* for arms damaged; and 64*l.* for repairs of the house.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday, T. O'Callaghan, T. J. Phelan, and C. Newbolt, were arraigned for the wilful murder of E. Bailey. They all pleaded Not Guilty. The evidence corresponded with that which has already been detailed upon the Coroner's Inquest, &c. (For which see the Police Head).

The prisoners being called upon for their defence, Mr. Phelan and Mr. Newbolt declined addressing the Court. Mr. O'Callaghan was about to read a written paper; but being unable to proceed, it was handed to Mr. Shelton. It stated, in substance, that not being addicted to crime, he had never for a moment anticipated that he should be brought before a Court of Justice; much less could he have supposed that he should have been charged with the dreadful crime of murder. He declared most solemnly, that no man living, even one connected by the ties of blood with the deceased, could regret more poignantly the calamity which had deprived a brave man, and a valuable friend, of life.—Mr. O'Callaghan appeared deeply affected.

Several witnesses were examined as to character, and they all deposed that the prisoners were humane and excellent men.

Mr. Justice PARKE summed up. He said, it became absolutely necessary that the law should be promulgated as applicable to what was termed duelling—not only that the three most respectable men at the bar (as they were proved to be), but all others of his Majesty's subjects, should be aware of the dreadful jeopardy in which they were placed by involving themselves in transactions of this description. The law for centuries had laid down, that there was no occasion to shew malice, further than to prove a deliberate intention on the part of the offender to do bodily harm. In duelling, malice was always supposed to be expressed, not implied. Lord Hale, one of the greatest lawyers and best men of his time, had fully and properly stated, that "if A and B suddenly fall out, and go and fight with weapons taken up at the moment, and kill each other, this is not murder, because it is supposed to be a continuance of the quarrel while the blood has no time to cool. But if they appoint a future time, which admits of their having an opportunity of cooling and reflecting, then there is a deliberation, and the crime becomes murder." Sir E. Coke laid down precisely the same doctrine. This notion of honour, as it was misalled, was no excuse for the practice; for he who seeketh the life of another, does that which no law, human or divine, will justify. Mr. Justice Foster made a great distinction in cases of this kind; for he says, "but if, on a sudden quarrel, the parties fetch their weapons, and go out to fight at the moment, then, if death arise, it is only manslaughter." The Jury were bound to measure the case according to the particular facts disclosed in evidence—now, as affecting the prisoners, they had no information whatever as to the time of their original quarrel; it might have been but a moment before they fought; or late the night before, at a tavern, a theatre, or the like; and they might not have separated until they went out in a state of irritation to the fatal field. It was quite clear that the deceased fell by O'Callaghan's hand, not indeed from any actual evidence as to what passed on the ground, but from what was subsequently confessed by the party himself and the others in Mr. Adams's house. In all cases of duelling (as in murder), the seconds, and whoever were aiding and abetting in the act, were considered by the law as principals; and, be the case murder or manslaughter, they were alike involved in one common punishment. The unfortunate Gentlemen at the bar all appeared to be men of the highest and best character, from the testimony of those who knew them longest and best. They were all friends, and the Jury knew that when quarrels took place among acquaintances, the stings of a friend were more severe and more likely to provoke momentary animosity than those of a different person, in whose opinion we are not so much interested. There was no appearance in this case of what is called "foul play," in the language of duellists, and the deceased made no complaint whatever of the conduct of the parties at the time; on the contrary, he said it was fair, and O'Callaghan conducted himself towards the dying man as well as a man possibly could in his unfortunate situation. He had already alluded to the character of the prisoners, and this is one of those cases in which character was entitled to great weight: in a case of stealing it would be little to say the thief was a humane man; but in a charge of murder, a character for mildness and humanity (and all the prisoners had this), was of the greatest consequence in shewing the intention of the party. It was greatly to be lamented, that Gentlemen so highly and justly esteemed by their friends, should so far forget themselves in a moment of heat as to expose themselves to the situation in which they now stood, or to the risk of rushing unbidden to the presence of their Creator through the momentary operation of bad passion. The Learned Judge here read minutely his notes of the evidence, and said, that he did not think it possible for the Jury to reduce the case of the prisoners below the crime of manslaughter. He hoped God would guide them to a fit and proper decision on the present unfortunate occasion.

The Jury retired, and returned in about a quarter of an hour, finding a verdict of Manslaughter against all the prisoners.

The Court was crowded to excess, and the deepest interest was manifested for the unfortunate Gentlemen.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

T. O'Callaghan, Esq. of Gerard-street, Soho, was charged with shooting Lieut. Bailey in a duel, near Chalk Farm; and Lieut. C. Newbolt, and T. J. Phelan, Esq. were charged as accessories; the former being second to Lieut. Bailey, and the latter to Mr. O'Callaghan. Mr. Adams, who lives on the Hampstead-road, heard the report of two pistols, as he was dressing himself, about nine on Monday morning, and seeing four men in the field, he hastened out to prevent the duel. Before he got to them, they fired two more shots, and he saw one immediately turn round, and the others ran up to him and supported him. Mr. A. got them to take the wounded man to his house, where the others paid him all the attention in their power; and Lieut. Bailey forgave his antagonist, and declared they had all acted honourably by him. Lieut. B. being convinced he was dying, obtained a promise from his second, that he would communicate by letter the whole of the circumstances to his father, in Limerick. The deceased expired in about two hours; but none of the survivors appeared at all inclined to abscond. The prisoners were not called upon for any defence. The Magistrate informed them, that the law did not make any distinction in cases of murder, all being considered principals; they must all therefore be detained. It was suggested to the Magistrate, that safe custody was all probably that he would require; to which he assented; and it was agreed that they should be kept in the watch-house till the decision of the Coroner's Inquest was known.—[This was held on Wednesday, at Hampstead Hill. Mr. Adams, of England House, Hampstead, detailed the particulars of the duel, as stated above; and added, that when the parties arrived at his house, the deceased was laid on a sofa, when he shook hands with Mr. O'Callaghan; and said, "I forgive you; every thing has been conducted with the greatest honour; and if you had been wounded, I know you would have acknowledged the same towards me." Mr. O'C. replied, "My dear fellow, I am sure I should; and I wish I had been wounded instead of you; I felt your first ball about my legs; it passed through my boots and trousers: I wish it had taken effect."—CORONER. "How do you know it was Mr. O'Callaghan that fired at the deceased?" Witness replied, that he saw Newbolt and Phelan, after they had given the pistols to the deceased and O'Callaghan, retire to the flanks previous to their firing the last time. While they were at his house he learned, that the deceased challenged O'Callaghan. They were to have been seconds to two others, who agreed to meet on Sunday morning; but from some mistake about the time and place, that meeting did not take place. The deceased and O'Callaghan then quarrelled about this, and upbraided each other with purposely avoiding the first meeting; in consequence of which, the fatal duel took place.—Mr. Neville, a clerk in Somerset-house, saw the parties in Mr. Adams's. The deceased forgave O'Callaghan, and shook hands with him. O'C. appeared much affected, and wished the first bullet had broken his legs, and prevented any thing further. He also expressed a hope, that in a fortnight he and the deceased would be walking together down Bond-street; but the latter replied, "No, never; I saw the Sun rise this morning, but shall never see that again. I shall be in Heaven before that time."—The Coroner detailed the law, that not only the party who shot another in a duel, but the seconds also, were guilty of murder. The Jury, in about an hour, returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against T. O'Callaghan, T. J. Phelan, and W. Newbolt.]

Wednesday the notorious Bill Soames was brought to the Office, who has been upwards of twenty years one of the most noted and daring thieves that has disgraced this country; he having headed different gangs, and robbed persons in the most daring manner in the streets of London. The particular case against the prisoner now, who underwent two investigations, is, that in the month of September last, several of the inhabitants in the Strand, and particularly near Catherine-street, Somerset-house, and from those places to the Adelphi, saw the prisoner, in company with others, robbing persons in the most audacious manner, of which they gave information at the Office; and from their description of one of them, there was no doubt entertained but that it was Soames; and, in consequence, Humphreys and Oddy went to the Strand to watch them, which they contrived to do unobserved, and saw them attempt several persons; and afterwards endeavoured to secure the gang of robbers, and succeeded in securing two men. Soames at that time made his escape, and has since been concealed in the neighbourhood of Ratcliff-highway, till Tuesday night, when Oddy apprehended him at the gallery of the Surrey Theatre.—Two of the inhabitants of the Strand attended to confirm the testimony of Humphreys and Oddy.—Mr. Hicks, the Magistrate, convicted the prisoner, under the Police Act, as a reputed thief.

Mr. Elliston appeared here to answer a charge of assault made against him by Mr. Moncrieff. It appeared, this maltreated Bard had, for the last three years, supplied all the pieces at the Olympic, at a stipulated sum for each piece; and it was the refusal of Mr. Elliston, as Manager of the Olympic, to pay for the new piece of the Fortunate Youth, now forthcoming, and his stopping some of Mr. Moncrieff's orders, that led to the assault in question. The Poet expressed his indignation at the conduct of the Manager, in "high-sounding phrase and lofty sentence," inveighing, with Shakspeare, against "man's ingratitude," and talking of "benefits forgot!" The Manager, not being able to parry the argumentum ad hominem of the Poet, resorted to the argumentum baculinum; in which, from the stature of his adversary, he was more successful, paying the astonished Bard in notes of hand, which saluted his ears very differently from those bestowed upon his pieces.—The Manager, not being able to gainsay the charge, was obliged to give bail for his appearance at the Sessions. Mr. Cross, who appeared as the professional friend of the Author, advised a compromise, which he indignantly rejected, and departed, "big with his wrongs,"—"his soul in arms and eager for the fray."

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

On Tuesday, D. Evans, aged about 40, a journeyman soap-maker, was charged with the wilful murder of his wife, by beating her on the head with a poker on Sunday night, at their lodging in Falconberg-court, Soho. The other lodgers proved, that the prisoner came home drunk about 12 at night, and began quarrelling with his wife. The altercation continued till three o'clock in the morning, when groans were heard issuing from the prisoner's apartment, like the moaning of a dog. Strange to tell, though they believed murder was being committed, they neither attempted to enter the room, or to procure the assistance of the Police for that purpose. Next morning, not seeing the deceased, they conjectured that she had kept out of the way because she had received black eyes from her husband; and, as she was a particularly reserved woman, she might not like to be seen. The next morning he was seen wiping the floor of the front room; but the door of the back room, in which the deceased lay, was kept shut. A strange woman was also observed with him, watching every knock that came to the street door. The deceased not making her appearance on Sunday or Monday morning, and a coffin having been brought into the prisoner's lodging, the persons in the house then procured an Officer, who found the prisoner smoking. The latter told them, that when he came home on Saturday night, he found three Irishmen in the passage, and seemed by what else he said to have been jealous of his wife. He acknowledged having struck her in the mouth with his fist. Witness found the floors and wainscoting of the two parlours besprinkled with blood, and blood also on the poker. The body of the deceased was in a coffin in the bed-room, covered with a sheet. The back part of the skull was beaten in so, that a finger might be buried in the wound. None of her clothes were to be found; but the Officer traced them to the house of — Davis, a fellows workman of the prisoner, who resided near him. The prisoner told the Officer that his wife was very bad about seven o'clock in the morning; and that he applied hot bricks to her feet; but she died at ten o'clock. He also said, that he had got drunk and quarrelled with his wife, because she could not account for 2s. 10½d. out of 8s. he had given her. The prisoner's defence was, that Davis and he went about until they got very drunk. When he got home, he could just remember that an Irishman struck him, and one of the women lodgers told him that her husband had criminal knowledge of his wife. He next spoke about the money short, applying bricks to her feet, making her see in the night; and that Davis and he found her dead on the bed in the morning. The coffin, he said, was had from Westminster.—MAGISTRATE. "How often did you strike her, and how came the room so bloody?"—Prisoner. "I suppose the blood came from my wife's head. I was very tipsy, and don't remember striking her more than once."—MAGISTRATE. "How came the blood over the poker?"—Prisoner. "I might have struck her head when she was lying by the fire-place, as I tried to pick her up, but being giddy, I let her fall again, I believe."—The prisoner was remanded.

[An Inquest was taken on Wednesday, at the Falcon, Sutton-street, St. Anne's, on the body of Elizabeth Evans. There was no evidence in addition to that given above, with the exception of Mr. Tennet, a medical man, who proved that the blows on the back of the head, which had scalped the skull, was the cause of her death; and — White, an undertaker, who put the deceased into the coffin. The body, however, was opened during the Inquest, by Mr. Carpuze, of Dean-street; who was of opinion, that the wounds at the back of the head would cause death; but death might have been occasioned by an inflammation in the stomach, from cold. Such inflammation did exist. The verdict was Willful Murder against the husband.]

D. Evans was brought up for a second examination on Friday, for the murder of his wife.—The House Apothecary of St. Anne's proved that the skull was not broken; but the blows might have occasioned death.—J. Davis had no suspicion of any thing wrong, until when the coffin was brought in, a woman in the house exclaimed, that she was certain the prisoner had murdered his wife. He suspected something when he saw the undertaker and his man take off the deceased's cap. He took a bundle to his wife to wash on Monday morning; and the prisoner gave her another (not stating the things were to be washed) on Monday night; but he would not let her have a hand in it. Davis's wife proved that the articles contained in the first bundle were covered with blood. She assisted in laying the deceased out. She was much bruised from her head to her knee, and she had the mark of a blow upon the left temple. Witness had never seen the deceased in liquor but twice; and she was not an ailing person.—During the examination news came of Mrs. Desmond having been brought to bed, and consequently, as either party might avail themselves of her testimony, the prisoner was remanded, and his trial will stand over until the next Sessions.

NATION-GARDEN.

On Wednesday morning, W. Read, jun. one of the officers, received a letter from a person named Brookes, residing at Potter's-bar, that about nine o'clock on the preceding night, as his brother was crossing Northaw Common, in company with another man whom he had been drinking with previously at a public-house, when about the middle of the Common, the villain drew a pistol from his pocket, shot him through the body, and then effected his escape. However, the wounded man reached a cottage about half a mile distant, where he now lies without hope of recovery. It is supposed that the villain's intention was to prevent the unfortunate man from giving his evidence at the present Sessions at the Old Bailey against some villains, accomplices, now in custody on a charge of felony. The letter contained a full description of the assassin, which, we hope, will lead to his detection.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On the 30th ult. the Count de Wittgenstein, Colonel of the Legion of Hohenzollern, in garrison at Valence, blew out his brains with a pistol. A few moments before he executed his purpose, he gave some directions to his domestic with his customary calmness. The motive of this desperate act is not known.

A farmer in Chediston had a child who died very suddenly; its mother found it dead in the cradle, in which she laid it a short time before in apparently good health. She was so much affected by the loss, that her husband sent her on a visit to her mother, in hopes that a change of scene might restore her spirits. A few days after her departure, the remaining child, who was between five and six years old, was found drowned in a pond near the house. This affliction, added to the former, nearly broke the heart of the unfortunate mother. On Tuesday se'night the people were alarmed by the report that the farmer's house was on fire. Every assistance was immediately given, and it was extinguished without doing much damage; but it was soon discovered that it had been wilfully set on fire by the servant, who had been nurse-maid to the two children. She confessed that she had set fire to some straw in the apple-chamber; that her life was a burden to her, and that she committed the act in the hope that she might be hanged for it! This has given rise to a suspicion that she destroyed one, if not both, of the children; but no proof can be brought of it. She is now in Beccles gaol.

An Inquest was on Tuesday held at St. Thomas's Hospital, on the body of T. Hamilton. The deceased had been in a good way as a linen-draper, but was latterly so much reduced as to be obliged to distribute bills in the streets for a livelihood. He had for some time exhibited strong symptoms of mental derangement, and was found by his landlord with his throat cut, and quite dead; having left a note purporting that he had committed the dreadful act himself.—Verdict, Insanity.

An Inquest was on Wednesday held at Tottenham, on the body of Mary Cockle, a widow, aged 36.—Elizabeth Buckingham said, on Tuesday morning the deceased's daughter told her, her mother had been sleeping on the floor since Saturday, and would not speak to her. Witness went to her, and found her as described, in a cold room; she was speechless, but recollected them. The room smelt strongly of brandy, and a gallon bottle, nearly empty, was on her side. Dr. Holt was called in, who said she was perishing from cold. They put her into bed, and offered her some coffee; but at the moment blood issued from her mouth, and she shortly afterwards died. Witness said, she thought her death was occasioned by cold and excessive drinking.—Verdict accordingly.

DEATHS.

On Sunday, the 4th instant, Charles, the infant son of Henry Brooks, of the Strand.

Jan. 10, in his 72d year, Mr. Matthew Brown, late of St. John's-square, Clerkenwell, printer.

Jan. 11, of the gout in his stomach, Lieut.-General Floyd, Colonel of the 8th dragoons, and Governor of Gravesend and Tilbury. We understand his regiment, which is a most lucrative one, being in India, is already disposed of to Lord Edward Somerset.

Jan. 12, in his 65th year, while at tea, Mr. John Skirven, of Ratcliff Highway, printer.

Jan. 13, at Cuffnells, the Right Hon. George Rose. He was little short of 80 years of age. He was Treasurer of the Navy, President of the Board of Trade, Clerk of Parliament, Keeper of the Records in the Receipt side of the Exchequer, one of the Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council, an Elder Brother of the Trinity House, Verderer of the New Forest, Hants, and Member of Parliament for Christchurch!!—At an early period of his life his arithmetical talents recommended him to the attention of the Earl of Shelburne; who was then First Lord of the Treasury; and he was soon after appointed one of the Secretaries to the Treasury; but resigned on the formation of the Coalition Administration of Lord North and Mr. Fox. On the subsequent elevation to the Premiership of his patron, William Pitt, he was again appointed one of the Secretaries to the Treasury, and continued as senior in that situation for many years. On the retirement from office of Mr. Pitt and his immediate political adherents, Mr. Rose resigned his situation, and was shortly afterwards sworn of the Privy Council. He was subsequently, on the return of Mr. Pitt to office, one of the Paymasters General of the Forces; and on the expulsion of the then Administration, Mr. Rose was appointed Treasurer of the Navy, which office he held at the time of his death. The lucrative situation of Clerk of the Parliaments was several years since conferred on Mr. Rose (with the reversion to his eldest son George H. Rose, Esq. M.P. for Southampton, and recent Minister to the Court of Berlin). The other situations above mentioned, become vacant by his demise.

Lately, at Ashburton, in her 84th year, Mrs. Mary Dunning, sister of the late, and aunt to the present, Lord Ashburton.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

THE causes of this tendency to a neglect so disgraceful are various. In the first place, Seamen are more out of sight than any other class of the community; and an old proverb tells us, "out of sight, out of mind." We think of them when they are of immediate use to us, and praise and seem to promise them enough, as we have shewn; but when the illuminations for victory are done with, and the conquerors have gone to sea again, the idea of them seldom presents itself to those who ought to cherish it; it is encountered by none of the latter's ordinary habits or mental associations. This excuse however, bad as it is in such a case, will not serve a part of the Government like the Admiralty.

In the second place, Seamen contribute nothing to the finery or self-love of a court. They are seldom or never there; and if any one goes, his nature, if it is of the true sailor description, is not likely to render him very welcome. They are not dressers or courtiers. They are not parade-men.

Thirdly, Seamen are not only not courtiers; but partly from the nature of their profession, and partly from the treatment they experience, their political leanings are apt to be averse from the court's opinions.

And last but not least, there has been a tendency in the German succession to give particular effect to these causes by it's special landsman ideas at one time, it's love of military finery at another, and it's continental predilections at all times. One cannot well fancy two more dissimilar animals than a British seaman, and a German soldier of the old school,—the one with his hearty thoughtlessness, his lax and billowy gait, his weather-beaten humanity, and his fine mixture of necessary submission and an independence conscious of it's utility,—and the other, pettily careful, stiff, trimmed up and buckramed, without an idea in his head, but of barracks, rations, and sentry-boxes, and a mere tool in the hands of men who were themselves little better than automats. We do not confound the modern Germans with these machines, since the modern writers and the French revolution made them discover themselves to be a people; but the mechanical rogues are still to be found here and there at a court or so; and pains are taken to revive the breed in some places, particularly at Hanover. The young French republicans broke them in pieces, like so many plaster-of-Paris images. The British sailor never met with his match, but in the American, who is of the same race with himself, and flourishes under a government, which pays him especial attention, and to which the unaccountable European governments seem to insist upon turning our eyes,

The savage posthumous treatment of the illustrious BLAKE, the NELSON of former times, is alone a remarkable specimen of the length to which courts will go against difference of opinion in the naval defenders of their country. BLAKE said, that it was not his business to meddle with politics, but to fight for his country; and so he fought for the Commonwealth in such a manner as to clear the seas for them of very formidable enemies, and to make their name as respected for naval greatness, as CROMWELL did for military and political. He died universally respected for his integrity as well as courage and skill; and yet at the Restoration, nothing, not even CHARLES the Second's own predilection for nautical matters, could prevail upon that blessed personage and his courtiers to hinder the body of this famous Commander from being dug up out of it's resting place, and treated like a dog's. A less important, but pleasanter anecdote connected with the memory of the patriot seaman, will shew the eternity of these antipathies in certain quarters. A youth, the son of a Noble Lord who is now living, and who has been concerned in naval administration, hearing the name of BLAKE mentioned at a dinner, asked out loud, with a delightful simplicity, who he was; upon which his Lordship, with a saving grace equally delicious, exclaimed, "What,—Mr. So-and-so,—are you so loyal a man, that you do not even know then who BLAKE was?"

Even NELSON was not always regarded with a very favourable eye for some of his political opinions, though his hatred of the French, and his fierce despotic tendencies and subserviencies in some matters, (witness the blot on his scutcheon at Naples) rendered his great naval talents doubly acceptable as instruments in the late "legitimate" war. Still, he earned his honours hardly; he fought his way up into them; and a man of a higher cast of mind than he, Sir SYDNEY SMITH, has not been able to do even that, to the great astonishment of his countrymen. He was the first Englishman that gave a personal check to BONAPARTE, and his chivalrous exploits are known all over the world; yet his very knighthood is of a foreign order. On the other hand, the devout and trusting Admiral GAMBIER, who confines his achievements to bombarding neutral cities, and takes for his motto,—Fide non Armis. By faith and not fighting,—is made a Lord.

But these inconsistencies are far from being the worst. We have already mentioned the scandalous attempt to keep up Mr. CROKER's salary in time of peace, at a time when hundreds of unequivocally deserving officers, with every species of real claim upon any addition, were thrown out of employment upon a pittance, and the widows of others were begging for a pittance more. But the reader has no notion how the Boroughmongers (the eternal preventers of a proper understanding between prince and people) have been in the habit of lording it at the Admiralty. We ourselves are intimate with a most gallant officer and excellent man, who after serving in all parts of the world, after being weather-beaten like an old boatswain, after being gazetted and recommended by his commanders for his lion-like valour, and after meeting with wounds in various parts of his body, which will sometimes put him to torments upon a mere change of the weather, had to go backwards and forwards from sea to the Admiralty, and from the Admiralty to sea, soliciting promotion in vain; till at last, the very persons promoted over his head blushed for their own success; and he himself was moved to exclaim one day in the Admiralty Office, even to the blushing of the official retainers, that he saw that was not the place for merit without interest. Is it possible that even a remote family connection with us should have helped to produce this unworthy treatment? We might have thought so, from a date which he once put by chance to one of his memorials; but it is possible also, that it might have had a very different effect, had it been thought of; and personal politics, even if existing, cannot have been the cause of similar treatment experienced by so many others, whose memorials and constitutions waste away together.

Not even all this, however, can account for the sights which have lately been witnessed in the metropolis of this island,—the multitudes of squalid and starving Seamen, whom Government took not a single step of its own accord to relieve. We hope, and indeed we are sure, when we consider what old English individuals still survive, that a most serious explanation will be demanded of it in Parliament. Several Seamen had died already; crowds of them were hungry and wasting; and if some humane private individuals had not interfered, God knows what might have ensued; for these gallant sufferers are as little ostentatious of their sufferings as their merits, and thousands may hide and die in a city like this. Those who know what misery and death were quietly taking place in the Spital-fields district a little time back, may easily imagine it. The sufferer is not always likely even to know how ill he is. He pines away on an occasional morsel, and endeavours to save himself from absolute public beggary, and grows pale and weak, and gets into a kind of waking melancholy doze, and may not have more than an hour's notice, before death puts out his gallant struggling spirit. A friend of ours, who has been at sea himself, and knows what humanity is in all its senses, perceived a Sailor the other day lying silently under a little penthouse of some kind by a shop. He stopped, and with a Sailor's phrase of companionship, asked him to bring his face forth into the light, and let him see him. The man did so most unaffectedly, even smilingly; and exhibited a face in which starvation was beginning its pallid work. He could get no employment or food; and yet was lying there without a word, serious, but yet stout-hearted, and ready even to put on a cheerful look. Yet with what feelings could this man have listened to the winds!

Hundreds of human beings like this, and in worse condition, have been relieved, we are happy to say, by the subscription now going forward, both with food and clothing, and many have succeeded in getting employment; but hundreds still remain; the wants of all are numerous, though modest; and our readers will particularly keep in mind, that the duty in matters like these is not to give much, but that as many as possible should give something. There is a fear very often among individuals that they shall not be thought to give enough; and some, not naturally unkind, will too often be apt to conclude, that enough will be done by others. But the business is, not what may be thought by the world in these matters, but what our conscience thinks of them, and above all, what sheer, equal-dealing justice and a consideration of the common wants of humanity think; and as to others doing enough, we should rather suspect, if we consult our own experience, that others will be likely to say the same thing, and leave the matter to others. It is no unamusing, still less unprofitable task, to a mind that can afford it, though some times bought by sorrow or humiliation, to watch the tricks it is apt to play with itself on occasions that concern one's indolence or other self-indulgence.

We conclude with an excellent old song, which by the way, has as excellent a tune to it, and which was wrung from the feelings of some indignant Englishman at sights like those we have been describing. It is another illustration also of the political part of our subject; and to ourselves it happens to be particularly affecting, from associations of various sorts with a faded voice that used to attempt to sing parts of it. Salve, mater patriens.

I sing the British seaman's praise,
A theme renowned in story:
It well deserves more polished lays;
Oh, tis your boast and glory!
When mad-brained war spreads death around,
By them you are protected;
But when in peace the nation's found,
These bulwarks are neglected.
Then, oh, protect the hardy Tar,
Be mindful of his merit;
And when again you're plunged in war,
He'll shew his daring spirit.

Why should the man who knows no fear,
In peace be then neglected?
Behold him move along the pier,
Pale, meagre, and dejected!
Behold him begging for employ!
Behold him disregarded!
Then view the anguish in his eye,
And say,—Are Tars rewarded?
Then, oh, protect, &c.

To them your dearest rights you owe;
In peace then would you starve them?
What say ye, Britain's sons?—Oh no,
Protect them and preserve them.
Shield them from poverty and pain,
'Tis policy to do it;
Or when grim War shall come again,
Oh, Britons, ye may rue it.
Then, oh! protect the hardy Tar,
Be mindful of his merit;
And when again you're plunged in War,
He'll shew his daring spirit.

COMMITTEE OF THE DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I was silly enough, until now that I have had the fool's wisdom Experience, to suppose that a Committee of a charitable Subscription might be composed of men, who taking great interest in the distress intended to be relieved, would contribute their abilities, and give up as much of their time as they could spare, to serve the objects of the charity. Nothing less, I find.

By exposing two days proceedings of the Board, properly enough so called, for managing the Subscription for the destitute Seamen, I may undeceive a few of your readers as simple as myself, and they in consequence save their money for private and personal charity.

I shall first premise, that every idea of imposture, in these poor men was at an end from the very first day; not an impostor was to be found, under the severest examination by the Naval Officers: in fact, it would have been a heavy punishment to the common beggar to have been taken under the Committee's protection.

The first receiving day was Wednesday: about 300 wretched men presented themselves: 65 were examined in the course of the day, and marched off to a depot, to be provided for by contract, at a shilling a man a day, including house-room and straw to lie on. Having stood in crowds at the door, and in the passage of the King's Head, all day without a morsel, not so much as a biscuit to eat, or a drop of water to drink, many of them sick, and in a state of previous exhaustion, it was rather a wonder that only one dropped down on the march to the depot. Upwards of two hundred disappointed men, who also had attended in anxious hope to be examined, having stood six or seven hours without any sustenance whatever, were relieved with the sixth part of a quarter loaf each, and were then turned out, at four o'clock, with not a penny to pay for one of those haunts of misery, where Mr. Secretary saw such numbers of these skeletons of sailors, as he called them, huddled together for the night. Mr. Secretary had his speech by rote, but not by heart, as I shall shew hereafter. Many of the men dismissed were extremely ill like him who fell down on his way to the depot; so that some I doubt not have given this hopeful Board no farther trouble: the very standing six hours without any thing within their parched lips, and then to be turned penniless and hopeless into the streets, was enough to finish a sick and exhausted man; but as there is no perfect obituary of the destitute, it does not admit of proof.

Is such mockery of the public liberality to be endured? that while the relief afforded to two hundred of these brave fellows cost little more than forty shillings, the expences of the Committee were exceeding daily forty times that sum, being for various rooms in the Tavern,—the Board Room, Provision Committee Room, Shipping Committee Room, Finance Committee Room, Committee of Correspondence Room, Examining Committee Rooms, &c. these Committees all were allowed to engage people to attend them; printing of circulars to their own members, and other such trifles, advertisements, &c. &c. Such a mixture of thrift and extravagance may be incredible, but is strictly true.

Will it be imagined that on Friday the proceedings were something worse? An hundred were examined (having double the number of Naval Officers), and were accordingly marched off to the London Workhouse, as a depot, with instructions to the Master of the workhouse, that the House-Surgeon should examine them as to their state of health, and those whom he should deem unfit to lie on the boards with the others, from any sickness which would not get them admission into the new contagious fever institution, should be turned out! These sick men should be turned out into the streets at night, with three-pence only to find them lodging until the next examining day, Tuesday, being three-farthings per night; and for food for four days, one sixpenny loaf of brown bread, "if brown could be got." The humanity of Mr. Conquest, the Surgeon, saved a wretched African from being thus turned out, whom he reported to the Board (a Report they were too wise to record, much less to publish) to be dying from exhaustion, fatigue, and lying about in the cold; but had the Master of the workhouse, obeyed the instructions of the Board, such a man, who had been standing in the open passage in the rain all day, in hopes at last of experiencing English humanity, would have been turned into the streets with three-farthings a night for his lodging, until he could see the Committee again, which would have been never. This economical management of the funds of the Committee (for such only are they considered)—this wicked mockery of misery, is recorded in the Minute-book; and Mr. Secretary Skeleton and the Chairman departed from the ordinary practice, to hold up their hands for the turning out; and also that three-pence, and not six-pence, as was proposed, should be given. Had the Secretary forgot the tale he unfolded of their lodging-houses, or was it all a taught trick? Or were three-farthings to procure a warm bed and restoratives for a dying man? I took care he should have them; and shall not forget his large black eye rolling on me when he said, "Good night, Massa."

After three days, he and another of his sick comrades were conveyed to the London Hospital, having been provided with nothing by the Committee but hard boards and straw and common workhouse allowance; but even that was beyond the intention of the Committee, who would have exposed their unfed sides, their looped and windowed raggedness, again to the pelting of the pitiless storm. Is this the land that is ready to take up arms against the world for the poor African? How shall we rebut the charge of using our prisoners of war ill? Or who after this can disbelieve it? Why were not these starving men all housed at once, when it was discovered that they were all sailors? Such must have been the intention of the Subscribers. Mr. Hick, of Cheapside, very humanely offered, gratis, a vast stack of warehouses, large enough to hold commodiously four times the number that presented themselves: they might have been examined there, or on board of ship at leisure; but humanity seemed totally irrelevant: to talk of pity to the Board, was to discourse, to men born deaf, on the sweet sounds of music.

Here I must observe, that not a breath can be uttered against many of the Gentlemen of the Committee for the Relief of destitute Seamen, except, and a great exception it is, that they never attended; whereas the dependence of the Subscribers was principally upon them: such an one, for instance, as Mr. Alderman Curtis; who in course allowed himself to be nominated, to give weight to the Board.

Nor in what I have said do I imply any thing against those ancient and excellent endowments, the hospitals for the sick: there a man may bestow his offering, and be sure he is benefiting a suffering fellow-creature. But much mischief is still in the power of this Committee. The Swede or Dane, after serving us for many years, may be thrown upon the mercy of his exasperated country;—the African—but I trust I have said enough to draw attention to the ulterior measures of the Committee.—I am, Sir, &c.

B.

P.S. I forgot to say, that Lord Cochrane came down to the Board, not to advocate the cause of the starving sailors, as I hoped; no man except myself thought of such a thing; he was against housing them until found meritorious: he came to guard the Committee against a hoax. I heard him task a Swede:—"Your name, Sir? Your age? Your height? Where have you served? Your last ship? Captain's name? (cum multis aliis). Have you no parish?"—"I am a Swede."—"Well, Sir, we shall send you to your Consul." The old seaman turned pale.

One of these poor Swedes on a former day gave a description of his reception by his Consul with so much naïveté, that I am sure the most delicate of your readers will pardon the insertion of it.—"Sure, I go to my Consul: he say, you dam rascals, for what you comb to me? You fight against you own country: for where you fight, there you get relief; and he keeck a my a——out.”

Alas! Is not the subscription for purposes of mercy?

ON BLASPHEMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

This word blasphemy, in the meaning at present attached to it, for what purpose is it employed? Only to serve as a cloak for some injury, which he, by whom the word is employed, labours thereby to do to him to whose dis-course it is applied; to render him an object, if not of legal punishment, at the least of public hatred, for expres-sion given to this or that action, opposite to those enter-tained, or professed to be entertained, by him by whom the word is thus employed.

Considering the use which it has thus been put to, and the mischievousness of which, and with but too much suc-cess, it is, almost as often as employed, endeavoured to be made the instrument, great would be the service done to mankind, were it possible to extirpate it out of all lan-guage.

Next to the extirpation of it, is the laying the root bare. Like almost every other word that has been used with reference to God, or Gods, it was of course first used with reference to man. Used with reference to man in the Greek (from which so large a part of the language of technical religion has been derived) compounded, as it were, of two words, one of which signifies injury, the other reputation, it meant neither more nor less than injury to his reputation. Blasphemy against man was injury done to the reputation of the man. In this the only origi-nal sense of the word, blasphemy therefore against God was injury done to the reputation of God. Now, then, as to man,—by injury done to his reputation, man is indeed liable to be subjected to sufferance; to sufferance in vari-ous shapes, varying in quantity upon a scale of almost in-definite length;—but by injury done to God's reputation, is God exposed to sufferance, in those or any other shapes? No, says somebody; but by notions which are unworthy of him, injury is, in your phrase, done to his reputation; or, in the more usual and proper phrase, dishonour is done to him, and disrespect shewn to him, and for that disre-spect, the offender ought to be punished. Such is the answer. Here, then, as above, look into this supposed disrespect towards God. What you will find in it is neither more nor less than disrespect towards some opinion entertained, or pretended to be entertained, concerning God by man; by man with power in his hands.

Take two men of irritable mould, set them a talking about God, and thence necessarily about his attributes; the moment any difference of opinion has place between them,—and that moment will never be far distant,—each becomes, in the eyes of the other, a blasphemer: to each it therefore becomes clear that the other ought to be punished;—punished in the offending member;—the only doubt being, whether, as has been sometimes done, it ought to be bored through with a red-hot iron, or cut out. In-adequate, incorrect notions concerning God, are not they unworthy of him? Yes. Did that man then ever exist, of whom, if he entertained any notions at all concerning God, it might not with truth be said, that he entertained unworthy notions of him? No; and yet, in the next breath, by the same man who thus says no, will punish-ment be called for to be inflicted on this or that other man, for the unworthiness, as above, if such his notions. * * *

The genealogy is in this wise; from imaginary grace, imaginary myste-y, imaginary sacrament, came imaginary blasphemy; imaginary sin, from imaginary sin comes real antipathy; and from men, in ruling and otherwise in-fluential situations, real oppression and real persecution, in that one part; real suffering on the other; for, by the imaginary sin, is produced, in the ruling breast, along with the antipathy, a pretence for gratifying it. * * *

Zealot. Alas! What is all this but ridicule; and ri-dicule, can it, even in your own estimation, be considered as fair argument, fit to be made use of as a test for truth?

Graduate. That depends upon where it is fetched from, whether from without or from within. If from without, no; as if, for example,—in speaking of your notion about causing a man, by laying your hands upon his head, and speaking certain words to him, to receive the Holy Ghost,—I were to compare you to a juggler, who making as if he had put a ring into a box, gives it to a man to hold, who, upon opening it, finds there is no ring there. Here, the way in which ridicule cast upon the serious and important subject is cast, is, by presenting to view along with it another subject, which is in itself a trifling one, and has not any connection with it, material to the purpose in hand.

But if it be by matter taken from the subject itself, and necessarily belonging to it, then the ridicule is reflected upon it, no argument can be fairer; nor can there be, in this case, a fairer test of truth, i. e. a surer proof, that what is given for true is not so, than what is applied, when, by the matter thus drawn from the notion itself, the quality of ridiculousness is shewn to belong to it. Such is the case, in so far as any position, which is either a necessary conse-quence of the one in question, or necessary to be advanced to form a ground for it, is to a certain degree absurd, viz. to such a degree as to appear ridiculous; the more palpa-bly absurd it is, the more flagrantly ridiculous.

Thus as to this notion of yours,—this notion of your having power to give power to other men to remit sins,—what ground do you produce for it? What other than the above passage in St. John's Gospel, in which he speaks of Jesus as conferring this power on his Apostles. Now, then, (say I), there is only one supposition, on which, by his conferring it upon his Apostles, he has conferred it upon you; and that is, your being the same persons with those his Apostles. Necessary is an assumption to that effect to the proving of your having any such power; or, to take it the other way, assuming that, in consequence of what Jesus thus said to his Apostles, you have this power, it follows that you are the same persons with those his Apostles. But this notion of your being the same persons with those Apostles of Jesus, to such a degree, in my view of the matter, I must confess, is it an absurd one, that if it be not a ridiculous one, I know not where any such notion as a ridiculous one is to be found. To come then to the principal notion, viz. that of your having the power to remit sins, or to give to any body else that same power, the cause of the ridicule cast on it, is it any thing external and foreign to the notion itself? No; it is a quali-ty, not only belonging to the notion itself, but insepa-rable from it, viz. its requiring this other undeniably ab-surd and ridiculous notion for a necessary support, or in-cluding it as a necessary consequence. Exhibit it with its necessary supports and consequences, no otherwise than by misrepresentation can this, or any other notion, which is thus in itself ridiculous, be made to appear not ridicu-lous.

Let but this be received as law, viz. that nothing that, in the exercise of their power, has on the subject of reli-gion been advanced by men in power, is to be caused to appear ridiculous, then may every thing which is not only most absurd, but most mischievous as well as absurd, be advanced by them without possibility of contradiction, and, for want of refutation, assent by force of authority procured to the most pernicious notions, practice alto-gether governed by them, and the public mind reduced to the state in which it is already in Spain, and, thanks to those who rule in England, will presently be in France.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JANUARY 25.

THE Ministerial Papers have begun to suspect that some of them were in too great a hurry to praise the American President's Speech. There may be something in Mr. MONRO's progresses, which they think they may have reason to like; but there were passages in his late Speech, which they must have glanced over very trustingly indeed, for them to praise it, as that memorable one alone—"The earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort." They are now willing to look a little suspicious; and perhaps they have some reason to do so at the order from Major-General FLOYD, which appears in the American Papers to the 23d ult., for the levying of 500 men to recruit the Army under General GAINES. "Whether," says the Savannah Republican, from which the above order was copied, "these troops are to co-operate with General GAINES in inflicting punishment on the hostile Indians, or to aid in taking possession of East Florida, or any other object of importance to Georgia, time will soon determine."

The Courier proceeds to quote the following passage from the American Journals, in which more particular mention is made of a protest already rumoured:—

"Washington, Dec. 14.

"It is mentioned, with apparent authenticity, that the British Minister, Mr. BAGOT, has, by command of his Government, entered a protest against our coming into possession of the Florida by purchase or otherwise. I state what I hear, not what I know. Such interference can hardly be expected.—We give the above as received, but we cannot think it will eventually appear that the British Government have so far presumed to interfere in our concerns."

Now if a dispute should arise on this question, it is certain, at all events, that MONRO is not a man likely to be very courtly or submissive upon it. No Englishman, who thinks with any seriousness upon the state of the world, past, present, and future, can avoid important reflections upon any question likely to make a stir between the two countries. It would infallibly make a stir in all the rest of the world, old and new, and for this reason, an allied power would most likely endeavour as much to avoid it, as the Americans would meet it with cheerfulness; so that our Government is rather in an awkward situation for as-sounding a high tone. High tones are much more easily assumable just now towards a court than a republic. The mere circumstance of the American ambassador's coming over here in a beautiful and masterly specimen of ship-building, named the Franklin, brings with it a world of curious and deep reflections.

Since writing the above, we observe the following paragraph in a subsequent Courier:—

"Yet, notwithstanding these assertions, or rather reports, in the American Papers, we may safely assert, that there do not exist any differences of an unpleasant nature between this Government and America; so far otherwise, that there is, we may venture to add, the most cordial disposition in both to preserve the tranquillity and harmony which have been so happily re-established between them."—We dare say.

The French Chambers are discussing the propriety of recruiting the army,—a measure which actually excites the attention of the Allies, and no very pleasant sensations. The question among the Deputies is, whether there shall be a permanent military establishment, or the amount of force shall only be voted annually. It is one, which must no doubt perplex themselves still more than foreign cabinets, considering with what variety of feelings the revival of the military body in France must be contemplated by Bourbonite, Bonapartist, and Independent,—popular man and unpopular, foreign interest and domestic. Accounts have not yet arrived of its conclusion. The Committee have made a report on the law respecting the Liberty of the Press; but that measure is now become of little interest in itself, considering the summary way in which the application to it of the Trial by Jury was dispensed with. These debates are not among the number of things which "they manage better in France." Can our readers believe, that the Deputies have been gravely and earnestly discussing, whether or not the mere deposit of a book, according to law, should be considered a publication, so as to subject the author, if his opinions are disapproved, to a prosecution?

Our Readers will see with great interest the account of what took place when the Messrs. EVANS, the two most prominent sufferers by the "Suspension Act," were brought before the Magistrate, for the purpose of making them enter into recognizances. They will discern in it convincing proofs, if proofs were wanted, of the real integrity of both, as well as of their truly English spirit, and inflexible sense of what is right, and even happy. The ministerial servant, the Courier, cannot afford to see as much, and very likely does not see it at all. It is not to be expected, that a writer who could not believe it possible that any one should take part with the American Independents who had hopes of lucre at home, should suppose it possible for two human beings absolutely to prefer imprisonment to a compromise with what they thought wrong. Accordingly, he sets about abusing the Messrs. EVANS, and exposing himself, after the following rate:—

"With regard to the declaration of these men that they were innocent of the crimes imputed to them, what session has ever passed at the Old Bailey, in which similar declarations have not been made? Punishments would be very rare, if they were never inflicted but upon those who admitted their justice. Their motives, however, in refusing to be liberated are not ambiguous. If they quietly walked out of prison, they might pass from it unnoticed, to their former obscurity and labour. By courting a protracted incarceration, they may possibly obtain a subscription, which will supply the place of honest industry. They certainly have as good a right to expect one as those whom they see thus rewarded. Patriotism is a lucrative trade. We expect they will shortly be ranked with those tried, good men, whose intrepid defiance of public law, public order, public morals, and public authority, supports a falling State. Their contumacious affection for a gaol, however, is rather an inexplicable commentary upon the clamour of those who have told us, from time to time, how cruelly they were persecuted in it. They are invited to depart, and they prefer to remain. We think their propensities may be gratified, without any violent danger to the country, till their brother patriots, who are at large, make an adequate fund to remunerate their heroic self-devotion."

The very same evening, on which this paragraph appeared, the Courier's masters thought proper to liberate the Messrs. EVANS,—a circumstance which was announced by that delicious journalist, who calls on the Times to be "candid," with this pithy sentence:—

"Last night, the two EVANSSES were liberated from prison."

What do other papers however tell us?—

"Tuesday evening, at five o'clock, an order from Lord Sidmouth arrived at Horsemonger-lane, for the liberation of Messrs. EVANS, senior and junior, without either of them entering into recognizance for his future appearance, or any other stipulation whatever.—We understand that an action is contemplated by them against Sir NATHANIEL CONANT, for wrongous imprisonment."

Now we hope that if a subscription be necessary to the Messrs. EVANS (and it very likely is, considering how their time has been cut up), they will have one. If CROKER and other friends of the Courier can have the face to be supported by involuntary contributions out of the public pocket, aye, and even attempt to brazen still more out of it, we really cannot see by what possible process it is to be argued, that persons who have suffered and are suffering from a violation of the Constitution, and whom their imprisoners are afraid to prosecute, should be withheld from receiving voluntary remuneration.

We see from The Gazette that Lord CHARLES MANNERS has been appointed Aid-de-Camp extraordinary to the PRINCE REGENT, with the rank of Colonel. Thus Lord CHARLES is, at twenty-six years of age, placed above nearly 200 Lieutenant-Colonels in the British army, many of whom have fought and bled and grown grey in the service of their country—many of whom, indeed, held their present rank before Lord CHARLES was old enough to become qualified for any military commission, according to the regulations of the army. But this extraordinary appointment was, no doubt, meant by his Royal Highness the REGENT as a reward for the extraordinary services and sufferings of Lord CHARLES MANNERS. For we remember that Lord CHARLES was one of the Aid-de-Camps of Lord CHATHAM upon the celebrated expedition to Walcheren, and that some time ago his Lordship fell from his horse at a review upon Wimbledon Common.—Morning Chronicle.

A very petty instance of the spirit of party is recorded in the Tyne Mercury. On Friday week the Lady of Mr. LAMBTON, M. P. was delivered of a son and heir. Such a circumstance is, on almost all occasions, attended with rejoicings, and, in this case, as the interests of the two families of LAMBTON and GREY were involved, it was the natural result that the congratulations should be somewhat more enthusiastic than common. The different Churches of Durham, at once struck up a merry peal on the occasion; one only was silent, but that was the Cathedral, the Sub Dean, Dr. HAGGITT, thinking probably that it was a lamentable thing that an ancient Whig family should be favoured with an heir! He certainly refused the trifling indulgence of allowing the bells to be rung, and no reason is assigned.

The Duke of BEDFORD has sent Mr. HONE 100 guineas, and the Marquis of TAVISTOCK, 50 guineas. This has sent the Courier into another fit, and he raves, in the old worn-out cant, about "Religion and Social Order."

The Earl of SEFTON, who from his sick-bed sent Mr. HONE 100 guineas, was reported to have died the beginning of the week by the Court Papers. He is, however, not only not dead, but, we are happy to say, is getting better; and he will live, we hope, to a good old age, to exhibit many such useful examples of liberality and humanity, and of a just scorn of hypocrisy and oppression.

The Princess to whom the Duke of CAMBRIDGE is about to be married, is the youngest daughter of Frederick, Landgrave of Hesse, by Caroline of Nassau. She is the grand daughter of Mary, second daughter of George II. and consequently, second cousin to his Royal Highness, and is the 59th heir, in her own right, to the Crown of England.

Among the many Subscriptions for public and patriotic purposes, that have lately done so much honour to the feelings of individuals, there are perhaps none more praiseworthy than that of an anonymous Lady, who has sent 300*l.* to the National Benevolent Institution, for the support of indigent persons in the Middle Classes, founded and since fostered by the exertions of Mr. P. HERVE.

BANKRUPT SYSTEM.—We have more than once alluded to Mr. TOWNSEND, who has been now 10 or 12 years endeavouring to bring his Bankrupt case to a conclusion. A curious fact has reached us respecting it. Some time back, when writing to the LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR about his affairs, he told him that he was so reduced in circumstances, that the purchase of the paper on which he wrote was even too much for him.—What, Reader, do you imagine the LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND does on this? Why, the LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR sends the unfortunate petitioner a present of paper of the value of seven shillings!—Could this have been in mockery?

FORGED, OR ALLEGED FORGED NOTES.—A Case has just occurred, which, we have reason to believe, will settle the question in dispute between the public and the Bank. Mr. RANSON, of Somers-town, an engraver of great respectability, was on Friday actually committed to the House of Correction, in Cold Bath Fields, by Mr. BAKER the Magistrate, for refusing to give up a Bank Note of One Pound, which had been stamped with large red letters as "FORGED." The Bank Inspector had put this note into Mr. RANSON's hand, when he then refused to give it up, as it was clearly his own property, having paid 20*s.* for it, and being resolved to bring the question to an issue. We shall have more to communicate on this subject in our next.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—Out of the nine thousand acres about to be inclosed, comprising Hainalt and Waltham Forests, on which are some thousands of claimants, not including the poor cottagers, who have from time immemorial been permitted to turn out a cow or two, and to cut fuel (both which rights; I may say, they will eventually be deprived of), Government, it is said, as an equivalent for turning deer on them, claim one-third; viz. three out of the nine thousand acres; so that

POETRY.

Extract from the "Revolt of Islam, a Poem."
BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

—In the midst appears

LAON,—exempt alone from mortal hopes and fears.

His head and feet are bare, his hands are bound
Behind with heavy chains, yet none do wreak
Their scoffs on him, tho' myriads throng around;
There are no sneers upon his lip, which speak
That scorn or hate has made him bold; his cheek
Resolve has not turned pale,—his eyes are mild
And calm; and, like the morn about to break,
Smile on mankind—his heart seems reconciled
To all things and itself, like a reposing child.

Tumult was in the soul of all beside,
All joy, or doubt or fear; but those who saw
Their tranquil victim pass, felt wonder glide
Into their brain, and became calm with awe.—
See, the slow pageant near the pile doth draw
A thousand torches in the spacious square,
Borne by the ready slaves of ruthless law,
Await the signal round: the morning fair
Is changed to a dim night by that unnatural glare.

And see! beneath a sun-bright canopy,
Upon a platform level with the pile,
The anxious Tyrant sits, enthroned on high,
Girt by the chieftains of the host; all smile
In expectation, but one child: the while
I, Laon, led by mutes, ascend my bier
Of fire, and look around; each distant isle
Is dark in the bright dawn; towers far and near,
Pierce like reposing flames the trembling atmosphere.

There was such silence through the host, as when
An earthquake trampling on some populous town,
Has crushed ten thousand with one tread, and men
Expect the second; all were mute but one,
That fairest child, who, bold with love, alone
Stood up before the King, without avail,
Pleading for LAON's life—her stifled groan
Was heard—she trembled like one aspen pale
Among the gloomy pines of a Norwegian vale.

What were his thoughts, linked in the morning sun
Among those repiles, stingless with delay,
Even like a tyrant's wrath?—the signal gun
Roared,—hark, again! in that dread pause he lay
As in a quiet dream—the slaves obey—
A thousand torches drop,—and hark! the last
Bursts on that awful silence; far away
Millions, with hearts that beat both loud and fast,
Watch for the springing flame, expectant and aghast.

They fly—the torches fall—a cry of fear
Has startled the triumphant! they recede!
For ere the cannon's roar has died, they hear
The stamp of hoofs like earthquake, and a steed,
Dark and gigantic, with the tempest's speed,
Bursts through their ranks: a woman sits thereon,
Fairer, it seems, than aught that earth can breed;
Calm, radiant, like the phantom of the dawn,
A spirit from the caves of day-light wandering gone.

All thought it was God's angel come to sweep
The lingering guilty to their fiery sea;
The tyrant from his throne in dread did lean,—
Her innocence his child from fear did save;
Scared by the faith they feigned, each priestly slave
Knelt for his mercy whom they served with blood,
And, like the reflux of a mighty wave
Sucked back into the loud sea, the multitude
With crushing panic, fled in terror's altered mood.

[A Review of this extraordinary Poem will appear in our next.]

APPEAL OF MURDER.

The Court of King's Bench yesterday morning, notwithstanding the wetness of the morning, was crowded by half-past nine o'clock. At half-past eight the defendant Abraham Thornton left his apartments in the King's Bench Prison in a hackney coach, and having arrived at Westminster, he was conducted into the Court and was placed at the bar.—It is said, that during his confinement he has been in most excellent spirits, and entertains the firmest conviction of his ultimate acquittal. He was dressed in a new black coat, drab-coloured kerseymere breeches, and gaiters, had on a pair of new yellow gloves, and maintains his former appearance of a respectable looking farmer. A portrait painter was in Court for the purpose of taking his likeness, but as soon as he observed him, he immediately turned his back to the gentleman, and placing his hand on that side of his face, remained in such a position as to preclude the possibility of his accomplishing his purpose for upwards of an hour, and did not alter it until the Court commenced its proceedings.

About ten o'clock the appellant Ashford entered the Court.

MR. READER.—My Lord, the defendant has a Replication here, which he wishes to verify by affidavit.

The Replication was then read to the effect following:

REPLICATION.

And the said Abraham Thornton saith, that notwithstanding the matters alleged in the counter-plea, he ought to be permitted to wage battle, because protesting that he is innocent; and though he is not in any way bound to answer the same, nevertheless in replication he saith, that there were and are strong presumptions that he was not guilty of the felony charged against him. That is to say, at the time when Mary Ashford went to the house of Mary Butler, at Erdlington, she went there unaccompanied by the said A. Thornton; and he further saith, that Mary Ashford left the house about a quarter past four in the morning, alone, and proceeded towards Langley, and that a short time after Mary Ashford had so left the house, she was met at a short distance from the same in Bell Lane, leading from Erdlington to Langley, by Joseph Davison, the Abraham Thornton not being any way in sight. And Abraham Thornton further saith, that within the space of a quarter of an hour from the time she so left the house, she was seen by one Thomas Broadhurst, crossing a certain turnpike-road at that part of the road where Bell Lane crosses the said turnpike-road, and she proceeded along the said Lane, then being alone. And Abraham Thornton further saith, that at the several places where Mary Ashford was so seen by Davison and Broadhurst, the road was broad and straight for a considerable distance, and that he must have been seen at a considerable distance, if he had been with her. And the said Abraham Thornton saith, that on the morning of Tuesday, at a quarter after four or not later than five and twenty minutes, he was seen by divers credible witnesses, a considerable distance from Bell-lane, to wit, by Thomas Jennings, John Holden, jun. and others, all persons with whom Thornton had no previous connection, walking along a lane leading to Castle Bromwich, close to the farm-house of John Holden the elder, which was the way leading to the said Thornton's father's house, where he at that time resided. And that he was walking leisurely, and not in any way in confusion. And when he had continued about a mile from the said farm-house he was stopped and conversed with John Haydon, for a quarter of an hour, after which he continued on towards the house of his father; and that John Woodcock saw him so conversing as aforesaid. And the said Abraham Thornton further saith, that he was also seen by James White at about twenty-five minutes after five, when he was still walking leisurely towards his father's house, and he was then about half a mile distant from the house. And he further saith, that the distance from the house of Mary Butler across the harrowed field mentioned is one mile, two furlongs, and thirty yards, and the distance from the workhouse, which is the nearest point of the village of Erdlington, to John Holden's farm-house, is one mile, three furlongs, and sixty-two yards; and the distance from the said pit of water found by Erdlington to the said farm-house, is two miles four furlongs, &c. and he saith, that the most ready way from the pit of water to the said farm-house, is the following, viz. across a close into a turnpike-road, called the Chester-road, at the part thereof near to the garden wall of one Mr. Hipkis, and also leading to the farm-house of the said John Holden, and the distance of the said way is one mile, seven furlongs, and one hundred and seventy yards. And the said Abraham Thornton further saith, that the distance from the pit of water to the farm-house is one mile, four furlongs, and sixty yards; but he saith that there is no foot-path in that direction, except for a distance of one hundred yards, leading to the Canal Bridge, and that by the intersection of the hedges and fences, by and between the said pit of water and the said bridge, it would take a longer time to arrive at the said farm house, than by taking the more circuitous road above pointed out. And the said Abraham Thornton further saith, that the clock at the house of the said Mary Butler, where the said Mary Ashford had been on the morning of the 27th of May, was on that morning without any alteration whatsoever; and the time marked by the said clock on that morning was carefully compared by William Webster, Esq. (a witness for the prosecution), with the true time at Birmingham; and also the clock at John Holden's was without any alteration, and was compared with the true time at Birmingham, by William Townley, and the said several times above-mentioned are all connected and reduced to the same measure of time; that is to say, to the true measure of time kept at Birmingham on that day. And the said Abraham Thornton further saith, that on his arrival at his father's house, he changed his hat and coat, and no other part of his apparel, and he had on the same shirt and breeches, and the same stockings, and he wore the same at the time of his apprehension. And the said Abraham Thornton further saith, that when he was examined, he gave an account of the several places at which he had been during the night and the morning; and that there is no fact stated by him that has in any way been contradicted; and all the said facts have since been fully corroborated and confirmed by various witnesses.—The replication thus concluded: "And the said Abraham Thornton in fact saith, that the several facts proved afford stronger and more violent presumption and stronger proof that he is not guilty of the murder whereof he stands appealed, than the said presumption and proofs in the said counterplea set forth that he is guilty. And therefore the said Abraham Thornton prays judgment, and that he may be permitted to wage battle with the said William Ashford."

MR. CLARKE.—My Lords, on the part of the appellant, I must beg your Lordships to allow us time to answer this replication.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Then let it be until Thursday next.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 309.

OPERA.

This house has opened again for the season; and the night we saw it, was very fully attended. It is now lit up with a magnificent chandelier containing a double circle of gas, which hangs like a chrystal sun in the centre of the roof, and throws a fine light all over the house, though by contrast the pit and lower boxes look darker than before. But this, we believe, is what the ladies prefer; and for that matter, perhaps the men too, soldiers and statesmen not excepted. We observe that the gas chandeliers have been withdrawn from the boxes at Covent Garden. The light is found, as was expected, too powerful for the complexion, when brought so near; and certainly there is no reason why the ladies' faces should suffer from it; for as to the notion that a really good complexion ought to be able to stand the most searching light, it is doubtful whether the very best would look at it's best under such circumstances; and as the whole matter, even in nature, is a business of deception, (health always excepted) it is to the benefit of the beholders to have as many good countenances as possible seen to the best advantage. The true charin of a face is in sweetness and intelligence,—in expression; and if it be innocently and unaffectedly assisted, so much the better. Any complexion or mere surface would fly to atoms before a microscope; but soul, and taste, and the beauty of cheerfulness or kindness, are another thing. If a lady would look at her best at the Opera, she should take exercise in the morning, and be in a good humour all day; and then if her face has not all the assistance that a proper disposal of the lights and shadows can give it, why it is very ungratefully treated; and if it has, we are prodigiously silly not to be the better pleased.

It was supposed at first, that the gallery must suffer by this hanging of the light: but this, we believe, is now contradicted. The only sufferers are the four painted groups on the ceiling, representing Music, Painting, Dancing, and Poetry; and they certainly are a good deal afflicted. They were executed, we understand, by M. ZARRA, from the designs and under the inspection of M. CASIMIR CARBONNIER, a young artist, and pupil of DAVID. We are also informed, that the inequality which has been observed in the execution, is owing to the whole work's having been composed and finished in the course of less than three weeks. We are loth therefore to pronounce upon the merits of either of these gentlemen, who are not to be expected to rival the rapidity of RAFAEL. Some of the figures are very spirited, but others are much the contrary; and if M. CARBONNIER has any invention, he requires more time to shew it; for he has drawn pretty unequivocally upon the most well-known compositions of RAFAEL and MICHAEL ANGELO, especially the School of Athens, and the Prophets in the compartments of the Vatican. The prominent figure of Architecture, for instance, is almost a fac-simile from one of them; and by the side of the imitations in the groupe of music, there is introduced the figure of a girl sitting, so very French-like and artificial, as to form a singular contrast. Mr. CARBONNIER's recollections, however, of his pretty countrywomen, are excusable; but we know not what to say for his less warrantable nationality, in making ARISTOPHANES, TERENCE, and Moliere, the three prominent names in the label of his groupe of poetry, and leaving SOPHOCLES and SHAKESPEARE fluttering off into a dark cloud in the back-ground. Besides, it would have been better to have made the names of CORNEILLE, RACINE, and VOLTAIRE prominent, than MOLIERE's; and, in an opera-house perhaps, QUI-NAULT's would have been better than all. Even the name of TASSO does not come forward into notice like that of MOLIERE; and yet, most unquestionably, the Italian poets should have been the most prominent in an Italian theatre. METASTASIO, an opera poet, is even, we believe, omitted. But next to the Italian, it would have been better taste in M. CARBONNIER, considering where he was, to put the English, or at any rate not the French.

We are glad to see that the Manager has been so quick to treat us with Figaro. It is perhaps the most delightful work of a most delightful author. Don Giovanni disputes the palm with it; but the best things in Don Giovanni are of the same nature as those of which Figaro entirely consists. MOZART here gave himself up to the intoxication of his animal spirits, not in their noisiest, but in their most graceful and enjoying moments; and we listen, as we might have done at a feast given by young ANACREON, with our senses crowned with roses. All is a soothing interchange of enjoyments,—a series of sprightly turns or lapping pleasures. He reduces us, as usual, to nothing but smiling surprises and exclamations. What can be more airy and yet sufficing than Se a caso Madama? What more pettishly ironical, and then indignant, than Via resti servita, Madama brillante? What more hurried, mysterious, and occupying, with a leaning to the pleasurable, and with those little fretful notes at intervals, than Non so piu cosa son, or than Voi che sapete? What more elegantly rallying, and then strutting off into a military air, with its accompaniment of a really noble march, than Non piu andrai? What more sweet-voiced and feeling, what more consuming, what a more delicate and melodious utterance of passion, a more intense mixture of feebleness and strength, than Porgi, amor? What more expressive of suspicious questioning than the movement of Conoscete Signor Figaro in the Finale of Act 1st; or more petitioning, or anticipative of the consent and harmony which it requests, than Deh! signor, non contrastete, which is as soft and gently bending as the smoothing of two cheeks? What more sweetly yet fervently complaining, than Dove sono i bei momenti? What more simple and shepherdess-like than Ricevete, padroncina? What more exquisitely childish, more prettily sobbing, than L'ho perduta, me meschina? What more lightsome and insinuating than Su l'aria? What more glowing and expectant than Deh vieni non tardar? What more perfect in skill, taste, smartness, sweetness, courtship, and triumph, than the duet of Crudel perche finora, which is perhaps the very finest effusion of this great master of transport! The three chords in the symphony alone announce an inspired hand.

MADAME CAMPORESE does not appear this season; and her part of Susanna the Lady's Maid is performed by Madame FODOR,—that lady having kindly given up the Countess, as the bills say, to a new singer. The former change seems to be regretted by some of the papers; but we must confess, it is not so by us. Madame FODOR may be somewhat too portly for the airy Susanna; but she has animal spirits, and a more social look than Madame CAMPORESE; and to say the truth, the latter, to our ears, is rather a correct and powerful than delightful singer. She will be missed however, we suspect.

Of the new singer, Miss CORRI, we ought not to pronounce a decided opinion at once, she suffers under such evident agitation. Her acting, partly perhaps on this account, is at present a non-entity; but singers are not expected to excel in this particular, though they have more need of it in Operas like the present than most; and the better performers they are at any time, the better effect it gives to their singing. As a mere singer, Miss CORRI shews undoubtedly great promise. Her voice is sweet and distinct; she has an excellent ear; and displays even through her trepidation a facility and power worthy of her reported instructress Madame CATALANI. Her deficiency seems to be in the intellectual part of her art,—in propriety of expression. She throws her lights and shades too indiscriminately, now dropping her voice, and now darting it forth like Cafalani, but not, like the latter, upon the proper places. She is said however to be very young, and appears so. But we shall report further in a week or two. Miss Corri's personal appearance, though not remarkable, is lady-like; and she seems so modest as well as clever, that it is impossible not to wish her success heartily.

We cannot reconcile ourselves to Miss Mori as the page. Madame Pasta was not very clever in the character, but she at least looked more like the bashful and amorous boy. Naldi, whom it is a pleasure to hear pronounce Italian, appears to have got rid, at least in this character, of the extremes to which we ventured to object last year. He is quite as intelligent as before, and as active as he need be, but does not fling himself so much about the stage, nor waste such a quantity of threatening gestures upon Se vuol ballare. We are glad to see Angisani again,—and Ambrogetti, who is more full of meaning than ever, and luckily has a character in this opera that enables him to expatiate, like Don Giovanni, instead of his being tempted to deviate into those unaccountable gestures and elaborate pointings to the moon, which he baffled us with in La Molinara. His duet with Madame Fodor, Crudel perche, he renders what it ought to be, and what Mozart made it,—a lively dialogue as well as a beautiful composition. The momentary alarm which he exhibits at Susanna's saying No instead of saying Yes, and vice versa, is excellent, and well appreciated by the audience. It is observable, by the way, that this little piece of coquettishness and variety is introduced by Mozart himself, the writer of the dialogue having giving no play upon the words Yes and No.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A tragedy, called Retribution, which does not require any particular notice, has been brought out here. It is not destitute of dramatic effect; but is of the artificial school, and abounds with those common-places which acquire, by the usage of scholars, a sort of classical air, and are easily mistaken by a young writer for ideas instead of words. If the author, however, is as young as he is said to be, he may become a good writer, especially as he appears to have amiable feelings; which, by the way, will teach him one day, we hope, that Retribution is not so good a thing as he seems to think it.

The Editor has been very unwell for two or three weeks past, till within these few days; or he would have noticed in this Paper one or two minor novelties.

FINE ARTS.

AN ACADEMY TO BE BUILT AT PLYMOUTH.

An Academy of Art is to be immediately built at Plymouth: the money has been subscribed, the ground purchased, and Mr. Foulstone, the architect, has presented a design to the Committee: the exterior of the building will be a pure Greek temple. This is the first example in the kingdom, of a building exclusively to be built for Students in Art—may its example be followed! The Gentlemen in Plymouth deserve the greatest praise for their promptness and spirit; and as they have every thing to begin, we hope they will begin and persevere on the best principles,—that they will encourage a sound course of study, and get the best examples. Two or three more Academies in different parts of the kingdom, built and arranged for Students and all the purposes of sound study, would effectually neutralize the effect of the trash annually obtruded on the public eye at Somerset-house. We consider this determination, at Plymouth, as a very great point gained for the Art of the country, and, both from its influence and example, augur the most beneficial effects, as it will proceed no further than affording opportunities for study: and as there will be no academical honours, so there will be no academical intrigues: Art, and Art only, is the great object.—Hail and success! B. R. HAYDON.

CLERK OF PENTONVILLE.

No. 15, Pleasant-row, Pentonville, Jan. 23.

MR. EXAMINER,—It certainly was not my intention to address you again on the subject of a recent interment at St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, but I really feel it to be a duty I owe myself, to say a few words upon the long and laboured letter of R. Lockwood, in your paper of Sunday last. He again calls my original letter a gross attack, and I repeat (and defy him to disprove it) that it was a simple narrative of facts, not one word having passed between us, but what is their contained, and this I made without any comment whatever; but I am now obliged to believe, that had this corpse been a murdered one, 2s. 6d. would have purchased the interment; and I am quite-satisfied that if this business had not been made public, not one word would ever have been heard about a certificate. I am really surprized at his asserting that I gave him the money as a deposit, and pledged myself to produce a certificate, when he knows it to be utterly false. He may smile with his Informant if he pleases at the idea of weeping females, but if such facts as I have stated are to be made the sport of Parish Clerks, I can only say that I am very sorry for it; and in spite of Mr. Lockwood's sarcastic remarks, I shall always consider the scene to have been most scandalous and indecent. I am glad to find he has not written so much without having stated one fact, for although I have never spoken to or even seen the face of the deceased, yet she did occupy apartments in my house some weeks previous to her decease; but what this fact has to do with his conduct at the funeral, I am utterly at a loss to conceive.—I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

JOSEPH READ.

P. S. I beg leave, Mr. Examiner, to return my thanks to you for the readiness with which you have complied with my request in inserting two letters, and most particularly to apologise for making this request after stating to you my intention not to do so; but as I have calumniated no one, I feel bound to resist the calumnies that are on this occasion so plentifully cast upon me. J. R.

THE QUEEN—COL. TYNTE.

There was a Meeting of the Nobility, Gentry, and Freeholders of Somerset, on Monday week, at Wells, when Addresses of Condolence were voted to the Regent, to the Queen, and to Prince Cobourg, on the untimely and lamented death of the Princess Charlotte.—When the Address to her Majesty was proposed, it was supported by Mr. Dickinson the Member, and for this one particular reason, "that she was Queen of England."—This was tolerably significant; but Colonel TYNTE, a leading man in the County, nevertheless opposed the motion. He well observed,—"that however painful to his feelings, he must decidedly object to the proposed Address to her Majesty. It was well known (he said) that her Majesty had failed in those attentions which, as a mother, were due to our late Princess, in her peculiar situation. At a moment when it might be expected that her assiduities would have been devoted in affectionate attentions to the Princess, they were wholly neglected, and her Majesty, upon the plea of ill health, though nearly 80 years of age, travelled down to Bath in one day! What would any of us think, if, in our families, such an occurrence had taken place? The general sentiment as to the Queen's conduct on this occasion, is indeed sufficiently known, and it is impossible to mistake the public feeling on this subject. It had not been his intention to oppose the Address, but his name had been put to the requisition to the Sheriff without his knowledge, by a valuable and confidential friend; he certainly should not have signed it, knowing any Address was intended for her Majesty. As his name did appear, he felt it to be his duty to come forward and express a dissent, which, however he might regret its necessity, was, he conscientiously believed, in strict conformity with the general opinion of the public on the occasion."

This speech of Colonel Tynte was much applauded; and her Majesty will learn from it, that her conduct has not been viewed with dissatisfaction by "the vulgar" and "the disaffected" only. Here is a loyal and a wealthy man,—a man moving in the higher circles, who not only deems the Royal conduct unbecoming, but stands forward, like a man of courage and feeling, at a public meeting, and gives reasons for his disapprobation.—The Address is indeed voted, but it goes up to Court "shorn of its beams;" and we are quite satisfied, that much good would arise, if but one man of rank in every county, when justified by the occasion, would thus do his duty, by rising up and rebuking the misconduct of those in high places,—whether they be Kings, or Queens, or Regents.—Her Majesty, whatever may be her other deficiencies, is not wanting in discernment, and may even now benefit by the Colonel's wholesome remarks.—If we were allowed to advise so exalted a Person, we should venture to recommend the motto of the celebrated and excellent Madame Geoffrin—"Give and forgive;"—and to ponder over the following passages from Job:—

"16. If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail;

"17. Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof;

"19. If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering;

THE MESSRS. EVANS.

STATEMENT OF THE INTERVIEW BETWEEN SIR N. CONANT AND THE MESSRS. EVANS, AT WHITEHALL, ON THE OCCASION OF THEIR PROFFERED RELEASE.

On Thursday, the 1st inst., the above mentioned persons were taken to Sir N. Conant's Office, Whitehall, in custody of Mr. Walter, the gaoler, and a turnkey. After waiting a short time, Sir Nathaniel entered, and stepping towards Mr. Evans, sen., addressed him in a low tone:—"Mr. Evans, I am happy to see you; I have got an order for your discharge, on entering into recognizances in the sum of 100*l.*, to appear in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of next term; and from day to day, to answer such matters and charges as may then and there be proffered against you."

Mr. E. sen.—For what? I do not know what I may have to answer for in future. I wish to be informed whether any matter or charges can be exhibited against me now? If there be not, I shall walk home.

Sir N.—I cannot say any thing to that; I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. E. sen.—Did you not commit me to prison on suspicion of high treason, on the alleged oath of some person? Now, if you will inform me who that person was that so made oath, and what the act of treason was that he swore to, that I may bring him to justice, I will give you ample security directly.

Sir N.—I cannot answer interrogatories. I shall be responsible for that; but I have nothing to do with that now.

Mr. E. sen.—Sir, you committed me to prison; surely you can say who this person was?

Sir N.—I cannot be interrogated. I can't tell you any thing about it: indeed, I will not.

Mr. E.—Then I will give you no bail.

Sir N. (turning from the father) asked, where is young Mr.

Evans? and walking towards him,—Are you willing to enter into these recognizances?

Mr. E. jun.—Sir Nathaniel, I have been committed by warrants under your hand for high treason. It is stated in my commitments, that I have been so charged before you on oath; now, previously to my entering into any engagements, I am determined to know from you, who the person was that has falsely accused me? You are—

Sir N. (interrupting) I have nothing to do with that at present; you are not in confinement now under any commitment of mine.

Mr. E. jun.—No; but I was originally committed by you, and if it had not—

Sir N.—I cannot—

Mr. E. jun.—Permit me to proceed—

Sir N.—No; I will not permit you to—

Mr. E. jun.—Sir, I insist upon—

Sir N.—It has nothing to do with my present commission.

Mr. E. jun.—It has every thing to do with my present situation. I am now said to be committed on oath.

Sir N.—I can't hear you. If you are willing to enter into these recognizances, (turning towards both the Messrs. Evans) I am prepared to give you your liberty.

Mr. E. sen.—I shall give no security when I am charged with no offence.

Sir N.—Then you must be sent back to prison.

Mr. E. sen.—I do not care where you send me.

During the conversation with Mr. Evans, jun., a Gentleman named Day entered the office. Mr. E. jun. was going to add some further remarks on the extreme oppression he had endured, when Sir Nathaniel again said, that he would hear nothing which had not immediate relation to the recognizances.

Mr. E. sen. then replied—There is no living being can charge me with any breach of the law, or with immoral conduct of any description; yet I have been sentenced to almost a year's solitary imprisonment, and it was you forged the commitment to send me to gaol.

Sir N.—I can't bear all this—(sitting down to his desk and writing something). He then beckoned that Mr. Evans, junior, should be taken out of the office; and read what he had written aloud:—"You say I forged a commitment to send you to gaol?"

Mr. E. sen.—Yes; you did; for you knew the examination on oath was false!

Sir N.—Take him away.

Mr. Evans, sen. then left the office; but before he could join his son in the hall, Mr. Day came out to the foot of the staircase, calling "young Mr. Evans is wanted."

Mr. E. jun.—Well; who wants young Mr. Evans?

Day.—Sir Nathaniel wants to speak with you.

Mr. E. jun. having returned into the office, Sir N. asked him, whether he was willing to comply with the terms of his proffered release?

Mr. E. jun.—I have been since the 9th of February last most unjustly imprisoned, on a pretended suspicion of high treason; you yourself committed me, first to Tothill-fields Bridewell, and next to Cold-bath-fields, and on both your commitments you positively averred that I was charged on oath. I do not accuse you of writing an untruth, because as yet I cannot ascertain that some perjurer may not have done as you have asserted.

Sir NATHANIEL here rose from his seat at the desk, and walked towards the fire-place.

Mr. E. jun. continued.—By the warrants of Lord Sidmouth and yourself I was seized, and have—

Sir N.—You are quite mistaken. I issued no warrant for your arrest.

Mr. E. jun.—Let me proceed. I believe you are not implicated in my arrest; but after we were arrested, it was by means of your commitments that my father and myself were held until the passing of the Suspension Bill. Lord Sidmouth was then enabled to take advantage of your services. I am entitled to trace all my sufferings to you. Had you not agreed to countenance his Lordship's proceedings, by averring in your commitments that I was charged on oath, I should have enjoyed my liberty, at least till the Legislature had annihilated the personal safety of the whole people. Nay, I am of opinion we could not with any decorum have been seized at all, had it not been through the paltry contrivance of arresting us with the leaders of the alleged Spa-fields plot. As it is, we have been oppressed by a flagitious conspiracy without precedent. I demand that you inform me who appeared before you and charged me on oath with high treason. If I have not that information, I will never compromise my innocence by entering into any acknowledgments which can be construed in any manner to my dishonour.

Sir NATHANIEL here intimated that he was responsible for whatever he might have done.

Mr. E. jun. resumed.—I am yet young; but I have resolved never to wear the badge of ignominy. I have been nearly a twelvemonth secretly imprisoned through your instrumentality. You have deliberately and repeatedly put your hand to an assertion that some person has made oath before you to an extent which involves me in the charge of high treason. You know best whether your assertion is true: I will not suspect you of falsehood, unless you attempt to screen this supposed person from the penalties of the law. I have made every effort consistent with my sense of political duty to obtain my deliverance from unmerited incarceration. Every avenue to liberty was stopped. I have been calumniated in all modes, and in all places,—by the meanest hirelings of the most exalted suborners,—by some who shall be rendered amenable to the law,—by others in the Senate * * * Having endured all these wrongs, I am not of a temper that would teach me to sacrifice my reputation for the sake of an enlargement under such conditions as are now insolently offered. I insist upon being brought to trial for the offence imputed to me, or being liberated honourably without stain of suspicion. I cannot comprehend why I should enjoy my liberty more conditionally than any other Englishman. I will not submit to such degradation.

Sir NATHANIEL, who had listened with evident displeasure, now stated that his commission did not extend to any consideration beyond the present offer, and that he would not treat on any other subject.

Mr. E. jun.—The subject, Sir, is my present situation. I am now in custody on suspicion of high treason, and I will not stoop to accept of any conditional enlargement without a renunciation of that groundless suspicion. You, Sir Nathaniel, have again and again put your hand and seal to a solemn legal declaration, that some person has appeared before you and accused me of high treason. Bring that person forth, or I must conclude that you—

Mr. Day, at this juncture, interposed between Sir Nathaniel Conant and Mr. Evans, jun. lifting up his arm and exclaiming, "I will not allow you to go on. I have just heard your father grossly insult Sir Nathaniel, and I will not allow his son to do the same." Mr. E. jun., somewhat surprised at the interposition, bade him lower his arm and stand off, adding, that his interference only tended to place Sir Nathaniel in the unpleasant situation of admitting that his actions would not bear recital without conveying reproach. Mr. E. jun., was proceeding with Sir Nathaniel, when Mr. Evans re-entered the office attended by the turnkey. Sir Nathaniel immediately exclaimed, "Take him away!" Mr. Evans echoed, "Who'll take him away?" Mr. E. jun. advised his father to depart from such a scene, and they quitted the office in the custody of Mr. Walter. Mr. E. on passing the staircase, animated by his own warmth of disposition, vehemently arraigned the proceedings of the day as a wanton and designed insult, superadded to the cowardly and hypocritical falsehoods fabricated against his character.

Tuesday evening, between four and five o'clock, the two EVANSES, father and son, were liberated by special order from Lord SIDMOUTH, together with a Mr. BENBOW, who had been confined under a similar charge, and who, we believe, is a shoemaker, and resided formerly at Manchester. Mrs. EVANS, who has been in the daily habit of visiting her son and husband, went on Tuesday to Horse-monger-lane prison, and at four o'clock, when she came away, had not the slightest notion that either of them would be liberated; but a very short time after she had arrived at home, both her husband and her son, who had been confined about 50 weeks, returned. We understand, that a very short time after four o'clock a King's Messenger arrived at Horse-monger-lane Prison, with official orders from Lord SIDMOUTH to liberate the State Prisoners, and directed to the Governor of the gaol. The Governor in person then went to the two EVANSES, and formally delivered the orders he had received. These orders were immediately complied with, and they quitted the prison. An action, it is stated, is to be immediately instituted against Sir N. CONANT. Young Mr. EVANS is to conduct his own cause, in imitation of Mr. WOOLER and Mr. HONE."—Daily paper.

The DUKE of SUSSEX and the THEOLOGICAL REFORMERS.

[From the Ulster Register.]

CELEBRATION OF THE TRI-CENTARY OF THE REFORMATION,—HELD DEC. 31, AT THE LONDON TAVERN.

We trust (as long as we are able to be the Proprietors of a Free Press) we shall ever be found the fearless Advocates of Civil and Religious Liberty. We should deem all our past labours very unprofitable and very unworthy indeed, if we could be silent on the present most important occasion—important to every denomination of Christians in the British empire, and peculiarly so to that portion of the population of this country, whose misfortune or good fortune it is to profess a religion different from that which is professed by the celebrators of the Tricentenary of the Reformation.

Before we proceed to give our opinion of the proceedings at the London Tavern on the 31st ult. we feel it our duty to call the reader's attention to the fair and proper definition of "Religious Liberty;" because we should greatly lament indeed, if in our zeal for so sacred a cause, we should be led into an unintentional violation of its most sacred principles.

Our readers will anticipate that we must have been a good deal dazzled by an assembly of Christians collected, with the Duke of SUSSEX at their head, for the purpose of putting on record sentiments and principles calculated to promote the cause of Religious Liberty. That this was the object of the Meeting we should hope; that it was not the effect we most sincerely lament.—We cannot conceive any Meeting more substantially hostile to the principles of Religious Liberty than that which, on the 31st ult. was headed by the Duke of Sussex—scarcely can we contemplate the religious monopoly of Lord Sidmouth in a more odious station—scarcely can we picture to our imagination the most trading fanatic more highly elevated in a convention of religious and political bigots than our Noble Duke, when celebrating his anniversary of the Tricentenary of the Reformation. Perhaps we do not understand in what Religious Liberty consists—perhaps Religious Liberty consists in the power of abusing every religious opinion that does not correspond with our own—perhaps the Catholic portion of our countrymen are fair game for the advocates of Religious Liberty to hunt down, as their liberal and enlightened sentiments may dictate—perhaps that religion which three-fourths of Europe now profess is a damnable and heretical idolatry, and that all the wise men in the world are to be found in the London Tavern on the 31st inst. the true Apostles of Light, and authentic Disseminators of Christianity.

Is it thus the year 1817 is to close? Is it thus the light of the Reformation is to be shed over the darkness of the British Empire? Is it thus that the Advocates of Religious Liberty are to recommend its sacred, and we will say, notwithstanding this meeting, its inviolable principles? Are we to be told by the Duke of Sussex, that the religious attachments of eighteen hundred years are to be denounced as idolatrous and unchristian offerings to the Almighty; and that the whole Catholic world is to be consigned over to the arm of persecution? Is this to be the Religious Liberty of which the Duke of Sussex is to be the patron?—Instead of such a meeting being called the Tricentenary of the Reformation, the Noble Duke should have styled it a meeting of the No-papery Party, in the true and just sense of that odious and disgusting title. What is Religious Liberty? What is its true and proper definition? It is this; and we call upon the Duke of Sussex, and all the parsons that surrounded him, to contradict us, before the tribunal of common sense. To be religiously liberal is to respect the conscientious feelings of every Christian persuasion.—What would that Noble Duke think of an assembly of Catholic Bishops and Priests, with a Cardinal at their head—(we say a Cardinal, because we have heard it was a Cardinal that married the Noble Duke to Lady Augusta Murray)—what would his Royal Highness say, if those Catholic Bishops and Priests thus assembled entered into a series of resolutions, complimentary to the unity and consistency and numbers of the Catholic persuasion—monopolizing all the attributes of Christianity, and denouncing as insolent and insufferable innovations all those various sectaries who have thought proper to dissent from the Church of Rome? Would not the Duke of Sussex, and his chosen corps ecclésiastique, consider such an assembly a monstrous and unchristian-like convention of human beings, without charity or mercy for their fallible but conscientious fellow-creatures? In what does such an assembly differ from the assembly, whose proceedings it will be our painful duty this day to review? Let the Duke of Sussex point out the difference, for we can not. We did hope that illustrious personage would not lend his political name (a name too acquired by the advocacy of a different sentiment) to a religious crusade against the conscientious conviction of his Catholic countrymen. If he did, it would only end in his own everlasting disgrace, and in the propagation of the principles and opinions he endeavoured to extinguish.

Will the Duke of Sussex and his religious brethren say, because the Established Church of England have had the good fortune, (aided by circumstances which they never contemplated) to restore the Pope and the Bourbons and the Spanish Monarch, and all that train of authority which it was the object of the Revolution to limit and controul,—will he say, that for such a reason the tocsin of religious hostility is to be rung by his Royal Highness and his assembled parsons, and the whole Catholic population of the British Empire is to be denounced, nay, not only the living, but the dead, not only the present, but past generations, are to be denounced, as an idolatrous and persecuting race, which no light can illumine, no reason can redeem?

Who restored the Bourbons? Who restored the Spanish Bigot? Who encourages the crusade against South America's liberty? Who protected the villains that shed the Protestants' blood in the South of France? Who at this moment presumes to consecrate with the title of the Constitution, those infamous and unprincipled and illiberal disabilities, under which the Catholics of the British Empire now labour? Who?—that very Established Church Government which professes the Reformed Religious Principles of the Tri-centenary Celebrators. These are the champions of Religious Liberty, to whom the Duke of Sussex may look as the restorers of the Pope, the Bourbons, and the Spanish Inquisition. Are these his Royal Highness's reasons why the conscientious feelings of the Catholics of England and Scotland and Ireland are to be insulted by the denouncing resolutions of the Parsons of the London Tavern?

But to these resolutions,—we have only time to insert a few of the principal,—enough, however, to show the temper of the meeting.

Our Magazine will be read when the Parsons who flourished on the 31st are mouldering in the grave; and therefore it is our incumbent duty to lay before our readers an impartial view of the extraordinary transactions which took place on this very important occasion;—a Mr. Bowles (is it the celebrated John Bowles, whom Cobbett has put his stamp upon?) made an eloquent and impressive speech on this occasion. He drew a glowing picture of the beneficial effects of the Reformation to the liberties of mankind—he forgot, however, to allude to Ireland;—he gave an affecting account of the saint-like labours of Luther, and, at the moment he was himself applying the faggot, he complimented the Noble Duke in the Chair, that no new fires would be lighted, while the family of Hanover sat on the British Throne. Parson Bowles then concluded, with a very pious and liberal resolution, to the following effect:—

“That this Meeting could not enumerate all those evils which flowed from that abundant source. But that the Scriptures were forbidden—that their sacred truths were displaced by corrupt traditions—and simple, true, and spiritual worship by superstitious forms—that Crusades were substituted for the peace-announcing Gospel—ignorance for knowledge—and persecution for good-will to men. That priests, operating by their dogmas on the fears and on the hopes of the deluded and untought, exclusively amassed both wealth and power—that absolutions and indulgences, purchaseable from them, encouraged crimes; that admission, even into heaven, was made dependant on their dear-bought masses and their prayers—that the people groaned in wretchedness, and that Monarchs trembled on their thrones—and that a domination, interested, arbitrary, and injurious, extended over the fortunes, the intellect, and consciences of men.”

Are any of your readers (and we don't care what his religion is) prepared to say, after reading this very christian-like and benevolent resolution, that Parson Bowles does not deserve three cheers from any advocate of Religious Liberty!—The number of lies that Parson Bowles contrives to crowd into the resolution we have quoted, is highly creditable to his talents and industry; yet this same Parson will tell us, that his heart is influenced by the pure spirit of Christian charity. Every man who knows any thing of the Catholic Religion, or its very Learned Professors, knows, that Parson Bowles is a gross religious libeller, when he tells the world that “the Catholic Laity are forbidden to read the Scriptures—that the forms of their worship are superstitious—that absolutions and indulgences are purchaseable—that admission into Heaven is made dependent on their dear bought masses and prayers.” So said Parson Bowles; and the Duke of Sussex, in his high pontifical chair, most liberally cried amen to all this cool and abandoned libel on the religion of four-fifths of Irishmen and three fourths of Europe. Where was the Noble Duke's philosophy? Where was his religious liberality which vindicated the Catholic four years back, when Parson Bowles was uttering this slanderous, malignant and odious falsehood? Oh! could the Noble Duke have cast his eyes on the shades of Voltaire and Rousseau; on Bolingbroke, and Gibbon and his favourite Hume; what a smile would those philosophers have cast on the scene that was passing! Oh! ye Christians, (might those deists have exclaimed) is it thus you preach the benevolence of Christianity! Protestants, in the spirit of religious freedom, abusing and defaming the conscientious feelings of their Catholic fellow-subjects! You have talked of Christian charity, and Christian beneficence, and Christian forgiveness; yet what do we behold? Christians denouncing Christians, and a member of the Royal Family of England presiding in an assembly which labours to render a large portion of British subjects odious to their King, and to the laws, and their Protestant fellow-subjects. We shall pass on to the 10th resolution:—

“That without conferring any excessive praise on Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, Calvin, and the band of brethren who originated and prompted this beneficent event, and without applauding all their conduct, or all the doctrines which they taught, this meeting must regard them as great among the greatest of mankind—must recollect with astonishment and admiration, their talents, their industry, their zeal; and must commend to their children, and their children's children, an imitation of their dauntless courage, their steady perseverance, and that unintimidable obedience to the dictates of their consciences, which they nobly displayed.”

Will the Duke of Sussex pretend to say, that there are no illustrious names in the Catholic Church who have sacrificed every worldly consideration to the dictates of conscience? We are far, very far indeed, from saying, that the finest examples of human fortitude are not to be found in the cause of Protestantism and Presbyterianism too; but will not the Parsons at the London Tavern allow, that there were some martyrs of as great learning and talent as they can boast to be found in the records of Catholic persecution? If so, why not give the credit to conscience, which conscience should ever command? Why seek for Luther and Melancthon and Zuinglius and Calvin, those praises and that homage which you deny to men who have equally been the victims of their conscientious feelings? Again may the Deist interpose, and say to the Duke of Sussex, why condemn the martyr to transubstantiation, when you deify the martyr to the creed of Athanasius? Does the Duke of Sussex think every man damned who does not think with St. Athanasius? Some of his favourite martyrs of the Reformation were of this opinion.

After a few more resolutions reiterating the principles of those we have already quoted, the learned and Christian assembly conclude the benevolent work of the day, by disclaiming all illiberal sentiment towards their Catholic Brethren! The Resolution is as follows:—

“That whilst this Meeting thus celebrate that Reformation, whose influence they desire should be co-extensive with the globe, they seek for that extension only by the energy of argument, and through the force of truth; and, towards Roman Catholics, they disclaim all sentiments which Christian charity could censure, or religious freedom would condemn.”

After the resolutions we have quoted, and on which we have freely observed, we do not think our readers can well hold their muscles when they read this all-saying resolution of brotherly love. Had the Duke of Sussex stood up in his place, and said of the Catholics of the British Empire, that they and their ancestors were a race of ignorant, superstitious, priest-ridden fanatics—that they were the victims of a system of delusion, and the instruments of a system of persecution, and after all these very pretty compliments, if his Royal Highness were to put his hand on his heart and profess the warmest anxiety for religious liberty, what greater absurdity is this than the 16th resolution of the Christian Parsons assembled at the London Tavern? Sincerely do we lament this shameful proceeding. We trust we will not see counteracting assemblies in the Catholic portion of Europe, and Christians thus pelting each other with their Bibles, instead of ministering to each other's wants, healing each other's wounds, and paying reciprocal respect to those feelings of conscience by which every honest man of every persuasion should be directed. Thank God! the town in which we live cannot be influenced by such examples. The whole Royal Family assembled (virtuous, and religious, and chaste as they are) would not bring together an assembly of Irish Protestants in the town of Belfast, who would, in imitation of the London Parsons, denounce the religious faith of their Catholic fellow-subjects.

We have felt it our duty to be as unequivocal as possible, in the expression of our opinion on the general merits of this assembly of Protestant Clergymen. Of many of the sentiments delivered on this occasion we cannot but approve, in common with every liberal mind; and we are at a loss to reconcile the sentiments of liberality in one sentence with those of the most unqualified illiberality in another. That the Duke of Sussex should be the patron of any meeting reflecting so cruelly and unwarrantably on men who had no opportunity of defending themselves, we cannot account for. His Royal Highness tells us he sketched the outlines of all the resolutions, and therefore of those we so much reprobate. We regret this fact, because we think it sullies the brightness of his political name; and we trust his better reflection will say, that true religious freedom can never be found in that bosom which would not pay equal respect to the conscientious feelings of every fellow-creature. To us, it is immaterial who violates the principles of Religious Liberty—whether to Princes, or Dukes, or Lords, or Baronets, we shall always write and speak with equal fearlessness in the cause of truth and justice.

CITY.

On Thursday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall.

Mr. NASH moved a Vote of Thanks to the Rev. Mr. Cory, Chaplain to the Lord Mayor, for his Sermon, preached at St. Lawrence's Church, on the 11th instant, with a request that he would print the same, and send a copy to each Member; upon which a discussion took place upon the general propriety of printing Sermons; and upon a suggestion of some Members, the original motion for a Vote of Thanks was withdrawn; and one agreed to in the first instance, requesting the Sermon to be printed and distributed as usual.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

Mr. J. CROOK stated to the Court, on the part of the Committee, that the Report which was in preparation, with regard to the immense number of distressed Seamen, and the alarming state of mendicity in the metropolis, was not yet completed. It was discovered, in the course of the inquiry, that the misery was greater than had been at first imagined.—The Report, he promised, should be ready on the next Court day.

LOLD MAYOR'S HOUSEHOLD.

The Court proceeded in the consideration of the Report of the City Lands Committee, upon the Petition of the Officers of the Lord Mayor's Household, in relation to the usual entertainment not having been provided for them at the Sessions; and after considerable discussion, the Court came to a resolution, that a liberal annual allowance being made to the several Lord Mayors, to enable them to support the dignity of the office, the expenses of the Sword Bearer's table ought to be borne by the Lord Mayor for the time being.

STATE OF NEWGATE.

Sessions House, Old Bailey, London, Jan. 19.

To the Right Honourable the LORD MAYOR, and other his Majesty's Justices, presiding at the Court of Sessions now holden at the Old Bailey.

We, the Grand Jury of the City of London, having reported the several bills of indictment presented to us in due form, and being informed by the proper Officer that no others are forthcoming, do wait upon the Court for the purpose of receiving our discharge; at the same time, we wish to observe the great pleasure we have derived, in perceiving that no bill has been found by us for murder, nor any one of a crime of a peculiarly atrocious nature;—a circumstance very gratifying to the Jury.

In the progress of our duty we visited the prison of Newgate, and especially directed our attention to the state of that prison; and we lament to record, that from the great influx of prisoners, it is hardly possible to keep them in a state of wholesome cleanliness, a circumstance we deeply deplore, as putting together all descriptions of offenders, an evil easily obviated in the opinion of the Jury (and in which opinion they are borne out by Mr. Brown, the keeper of the prison), if more space could be allotted, whereby a classification of the prisoners might be effected, to the evident improvement of their health, comfort, and morals.

The vast number of juvenile depredators in confinement, and the melancholy circumstance of four being under sentence of death in the condemned cells, and in irons, the youngest only nine years of age, and the oldest 12, connected with the circumstance of very many of them previous to trial associating with the profligate, hardened, and abandoned, presents to us the idea of the improbability of a reform, which a more judicious and attentive confinement might produce.

The deplorable situation of the male prisoners; with respect to clothing, particularly the juvenile part, made a melancholy impression on our minds. Many were without shoes or stockings, others without shirts, and one almost in a state of nakedness—circumstances we earnestly recommend to the consideration of those who arrange and manage the general business of the prison; and we are of opinion that the general health of the prisoners of both sexes would be materially improved, if an allowance of soap was granted for that purpose.

In visiting the Infirmary, the Grand Jury feel great pleasure in announcing that every necessary attention appears to have been paid to the sick, and those in a convalescent state, and to the general health of the prisoners.

We further beg leave to state to the Court the gratifying pleasure we received in witnessing the exertions of Mrs. Fry and the Ladies who so kindly assist her in attending to and instructing the female prisoners, whose reformed deportment, and cheerful acquiescence to their wishes, demonstrated with a force no language can describe the affection these unfortunate women entertain for these humane, intelligent, and active females.

JOHN GANN, Foreman of the Grand Jury.

LAW.

"As if from a rubbish cart a continually increasing and ever shapeless mass of LAW is from time to time shot down upon the heads of the people; and out of this rubbish, and at his peril, is each man left to pick out what belongs to him. Thus, in pouring forth Law, does the Government, as it is written, rain down snares."—BENTHAM.

SERJEANT'S INN HALL.

Thursday, Jan. 22.

HODGSON GENT. V. SCARLETT, ESQ.

It will be recollected this was an action brought by an Attorney in the North of England, against Mr. Scarlett, to recover a compensation in damages for certain slanderous expressions used by him reflecting on the plaintiff's conduct as an Attorney, in an address to the Jury in another cause in which the plaintiff was concerned. It appeared that the defendant, in his address to the Jury, in commenting on the plaintiff's conduct, described him as deserving the character of a wicked and fraudulent Attorney. For these expressions, thus used, the present plaintiff brought his action; and the cause came on to be tried before Mr. Baron Woulf. The plaintiff's Counsel opened the cause, and was proceeding to prove his case, when the Learned Judge stopped him, and declared his opinion that the action was not maintainable, and upon that declaration the plaintiff was nonsuited.

Mr. Raine, last term, obtained a rule, calling on the defendant to shew cause why there should not be a new trial granted.

Mr. TOPPING and Mr. Serjeant HURLOCK this day shewed cause against the rule; and Mr. RAINE and Mr. RICHARDSON supported it.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, after hearing the arguments on both sides, declared that a Counsel was not liable to an action for words used by him in the course of a cause, if the words so used were pertinent to the cause at issue. In the present case they were so; they were used in reference to the conduct of the plaintiff in another cause, out of which the present action originated. They were not random expressions, but were uttered by the Learned Counsel with probable foundation, as he uttered them from the instructions contained in his brief. The freedom of expression must necessarily be allowed to Gentlemen at the Bar, for the purposes of justice. Words used in argument, if pertinent and applicable to the case, were not actionable, unless it could be proved they were used from previous malice. It had been held that words sworn in an affidavit in any cause, or contained in any petition to Parliament, were not actionable, because uttered in a Court engaged in investigating the subject to which they alluded. On one occasion it was made a question whether the printing such petitions for the use of Members was justifiable, when it was held that it was so.—In the present case their Lordships were unanimously of opinion the action was not maintainable, and that it would be useless to send it for a new trial. The rule nisi, which Mr. Raine had obtained, was therefore discharged.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Friday, Jan. 23.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that a Lady, named Maria Philippa Dobbins, who was in custody for contempt in neglecting to obey a writ of Habeas Corpus, directing her to produce the body of her child, in order to its being delivered over to its father, should be now brought up to answer for her contempt.

Mrs. Dobbins, who is an interesting young woman, apparently about 24 or 25 years of age, soon appeared on the floor of the Court.

Mr. RICHARDSON said, the Lady being now in custody for contempt of Court, he might now proceed to move her immediate commitment, but he had no instruction to do so, if Mrs. Dobbins would undertake, on a day now to be named, to appear before one of their Lordships at chambers and produce the child.

Mrs. Dobbins's COUNSEL said, his client would undertake to do this, and Monday was the day fixed.

Mr. Justice BAXLEY—Mrs. Dobbins understands that she is to appear on that day with the child.

Mrs. Dobbins—My Lord, I shall certainly not appear with my child.

COUNSEL—My Lord, Mrs. Dobbins does not understand you. Will your Lordship permit me to speak to her.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—The Court can scarcely shut its ears to this declaration of further contumacy and disobedience.

Mrs. Dobbins—My Lord, I understand your Lordship perfectly. I beg pardon of the Court for any apparent contempt of its orders; but I cannot give up my child to such a father. I have bail ready.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Then you must be sworn, to answer interrogatories as to the cause of your contempt. You are out on your recognizances, and will not be committed.

Mrs. Dobbins was then sworn to answer on interrogatories, and, bowing to the Court, retired.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

Mr. BOLLAND applied to the Court for a criminal information against Robert Daw. He made this application at the instance of Mr. Ansley, the Senior Magistrate of the town of Reading. Some time ago, a man of the name of Allen was tried for embezzling the property of his employers. Mr. Ansley was the presiding Magistrate. Allen was found guilty, but on account of his previous good character, he was only sentenced to a short imprisonment, and to be whipped in the early part of it. He was accordingly committed. In the first week of his imprisonment, however, the Surgeon of the prison reported, that Allen was too ill to undergo the whipping. It was accordingly deferred for some time, and when he was flogged, the Gaoler had directions from Mr. Ansley to inflict the punishment in the most gentle manner; which directions were accordingly attended to. Some time after, Allen died; and Daw then thought proper to circulate the most libellous reports respecting Mr. Ansley. He wrote a letter to a Gentleman, in which, amongst other expressions, were the following:—"I have just been to poor Allen's house, and find it is as I thought. Ansley was the cause of his death—can he sleep on it—yes; the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin, &c." The remainder of the letter was in the same style.—The Court granted a rule to shew cause.

POLITICAL PROCEEDINGS AND RECOGNIZANCES.

After the Court had gone through the Bar, a young man of decent appearance presented himself on the floor, and expressed a wish to address their Lordships.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH enquired his name and the object of his address—to which he replied—

My Lord, my name is John Roberts, I have been confined in Lancashire Gaol for some time under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, and have recently been discharged upon my own recognizance of 100*l.*, by which recognizance I am bound to attend in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of the present Term, and from day to day during the Term, to answer such matters and things as may be alleged against me on the part of his Majesty, then this recognizance to be void, otherwise to continue in full force; I appear here accordingly, and wish to know what your Lordship has to say against me?

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—I have nothing to say to you; it is you are to say and me to hear.

Roberts—I hope your Lordship will tell me what to do?

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—No, you must tell me what you want; I am a Judge, and not Counsel.

Roberts—My Lord, my recognizance is to appear.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Well, and you have appeared and discharged your duty; you have done all you have to do. Call the peremptory.

Another man then presented himself, and said, my Lord, my name is Gill, I also have been confined under the Suspension Act, and liberated on a recognizance, calling on me, under forfeiture of 100*l.* to appear in this Court on the first day of Term, and from day to day during the said Term, and not to depart the Court without leave; he wished to know what he was to do?

The Court answered him in the same terms as the last applicant, and again directed the Clerk to proceed with the Peremptory Paper. This, however, was prevented by another person stepping forward and addressing their Lordships.

My Lord, —My name is Johnson; I came from Exeter Gaol; I am also discharged under a recognizance to appear in this Court from day to day during the Term. I have accordingly appeared, and wish to learn from your Lordship whether I must continue to present myself here daily during the Term.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—You need not appear here any more till you are called on to do so.

Mr. Johnson—My Lord, this will not satisfy me; my recognizance says I must attend from day to day.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Do you wish to have this recognizance discharged? If you do, you must make an affidavit.

Mr. Johnson—Will your Lordship say, if I make such affidavit I shall be discharged.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—I will say nothing till I know what appears on your affidavit.

Francis Ward then stepped forward—My Lord, I have to apply under similar circumstances—I have an affidavit.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—We have already given an answer to you individually and collectively. Go on with the peremptory.

John Knight—My Lord, I live at Manchester, and was liberated from Worcester Gaol on the 1st of January, 1818; on a recognizance, calling on me to attend here from day to day. I have now attended, and wish to be dismissed as soon as possible.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—You may go, now you have appeared, and have nothing more to do till you have notice.

Mr. Knight—But, my Lord, that does not satisfy me. I may be called on to attend again the very instant I get back to Manchester. I may go out of town to-morrow, and be called back the day after. I am not satisfied. This will neither suit my finances nor my business.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—We can say nothing further to you.—The Court cannot assist you.

Samuel Drummond—My Lords, I come from Manchester under similar circumstances. I have now appeared—am I, in consequence, to consider this recognizance as null and void? If it is so, I shall now depart, and trouble you with no further questions.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—We are not now called on to give an opinion. When something is done upon these recognizances, then we will give an opinion. We have noticed your appearance now, and should you in future be called on, we shall take that circumstance into consideration. You are now at liberty to leave the Court. The Court has repeatedly told you, that you need not attend again, without notice. We can do nothing more for you.

F. Ward again presented himself.—My Lord, I have an affidavit, and wish to make a motion. I wish to have this recognizance discharged, or immediately be brought to trial. I have no means of living in town, nor have I money to pay my way back to my home. I borrowed money to come to town.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—We have already answered you. We cannot waste the public time. Proceed with the Peremptory Paper.

The Peremptory Paper was then called over, and their Lordships rose to leave the Court. Several of the persons who had previously addressed the Court pressed forward, but Lord Ellenborough, Mr. Justice Abbott, and Mr. Justice Holroyd, left the Court.

Mr. Justice Bayley being the last of their Lordships, F. Ward again addressed his Lordship—My Lord, here's my affidavit; am I to understand that I am discharged from further attendance?

Mr. Justice BAYLEY read the affidavit, and having done so, observed—I have read your affidavit, and think the wisest thing you can do is to go home again.

Ward—Do I now understand that my affidavit is received? If it is, I move that my recognizance be discharged, or that I be brought immediately to trial.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—I have before told you the Court cannot do this for you. If you ask me for advice, I again say, you had better go home about your business.

Mr. Johnson again presented himself, and said, they would all attend again, when they would come better prepared.

OLD BAILEY.

On Saturday week four prisoners were tried, two of whom were capitally convicted, viz. W. Kelly and T. Spicer, two boys, one only 15, the other 17 years of age, for uttering a 5*l.* note, purporting to be that of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. Kelly, who had been arraigned on Friday, and pleaded guilty, but was sent back to re-consider the plea, again pleaded guilty, and persisted in it, notwithstanding the COMMON SERJEANT warned him that he would derive no advantage from it. The Prisoner said, "How can I plead not guilty, my Lord, when I know that I am guilty? but Spicer is innocent."—Spicer pleaded not guilty, and was put on his trial. Verdict, Guilty, Death.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

D. Evans was on Tuesday re-examined on a charge of murdering his wife, in Falconberg-court, Chob. The only additional evidence to that which we have already laid before our readers was that of Mary Jones, who proved that he assisted in laying out the deceased, whose head was much beaten, and one of her ear-rings broken out, which the prisoner said happened in consequence of her being drunk, and beating herself on the floor, besides the blows he struck her; and Charlotte Powell, who keeps a public-house at the corner of the court, proved, that hearing some persons say that Evans's wife was very ill, and others that she was dead, she went over and asked him about her; to which he answered, that she was better, and said something about the Doctor's having been, or was coming, to see her. The prisoner appeared very ill, having scarcely taken any food; and it is doubted whether he will live to undergo his trial.—He was fully committed.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT TO A POOR CHIMNEY SWEEP.—On Monday, one of Davis's (Theobald's-road) boys came to sweep the chimney of — Rockall, green-grocer, Upper King-street, Bloomsbury. He had no one to assist him; shortly afterwards Rockall and his wife were alarmed by the crying of the boy, who said he was fixed in the chimney. Rockall in vain endeavoured to find out where he was in the flue. After breaking it open in several places, the boy cried out murder, and that he was dying. Rockall ran after Davis, who was not at home; and then, with no more success, to another chimney-sweeper. Davis at length came himself, and after destroying great part of the chimney, and putting the owner to more than 2*l.* expence, extricated the boy, who was nearly exhausted. The boy was confined in the flue upwards of an hour, in imminent danger.

On Saturday week, as J. Jones, Esq. was coming to town in a postchaise from his country residence at Esher, he fell back and expired.

On Wednesday, an Inquest was held at Bethnal-green, on the body of Mary Wilson, a young woman, who, from the evidence, took poison, on account of her landlord having served on her a distress warrant for rent.—She admitted to the surgeon who attended her that she had taken poison. Verdict—Insanity.

About five o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, near the five mile stone on the Harrow-road, a waggon heavily laden stopped for some time, in which interval a fine boy, about four years of age, being at play, unperceived by any person, twisted the iron chain at the tail of the waggon, which passed between the spokes of one of the wheels, round his neck. The waggoner drove on his team, when the unfortunate child's head was completely severed from its body.

On Monday night Kennington Chapel was broken into, and robbed of the communion plate, prayer-books, &c.

BIRTHS.

On Friday week, at Lambton-Hall, Durham, of a son and heir, Lady Louisa Lambton, the lady of J. G. Lambton, Esq. M.P. and eldest daughter of Earl Grey.

On Tuesday, the 20th instant, Mrs. Henry Elmes, of College-Hill, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

On the 21st, at Christ Church, Spital-fields, the Rev. John Hemming, of Kimbolton, A.M. F.W.S. to Mary, daughter of the late John Symonds, of Kidderminster, Esq.

Jan. 16, Alex. Stewart, Esq. of Finsbury-square, to Agnes, eldest daughter of Wm. Logan, Esq. of Queen-street.

Jan. 21, Christ. Alderson, Esq. of Five Elms House, Homerton, to Mrs. White, widow of Lieut. Colonel White.

Jan. 21, Blackall Simonds, Esq. of Reading, to Emma Jane, eldest daughter of Thos. Osborne, Esq. of Cumberland-street.

DEATHS.

On Monday, the 12th instant, at his house in Lower Belgrave-place, Pimlico, Mr. Wm. Silk, who (says a Correspondent) for fifty years served his country as a soldier and an officer, and whose memory will ever be respected by all who knew him.

On Thursday morning, Sarah, the wife of Mr. John Wyatt, Hatton Garden.

On the 7th inst. aged 74, Mr. Thomas Cook, an Engraver of considerable merit in the line manner. He devoted 12 or 13 years of his life to re-engraving the works of Hogarth, which would have turned to very good account, but for the bankruptcy of the parties with whom he was connected. This event darkened his declining years. He has left a Son, Mr. Henry Cook, who promises to become a clever Engraver. A Portrait of Charles I., which he has engraved, possesses considerable merit.

Jan. 11, in the Cloisters, Westminster Abbey, Hannah, the wife of the Rev. R. Lendon, A.M. Rector of St. Edmund the King, Lombard-street.

Jan. 14, at Beckingham, Kent, in his 85th year, Joseph Cator, Esq.

Jan. 16, at Windsor, Cordall Powell, Esq. First Clerk of his Majesty's Spicery.

Jan. 17, at Higham-hill, Walthamstow, in his 60th year, John Branton, Esq. late of Aldersgate-street.

Jan. 18, in Bloomsbury-square, Lieutenant-Colonel Baynes, Assistant Deputy Adjutant-General, Royal Artillery.

Mr. Hanwell, of Chancery-lane, went on Wednesday afternoon on a visit of condolence to a friend at Newington Butts, and on his return, about nine o'clock, in passing the Magdalen Asylum, in Blackfriars-road, he dropped down, and instantly expired.

On Tuesday, suddenly, Mr. John Darwson, at his house in Crown-court, Triquity-lane, late of Chester, in his 30th year. He was in perfect health on Monday, and ate a hearty dinner.

Jan. 9, Mrs. King, wife of Mr. King, of Cranhill, near Wantage; and on the following night, Mr. King, husband of the above. Mr. King had been for some time unwell with a nervous disorder, when his wife was attacked with a paralytic stroke two or three days previous to her death, and the attendants excluded him from the sick room as much as they possibly could. On the morning of her death they were desirous to withhold the information from him until some one appeared who would break it to him with caution; and on his inquiring after her health, he received for answer, "she is easy now;" not satisfied with this reply, he brushed hastily past a servant who was entering her chamber, and advancing to the bed-side, laid his hand on the cold forehead of his wife; the shock communicated by the sudden certainty of his loss was too mighty for his faculties, and he fell senseless to the ground; he was conveyed in this state from the room, and lingered until the following night, when he expired.

THE SPEECH.

"SPEECH," saith a modern Statesman, "was given to man to conceal his thoughts." The Duke of MARRBOROUGH seems to have acted upon this opinion, when he put out the candles one evening before he conversed with an Envoy; and so much has it been in vogue instinctively, that pure openness of speaking on the part of a single Statesman has been known to baffle the views of all the rest; for they could not but conclude, as a matter of course, that he meant something different from what he said; and so took measures to intercept him in the usual bye-ways; while he was pursuing his unobstructed journey along the road.

But even speech itself, though a concealment according to these gentlemen, was sometimes found insufficient for the purpose without the aid of other concealments. Statesmen, not always being able to put out the candles, did not chuse to have their faces perused or their memories exercised while speaking; and CHARLES the Second, we believe, was the first English prince who delivered his Speech from a written paper, being ashamed, he said, to look his people any more in the face while asking them for money. His successors adopted his mode; and as the political object of the gift of speech could not but be specially called into play on some of these occasions, the Speech, emphatically so called, is very apt to be a most complete specimen of it, particularly as the professed object, then more than at any other time, is to speak the whole sum and substance of the thoughts of Government.

"Speech is given to man to conceal his thoughts." The Speech from the throne "ought," as Lord FOLKESTONE observed, "to be a full Exposition of the State of the Nation." It ought to tell us what is our actual state, foreign and domestic,—our relations with the principal foreign governments, our financial and moral concerns, our successes and our difficulties, our circumstances just past, actually present, and just about to come; and in order to tell us something of all these, it ought to give us as many items and actual details as are consistent with a general sketch,—all such, at any rate, as shall prevent it from being a more vague succession of Ministerial opinions, and confidences, and omissions; so that, although the advisers of the reigning prince should always be responsible for its contents, the prince himself should really have a personal communication through it with his subjects, and appear before them, truly and openly, in order to give them his own account of things, to state to them his own opinions, and to interchange with them candid and honourable sympathies on the state of affairs, favourable or not.

Now recollect all the important subjects, retrospective or prospective, that have arisen during the recess of Parliament,—the prosecutions in all parts of the country, the imprisonments in all parts, the extraordinary failures of proof against the alleged criminals, the wretched distresses for which subscriptions are again coming forth, the delicate situation of the funds, the state of France, the money concerns with Austria and other powers, the quarrel between Spain and Portugal, or rather the greater one between Spain and the South Americans, the relations with North America, the policy of Russia, the disposition of the Barbary Powers, whether or not they have chosen to remember the lesson we taught them, &c. &c. &c. recollect all this, and see how much of it there is in the following "Speech from the Throne," which was read by the LORD CHANCELLOR from the Woolsack:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to inform you, that it is with great concern that he is obliged to announce to you the continuance of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

"The Prince Regent is persuaded, that you will deeply participate in the affliction with which his Royal Highness has been visited, by the calamitous and untimely death of his beloved and only child the Princess Charlotte. Under this awful dispensation of Providence, it has been a soothing consolation to the Prince Regent's heart, to receive from all descriptions of his Majesty's subjects the most cordial assurances both of their just sense of the loss which they have sustained, and of their sympathy with his parental sorrow; and, amidst his own sufferings, his Royal Highness has not been unmindful of the effect which this sad event must have had on the interests and future prospects of the kingdom.

"We are commanded to acquaint you, that the Prince Regent continues to receive from Foreign Powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this Country, and of their desire to maintain the general tranquillity.

"His Royal Highness has the satisfaction of being able to assure you, that the confidence which he has invariably felt in the stability of the great sources of our national prosperity has not been disappointed.

The Improvement which has taken place in the course of the last year, in almost every branch of our domestic Industry, and the present state of Public Credit, afford abundant proof that the difficulties under which the Country was labouring were chiefly to be ascribed to temporary causes.

"So important a change could not fail to withdraw from the disaffected the principal means of which they had availed themselves, for the purpose of fomenting a spirit of discontent, which unhappily led to acts of insurrection and treason; and his Royal Highness entertains the most confident expectation, that the state of peace and tranquillity to which the Country is now restored, will be maintained against all attempts to disturb it, by the persevering vigilance of the Magistracy, and by the loyalty and good sense of the People.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Prince Regent has directed the Estimates for the current year to be laid before you. His Royal Highness recommends to your continued attention the state of the Public Income and Expenditure; and he is most happy in being able to acquaint you, that, since you were last assembled in Parliament, the Revenue has been in a state of progressive Improvement in its most important Branches.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by the Prince Regent to inform you, that he has concluded Treaties with the Courts of Spain and Portugal, on the important subject of the Abolition of the Slave Trade. His Royal Highness has directed that a Copy of the former Treaty should be immediately laid before; and he will order a similar communication to be made of the latter Treaty, as soon as the Ratification of it shall have been exchanged. In these Negotiations it has been his Royal Highness's endeavour, as far as circumstances would permit, to give effect to the recommendations contained in the joint Addresses of the two Houses of Parliament; and his Royal Highness has a full reliance on your readiness to adopt such measures as may be necessary for fulfilling the engagement into which he has entered for that purpose.

"The Prince Regent has commanded us to direct your particular attention to the deficiency which has so long existed in the number of places of Public Worship belonging to the Established Church, when compared with the increased and increasing population of the Country. His Royal Highness most earnestly recommends this important subject to your early consideration, deeply impressed, as he has no doubt you are, with a just sense of the many blessings which this Country, by the favour of Divine Providence, has enjoyed; and with the conviction, that the religious and moral habits of the People are the most sure and firm foundation of National Prosperity."

Now if there is any exposition of the state of the nation here, then is the margin round this page of the Examiner covered with all the items of our expenditure, aye, and with portraits, in illumination, of all the princes of Europe, like an old royal manuscript. What do we learn of any actual circumstances or questions between us and the Foreign Powers, by being told of their "strong assurances" of friendliness? What of the grounds of confidence in the stability of our resources, in the mere expression of that confidence? What of improvements of our condition, and defeat of the machinations of the disaffected, in the mere use of such terms? What of the state of public income and of the current expenditure, in a mere recommendation of them to attention? What again, of our political relations with the great number of Foreign Powers in the mere delivery of a treaty with Spain and Portugal on the subject of the Slave Trade? What of France, North and South America, our Military Establishment, the Poor Laws, &c. and a world of other things to be accounted for, in the recommendation of the subject of church-building! This is indeed the asking for bread and receiving a stone!

But enough of this inefficient and wishy-washy Speech, as Lord Folkestone called it. It is another remarkable specimen of the inferiority of the Ministers to the increased intellect of the nation, and of their total inability to meet it.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN, JAN. 10.—We have already spoken of a loan of three millions sterling which our Government proposes to raise in London. According to the official scale of regulations for this loan, which is now before us, the conditions are such as to afford an interest of 3 1-3d per cent.

GERMANY.

FRANKFORT, JAN. 20.—It is now said that the meeting of the Sovereigns will take place at Dusseldorf, and not at Prague, as the political journals had erroneously announced.

SPAIN.

MADRID, JAN. 9.—The Government has published official accounts of the events which preceded the capture of the traitor Minn. These authentic details are the best answers that can be given to those foreign writers who propagate with culpable ardour the most absurd relations, in the hope of perverting public opinion, and troubling the peace of the world.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Jan. 27.

This day being appointed for opening the Session, the Lords Commissioners (the Lords Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Harrowby, and the Earl of Westmorland) took their places at three o'clock; when the Usher of the Black Rod, Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, was sent to the House of Commons, to demand the attendance of that House. The Speaker accordingly, accompanied by about 60 Members, forthwith appeared at the Bar; when the Prince Regent's Speech was read; for which see the front page.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION.

Lord HOLLAND, satisfied that a moment ought not to be lost in restoring those invaluable privileges to the people of which they had been deprived, should without delay introduce a Bill for the purpose, unless Ministers meant immediately to repeal the Suspension Bill.

Lord LIVERPOOL answered, that such was the intention of Ministers.

ADDRESS TO THE REGENT.

The Earl of AYLESFORD moved an Address to the Regent, which was as usual merely an echo of the Speech.—Lord SELSEA seconded the motion.

Earl STANHOPE (a son, we suppose, of the late patriotic Nobleman of that name) observed that the country was much indebted to Ministers, who had steered the vessel of the State happily into port. He had however heard with much pain a report of the withdrawing the Allied troops from France. If, as had been alleged, the people of France bestowed their affections on the Bourbons, why not release Bonaparte from St. Helena? This they would not do; and what was the inference? Why, that the Bourbons, who had been twice expelled from the throne, could only be kept there by foreign bayonets, by which they had been replaced upon it. France had been twice conquered, and the conquerors had a right to divide the country, if they pleased; they had deemed it proper to put up Louis XVIII. which they had an undoubted right to do; but if he was not supported by a foreign force, a new revolution would arise, and we should be plunged into a new war, which would end in our utter destruction. The Allied troops, therefore, instead of being withdrawn, should be kept in France the full term prescribed by the Treaty, or even longer, if necessary. He implored Ministers, to look to this, and not to suffer the cry for Economy and Reform to injure the best interests of the nation. As for Reform, he thought it ought to be applied solely to the municipal laws and the municipal administration.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN, after alluding to the death of the Princess as a great calamity which had affected all ranks and conditions,—adverted to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and to the conduct of Ministers in reference to that measure. Events had proved, that the ordinary laws would have been quite sufficient to have met all the evils in question, for in fact the schemes of the disaffected had been put down by those laws. Instead of the people in general being disposed towards the disaffected, it was proved that wherever they appeared, the country-people manifested the greatest alarm. He protested against the measures introduced last Session, and he contemplated the repeal of the Suspension Act with pleasure. It was only to that part of the Address which appeared to approve of that measure that he objected.

Lord LIVERPOOL was ready to prove, at the proper time, that all the precautionary measures adopted by Ministers were called for by the necessity of the case. With respect to what had fallen from his Noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) in a speech of great ability, he had only to remark, that the great policy of the country was to maintain Peace, which could only be done by a strict adherence to the engagements into which the nation had entered. He did not join in the opinion expressed respecting the Bourbons and the people of France. On the contrary, his impressions were of an opposite nature. There was nothing in the state of the Continent to warrant the Noble Lord's apprehensions. The well-known disposition of all the Continental Powers also afforded the best augury for the preservation of Peace.

The Address was unanimously agreed to; and after some further business, the House adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 28.

REPEAL OF THE SUSPENSION ACT.

The Bill brought in by Lord SIMONDS was read a first time, and (the standing orders being suspended for the purpose) his Lordship moved the second reading.

Lord HOLLAND said, that Ministers, in proposing the present measure, had done more than he expected from them; but he must ever assert, that the Act now about to be repealed had been one of the greatest calamities to the nation. Believing as he did that their Lordships last Session had proceeded on garbled and unfair evidence, he should not be satisfied with the mere repeal of the Act. Inquiry should certainly be instituted; for the right which had been suspended was not one which Parliament had granted: the Personal Liberty of the People was no concession: it was a right antecedent to any statute, and equal to the right of the King to sit on the throne. Overwhelming necessity alone could justify its suspension; and it was their peculiar duty to guard against all encroachments.—The late prosecutions for the parodies, though he did not admire the taste of such production, evinced marks of hypocrisy he had never before witnessed. There was not one so weak as to believe that any such prosecutions would have taken place, had the parodist's object been to ridicule the opponents of Ministers. Many such parodies, even of the most disgusting nature, had been totally unnoticed by the Crown; it was therefore impossible not to despise the hypocritical pretences under which the late prosecutions had been brought forward; and Ministers must endure the obvious consequences of such partial conduct.

Lord SIMONDS observed, that their Lordships Report of last Session was a sufficient answer to the argument of the Noble Lord, that the Suspension Act was totally uncalled for. There never was a greater contrast exhibited by the country, than that which the comparison of its present state with that of last year afforded; and he would prove at the proper time, that the Suspension Act had mainly contributed to this happy result. As to the charge against Ministers for having prosecuted the parodies, they had done so, not from hypocritical motives, but because they saw, in the progress of disaffection, that the same means were used to alienate the affections of the people from their Government as had been resorted to, with such fatal success, in another country—he meant, a continued attempt to sap the foundations of Religion and Morals, and to render contemptible in the eyes of the people every thing that was sacred and established.—The further continuation of the Suspension Act was not required by the circumstances of the country, and Ministers made haste to call for its repeal: not that there was an absence of all disposition to disturb the public peace, for there was a sufficient number of daring and unprincipled individuals, both in and out of the metropolis, who were ready to seize every opportunity to excite to disaffection and disturbance. But the means of evil in the hands of these men were so abated, that they might now be left to the ordinary powers of the law.—He had endeavoured to discharge a most painful and difficult duty temperately and firmly, and had always well weighed what came before him.

The Bill was then read a second and a third time, engrossed, and sent to the Commons.—Adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 29.

Before the House adjourned, Lord LIVERPOOL gave notice, that his Noble Colleague would on Monday lay before their Lordships certain Papers relative to the internal state of the country.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Jan. 27.

Lord COCHRANE gave notice of an early motion respecting giving Relief to the Distressed Seamen by means of the Droits of Admiralty. (His Lordship had previously asked, whether the Admiralty intended to apply any portion of these Droits to the subject, and had been answered by Mr. DUNDAS, that he had no communication to make.)

General THORNTON gave notice, that on the 7th February he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal an Act of Charles II. declaring the Catholic Religion idolatrous!

ADDRESS TO THE PRINCE REGENT.

The SPEAKER having read the Speech of the Prince Regent, Mr. WOODHOUSE dilated in praise of it, in a speech of some length, in which he observed, that the marks of prosperity were now every where discernible—there was a perfect restoration of content, and the hateful seeds of disaffection were banished from the land.—He concluded with moving the usual Address to the Throne.

Mr. WINDHAM QUIN followed in the same strain, and seconded the motion.

Lord ALTHORP approved of the Address; but he took the opportunity of adverting to the trial of Mr. Hone; for though no man could approve of those parodies of sacred subjects, yet he had been guilty of no legal offence; and after the first acquittal, why were the prosecutions persevered in? Such proceedings could only have the effect of destroying the confidence of the country in the trial by Jury.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL observed, that as he had felt it to be his duty to prosecute the first parody, so, on the same principle, he felt it his duty to prosecute all. There was no resentment against the individual, except what his crime had excited. All the publications were equally offensive. One verdict on one libel could not convince him that the defendant was not guilty on the other two. He had acted throughout according to his bounden duty.

Sir S. ROMILLY agreed with the Address. Adverting to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he remarked on the proceedings at Manchester, at Derby, and in Scotland.—observing, that all the legal evidence in these transactions had ended to overthrow the evidence on which the House had acted last Session. According to the Report of the Secret Committees, an atrocious conspiracy had existed, and Manchester in particular was to be made a Moscow. How had these desperate conspirators been dealt with? At the Assizes the Crown Officer said he had no evidence against them—every thing was tranquil, and Ministers wished to show clemency! If however there had been any truth in the Secret Reports, were such conspirators deserving of clemency? Yet, though the country was thus declared to be tranquil, many against whom there was insufficient evidence were imprisoned under the Suspension Act; so that it should seem that those against whom there was the strongest case were discharged, and those against whom there was the weakest, were kept in prison! As to the Derby proceedings, those who suffered there had certainly been guilty of a capital crime, whether treason or no. But these very proceedings pronounced the full condemnation of the Suspension Act; for those crimes were not prevented by it; and he on his conscience believed, from the information he had received, that the whole of that insurrection was the work of the persons sent by Government—not indeed for that specific purpose, but as emissaries of sedition from Clubs that had never existed! The Crown Lawyers, however, took special care that it should not be ascertained how far this information was correct, by leaving all the previous proceedings in obscurity. Sir Samuel then alluded to Hone's trials. The late Attorney-General, he said, had in that House declared, that he had received a copy of one of those terrible Parodies, but that it was so monstrously blasphemous, he could never consent to read any thing so shocking—(Much laughing)—and yet the present Attorney-General had caused this shocking blasphemy to be circulated among thousands, to be reprinted, and to go down to posterity; and this too after they had been suppressed by the defendant!—Publications, however, of this sort were, in his opinion, highly reprehensible: they tended to detract from the reverence due to sacred subjects, which those persons who had the misfortune not to believe in the doctrines of Christianity, were still bound to hold in respect. But if the Attorney-General was bound to prosecute all Parodies, he should look about him! He was driven to believe, that the Prosecutions were persevered in to bring the verdicts of Juries on trials for libel into discredit; for it was probably imagined, that if a prejudice could possibly be excited in the minds of religious sects against the trial by Jury, the public mind might be prepared for its overthrow. The public feeling, however, was quite in favour of the acquittals, and all such expectations had happily been disappointed.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL denied that the men confined at Lancaster were the persons alluded to in the Secret Report, as being engaged in the conspiracy for the destruction of Manchester: they were only charged with a misdemeanour. As to the Derby trial, a more satisfactory one had never taken place—(Hear, hear!)—nor one in which the clemency of Government had been more fully shown! As to the trials of Mr. Hone, there were three distinct libels; and if a man had been indicted for three separate murders, would his acquittal on one of them have proved the injustice of proceeding with the others?—(Hear, hear!)

Lord FOLKSTONE was still of opinion, that the persons lately discharged were the same as those formerly charged with the intended destruction of Manchester. With respect to the Derby trials, who that attended to them but must be convinced, that the Treason which was proved was the treason of Oliver?—was the production of the Agent of Government—Lord Sidmouth's Agent—Oliver! The feelings of those who consigned his victims to punishment, he did not envy.—Mr. Hone's trials proved one of two things,—a spirit of persecution against the individual, or a marked evidence of imbecility on the part of Ministers. The late scenes at the King's Bench gave a finish to the picture of degradation. Lord Folkstone made several other strong observations on various topics, and concluded with remarking, that he objected to the whole tenor of the Speech, miserably inadequate as it was to the wants and interests and wishes of the people, at a moment when their liberties were at the feet of Ministers. The Speech, instead of being a full exposition of the state of the nation, was altogether a wishy-washy communication!—Our ancestors took another course.—The scene of sorrow lately exhibited throughout the country went utterly to falsify the charge brought against the people of disaffection to the House of Brunswick; the scene indeed deprived description of its power: it had seemed as if the country had been visited with the last great plague of Egypt, and that the eldest born in every house lay dead within its doors! (Hear, hear!) It was not to be overlooked, that in every Address of Condolence, the private and public virtues of the Deceased had been specifically adverted to:—if therefore there should exist in this country any enemies to any Branch of the House of Brunswick,—if any part of the community are discontented with their conduct,—let that Branch look to itself for the cause of the hostility!

Lord CASTLEREAGH thought the present was not the time for the discussion of many of the topics introduced: but he must protest against the attack made on the laws of the country, which tended to bring the Courts of Justice into contempt. It had been alleged that the persons found guilty at Derby owed their crime and punishment to the machinations of the Agents of Government. Such a charge tended to the total subversion of all order in society, and it was wholly unfounded. There was not the slightest proof that Mr. Oliver had any connection whatever with the crimes of the prisoners. If any such connexion could have been proved, Mr. Oliver was, near the place of trial, and might have been called by the Prisoners*, had they chosen to do so.—When the time came for discussion, Ministers would not shrink from due inquiry; he would then prove that they had acted an honest part, that they had done only their duty, and that they had carried the country through much difficulty and danger to its present tranquil and prosperous state. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. BENNET was prepared to prove, notwithstanding these confident assertions, that the greater part of the disaffection alluded to was the work of the paid Emissaries of Ministers.

Mr. BROUGHAM made a few remarks.

Lord COCHRANE thought the Address very dissatisfactory. Where was the proof of the prosperity talked of in the Speech? Was it to be found in the deficient revenue—in crowded work-houses, in streets thronged with distressed seamen, in the enormous amount of poor rates,—in the misery, in short, that universally prevailed? All this was occasioned by the delinquency of Ministers. And what was the atonement presented? Why, a recommendation to build more Churches! It was indeed in all ages the practice of Sinners to build churches. But they had better enlarge the jails or build alms-houses, in which the poor might seek a refuge from starvation. Their allegation of Prosperity was truly a mockery of the public understanding. In no nation in Europe, not even in Spain, was there such a portion of suffering as in this country.

The Address was then unanimously agreed to, and the House adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 28.

ADDRESS TO THE REGENT.

Lord MILNER expressed his great satisfaction at that part of the Regent's Speech which related to the increase in the number of Churches, of which there were great deficiency. If the public purse were to be called upon, he thought it right that some inquiry should be instituted into the affairs of the Church Establishment, to see what modes of relief therein could with propriety be made available for so desirable an object. In the building of the Churches, great attention should be paid to the accommodation of the lower orders, who were now slightly attended to in many parish churches.

* The Prisoners did not call Mister Oliver, my Lord, for this plain reason: they had pleaded Not Guilty: how then could they call on your Lordship's Spy to show that they had been seduc'd by him into Guilt?—Will not the dying words of the wretched sufferers,—“IT IS ALL OLIVER AND THE GOVERNMENT,”—ring in the ears of some in their last moments?—Exam.

Mr. CURWEN said, they were told of the flourishing state of the country, yet thousands were still wanting bread, the Poor Rates would most likely increase next year, and trade was at a low ebb! Look too at Ireland. Here the deficit in our finances was about 8 millions, and there he believed it was four. Nothing short of looking stedfastly at our embarrassments could save the country.

The report on the Address was agreed to.

ADDRESSES OF CONDOLENCE TO THE QUEEN, &c.

Lord CASTLEREAGH hoped that the Addresses of Condolence on the late tragical events would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the House. The unexpected death of a Mother and her Child, under the most affecting circumstances, was a subject of deep interest even in private life. How much, then, must these feelings be aggravated by the consideration of the high station and prospects of the illustrious individual whose lamented death now called for condolence? Her recent marriage to the man of her choice, under most auspicious circumstances, formed a painful contrast to her sudden and untimely end. But it was painful and unnecessary to dwell on the subject. Though they might have no precedent for their direction in this case, for any condolence beyond the throne, yet they were warranted in addressing that illustrious individual whose fate had been so intimately connected with that of our beloved Princess. The bright prospects held out from the happy union of Prince Leopold with the Princess Charlotte were such as could rarely occur. Their rare virtues reflected dignity on their exalted station; and the sorrow excited by the fatal overthrow of hopes so justly entertained, was not more general in this country than in every foreign state. He therefore proposed that a Message of Condolence be sent to her Majesty, &c. &c.

Mr. CALCRAFT observed, that he should be wanting in duty to himself and to the public, if he did not oppose this motion! He would use no harsh words, nor would he enter on any explanation; but he was compelled to express his marked dissent!—(Hear, hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH remarked, that as there was no reason given, he could have no reply to make.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR also expressed his strong dissent to the motion.

The Motion was put. There was a general cry of “Aye” from the Treasury Bench, and of “No” from the other side.

The SPEAKER—“I think the ayes have it.”

It was then ordered that Colonel Desborough should present the Address to her Majesty, and the Address to the Prince Cobourg was then agreed to unanimously, Mr. CALCRAFT and Mr. BROUGHAM both giving their warm assent to it.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Sir F. BURDETT observed, that Ministers by their coercive measures had attempted to set aside the demand for Parliamentary Reform, made last Session by a million of persons. All the unconstitutional measures taken by Ministers resulted from this strong and explicit declaration of popular sentiment. They must not, however, imagine that the people of England would be frightened either into a belief of the excellence or into an acquiescence in the integrity of that House. The Petition he held in his hand was subscribed by 20 persons, the number allowed to assemble under the severest legislative acts. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus was, indeed, to be repealed, but that could neither afford much exultation as to the present, nor great confidence respecting the future. The Habeas Corpus was intended to prevent the tyrannical exertion of arbitrary power; but, being set aside on the most frivolous pretences, it only presented a dangerous ground of confidence. Indeed, it might as well be obliterated from the statute-book, not only because it proved useless in the only times when it was intended to operate, but because under the cover of the suspension of this Act, powers were conferred on Ministers which had been unknown before the reign of Charles the Second, when the Habeas Corpus passed. But, in small numbers, such as subscribed this petition, the people could always meet, without affording a pretext for the infamous measures which Ministers always adopted to counteract the wishes and the interests of the people. Was it to be imagined that this was the time when the people could be silent on the subject of reform?—Was it when sedition was excited for the purpose of resisting Reform—was it when spies and informers were hired to instigate men to crimes, for which they were led to the scaffold and executed as traitors—was it at such a time that the people could remain silent on the great subject of Reform in that House? A representation of the people in that House was the only security for the enjoyment of liberty and the administration of justice. From the want of that representation proceeded all the interior and minor grievances which formed subjects of complaint throughout the country. He took the opportunity of making these observations now, when presenting the Petition he held in his hand, from 20 inhabitants of Bath, but he would not be precluded from bringing the subject fully and distinctly before the House on a future day.

The Petition was then read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.—Eight similar petitions from the same place were afterwards laid on the table.—Adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 29.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION REPEAL BILL.

This Bill having been read a first and second time, on the motion for its being committed,

Lord FOLKSTONE observed, that the repeal of the Suspension was not enough; something was due to those persons who had suffered under its operation. It seemed to him that those discharged under recognizances had been unjustly treated: accusations on oath could alone justify such measures.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, if the taking these recognizances was illegal, there was power in the Courts to investigate the matter and discharge the individuals. It was a law question.

Lord CASTLEREAGH gave a similar opinion.

Mr. BROUGHAM also thought it was a law question; but the present consideration was as to the requiring recognizances at the option of Government.

Sir S. ROMILLY observed, that the country had existed nearly twelve months under the tyranny of this dreadful statute. When did the suspension become unnecessary? Was it a day, a week, a month, before the meeting of Parliament? Since June there existed not a shadow of pretext for its continuation. Let it be duly remarked, that it was in June that the conduct of certain Spies and emissaries of Government was exposed: from that time we have ceased to hear of the movements of the discontented.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. B. BARNUM said that Ministers had all along acted under an imperative sense of public duty. As to a certain individual (Oliver) he had no difficulty in asserting, in opposition to all clamour, that that person had done no mischief whatever; but, on the contrary, he had done great service, by disclosing conspiracies at which he had only incidentally and accidentally been present! For surely little weight could be attached to the declarations of the unfortunate men dying at Derby, as they had been fully disproved by their own previous statements. The real cause of the tranquillity since June was to be found in the Suspension Law.

Mr. TIERNEY remarked, that Government were pledged to show the country that danger had existed to the very last hour previous to the repeal of the Act—and that the conduct of their spies had not in one instance produced any sort of mischief.

The Bill having proceeded, and on the motion for its third reading, Lord FOLKSTONE moved, that all persons bound by recognizances should be discharged from them.

Lord CASTLEREAGH observed, that this would place the House in a very awkward situation; for it would be legislating on a question which remained to be discussed in a Court of law.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was far from supposing that recognizances were illegal. The motion was unnecessary.

Mr. BROUGHAM called upon his Learned Friend to say, whether the Court of King's Bench would not refuse redress, on the ground, that the recognizances were voluntarily entered into? Government had said, you must remain in prison or give recognizances; and the prisoners yielded.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said, the Court would not refuse on such ground. The whole question was, whether the recognizances were legal in the present case.

Sir S. ROMILLY maintained that the House was bound to adopt the proposition.

After some further conversation, Lord FOLKSTONE withdrew his motion, on an express declaration of the Attorney-General, that the recognizances given by the liberated persons would all be discharged.—The Bill was then passed.

OPPRESSIONS UNDER THE SUSPENSION LAW.

Lord FOLKSTONE presented a Petition from Francis Ward, confined under the Suspension Law. It stated that he was a Nottingham lace-maker; that he had a wife, four children, and an aged mother to support; that the Officers who entered his house would not show their warrant, or even read it; that they admitted there was nothing of what they searched for in his house; that he (the Petitioner) had resisted the entrance of the Officers into his house, from respect to a rule laid down by no less a personage than Jesus Christ, which prescribed, that in doing well he should feel no fear. He had applied in vain for redress at the Police-Office. He was afterwards sent to a vile dungeon, where he had a damp bed, and was almost suffocated by a sulphureous smell.—Here Lord F. remarked, that perhaps he could save the House the trouble of hearing the whole of the petition, the object of which was to complain of the treatment he had experienced. He meant to move for a Committee of Inquiry on the subject.

Mr. BENNET observed, that he himself was ready to prove, that the most barbarous, cruel, and inhuman treatment, had been exercised under the Suspension Act—such as thrusting men into impure cells, loading with irons, and other abuses. They were bound to inquire into the bitter grievances of Englishmen.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH hoped that notice of such a motion would be given; upon which Lord FOLKSTONE said, he would on this day se'nnight move for a Committee of Inquiry on the subject.

BANK OF ENGLAND—CASH RESTRICTION.

Mr. GRENFELL, among other questions, asked whether the resumption of Cash Payments would take place on the 5th of July next, the time appointed by Law?

Mr. VANSITTART observed, that he knew of nothing in the state of public affairs which would render it expedient to continue the Restriction longer than the appointed time, and the Bank had made ample provision. At the same time, there was certain financial measures about to be adopted by Foreign Courts, which might make it necessary for an application to Parliament for its opinion, as to the policy of resuming Cash Payments at the time specified.

Mr. TIERNEY could not understand the Right Hon. Gentleman, who did not in fact appear to have a single clear idea on the subject.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 1.

A CIRCUMSTANCE is said to have occurred, which renders the air of willing friendship and "perfect harmony" between the Government and the United States doubly awkward on our part. "We learn," says the Chronicle, that the United States have actually dispatched a frigate round into the Pacific Ocean, to take possession of the river Columbia, a British station, where there is a small colony of settlers, with a fort upon which the British flag flies. It was originally taken possession of by VANCOUVER in his MAJESTY'S name; and that British-American subjects have long occupied posts on the heads of the Columbia, and the rivers flowing from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, is well known; and that they had, previously to the discoveries of Messrs. LEWIS and CLARKE (particularly by the expedition of Sir ALEXANDER M'KENZIE), explored the whole country, but they had made no establishment on the coast, till 1813. In that year, previous to the arrival of the Racoon, their traders from the interior made an arrangement with some citizens of the United States, who had established themselves at the mouth of the Columbia, by which they purchased their goods and post, and were found in possession by Captain BLACK, of the Racoon, who again declared his MAJESTY'S title to the settlement by the right of original discovery, and on this repeated the solemnities before made use of by VANCOUVER, and the other British navigators who had visited the spot. This is, in fact, a revival of the Nootka Sound question, the claim made by the United States arising solely from the purchase of Louisiana from Spain, and which, by their construction, would put an end to our projected expedition to the North Pole, since, if discovered, they would claim possession of the whole of it! What must be the mortified feelings of his Royal Highness the PRINCE REGENT, on reflecting that the system which he has countenanced, as pursued by the followers of the immortal Mr. PITT, have brought us to a condition to wink at such indignities!"

It appears however, even by this statement, that there are disputable points in the business, especially from Captain BLACK's having thought it necessary to take the steps he did. But disputable or not as a question of words, we doubt whether any other contest would take place. We have lately stated our opinion on the present state of feeling towards the United States. The latter have the advantage of us, purely because they are on the right side of a number of questions, which the European Governments are afraid to agitate.

The Suspension Bill has been repealed, and in such a hurry, that some Members who intended to express their opinions on the repeal, and had come down to the House (one of them at least) before the usual hour for entering upon business, found that the subject had been gone into some time. The reason was readily perceived. In other respects, this hurry has been the least unbefitting proceeding connected with it; but the fact is, that Ministers feel themselves alarmed at the few proofs and the many punishments which the alleged offences that give rise to the

PRICE OF STOCKS ON SATURDAY.

T. B. was received;—so is CHRISTIANUS and W. B.

We scarcely perceive the drift of the Letter on VISITORS.

A Writer to the Editor has addressed him by the Christian name of HENRY. This is one of his names certainly, but not the one he generally goes by; and he mentions this apparently trifling circumstance, because an ignorance of it, he has reason to believe, has often made him responsible for actions and opinions, for which he is not at all so, whether bad or good.

Suspension-Bill have produced; nor have we any doubt, that the single circumstance of the Messrs. EVANS' having held out as they did the other day, contributed to put fresh alarm into their hurry. Lord FOLKSTONE, however, Mr. BROUGHAM, Mr. BRAND, and others, were not so anticipated in point of time, but that they arrived soon enough to prevent the monster carrying off with it a little surreptitious fang which was to be left undrawn;—we mean the pretended power of the Secretary of State to make people enter into recognizances—such recognizances as the Messrs. EVANS triumphantly refused. It was argued on this, as on an occasion elsewhere, that there was no intention of calling upon the persons concerned, and that they had even been given to understand that their recognizances would be discharged;—a blessed piece of information, which nevertheless, it seems, did not satisfy some of these wilful and extraordinary human beings, with their unaccountable objections to a long secret imprisonment and a grin from a crown lawyer at the end of it! The truth is, individuals are no longer to be trifled with in this manner. They chuse to think, to act, and what seems worse than all to the oligarchists, to speak for themselves; and the oligarchists have found out, that let the humblest of them, who have spirit and good sense, get but one mode of being heard,—one atom of constitutional ground to stand upon,—and their oppressors must either give in, or proclaim the overthrow and usurpation of the Constitution at once vi et armis. The recognizances were abandoned.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, professing to give "a distinct answer" on the subject, now informs the country, that although the Bank has made ample preparation for the resumption of its cash payments, it may be necessary to restrain them longer, on account of "certain extraordinary financial measures of other countries;" which extraordinary measures he does not explain. The distinctness of Mr. VANSITTART's answer is equal to the clearness of the atmosphere we all breathe, and to the general beauty of the prospect. According to a daily paper, the Bank is really prepared to resume its payments, but the Government will not let it; that is to say, the Government cannot, owing to its own inability; and yet we hear of more Loans to Foreign Powers; and sums of money are paid by the people to such beings as FERDINAND of Spain, to remunerate him for leaving off, or promising to leave off, the traffic in human flesh. Ministers are now acting the part of an old wilful spendthrift, who has contrived to outbid his neighbour by waste and get rid of him by good luck; and so is tempted by his vanity as well as bad habits to run into fresh ostentations expenses; and refuses to look at his accounts except for the purpose of putting off their settlement, and seeing how far he can do so by racking his tenants who are also his creditors.

ARBITRARY IMPRISONMENTS!—There is to be a public Meeting at the Crown and Anchor Tavern to-morrow morning, Sir FRANCIS BURDETT in the Chair, for the purpose of opening a general subscription for the assistance of the Messrs. EVANS, Mr. BENBOW, and such other sufferers under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, as shall appear to a Committee entitled to public approbation for their resistance to ministerial persecution.—This is a highly proper proceeding.

SLAVE TRADE.—The Treaty with Spain contains the following articles:—

Article III.—His Britannic Majesty engages to pay in London, on the 20th of February, 1818, the sum of four hundred thousand pounds sterling, to such persons as his Catholic Majesty shall appoint to receive the same.

Art. IV.—The said sum of four hundred thousand pounds sterling is to be considered as a full compensation for all losses sustained by the subjects of his Catholic Majesty engaged in this traffic, on account of vessels captured previously to the exchange of the ratifications of the present Treaty; as also for the losses which are a necessary consequence of the abolition of the said traffic.

Is not this a very strange business; and would it surprise any one to find, that the whole of this affair was merely a pretext to supply Spain with money to aid in the subjugation of the South Americans? We have more than suspicions.

The proposed basis for the military contingent of the States of Germany, which subject was taken into consideration by the Diet on the 19th ult., requires a levy of 2 per cent. on the population of that great country—we presume the male part of it is here alluded to. The gross population of Germany is about 30,000,000, of which 6,000,000 will be nearly the number of males capable of bearing arms. Two in every hundred of these would constitute an army of 120,000 men, the exact amount of force which it was stated the Army of the Confederation was designed to muster.

LORD COCHRANE.—The reader will see in another part of the paper a letter from B., who complained last week of certain proceedings of the Committee of the Distressed Seamen. The writer having been mistaken respecting Lord COCHRANE, he hastened to make every reparation in his power to that gallant Officer, who has, we understand, with the generosity which belongs to his character, expressed his entire satisfaction at the explanation. The letter of B. will perhaps be as satisfactory to W. W.—To J. W., who has sent a letter in which he denies all the other statements of B., we can only say, that B. again vouches for their accuracy.

The marriage of the Duke of CAMBRIDGE with the Princess of HESSE is said to be fixed for the 24th of February. Their Highnesses, as we stated some days since, will soon after come to England, to pass the summer. Courier.

"A fine statue of the late Right Hon. WM. PITT will shortly be placed in the Bank of England. The figure is cut by an eminent sculptor in a sitting posture, and the likeness and character are singularly striking. This mark of respect to the memory of that distinguished statesman has been paid for by private subscription."—Courier.—The Bank has good reason to be grateful to Mr. PITT. His system has filled its coffers, though at the public cost.

The Court Mourning expires this day; which those who do not like such dull appearances will be very glad of.

FORGED BANK NOTES.—Mr. RANSON's case has not yet been settled even in its first stage. It will of course be brought before the proper Court; and the public will be benefited by his determination to bring the matter to a final issue.—How do the public know that Notes marked as "forged" are really forged? Who are now the judges? Why, an interested party. It is quite idle to talk of the "honour" of a great public body. Public bodies never feel shame. They merely consult their own interest, as a body. And if by any possible chance a set of men should feel shame from any unlucky exposure, the portion of it which falls to the lot of each individual is so small, that it can be very well borne. Further notice will, of course, be taken of this case at the proper time.

The Hon. CHARLES LAMBE has resigned his post as a Member of the Sub-Committee of Drury-lane Theatre, and is succeeded by Lord YARMOUTH.

ANTWERP LOAN.—It is confidently whispered from Paris, where a certain Great Lawyer has lately been, that this money-changing transaction, or rather reversionary bargain, subject to the lives of three high Personages, (in which some of our first characters were concerned) is about to meet the public eye.—All the world knows, that in the year 1790 a Princely Loan was effected in Antwerp and Paris, and that a certain portion of that Loan was received by the subscribing parties. The principal sum is said to have been Three Hundred Thousand Pounds; and we are credibly informed, that One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Pounds were bona fide paid by the Contractors in those Cities. Two of the agents were guillotined in Paris, and one shot himself in Westminster, after having corresponded with a well-known Scotch Lawyer.—We do know, that a pamphlet was published by the late Mr. STOCKDALE, bookseller, in Piccadilly, with the view, and indeed the declared object, of invalidating the very supposition that such a Loan could have been attempted. We believe the following expression was used in that ministerial brochure:—That such a Loan would be a gigantic piece of swindling. Time, which unravels most things, will unravel this; and we shall probably have it in our power to satisfy our readers, and the nation at large, as to the reality of the fact.

MR. HONE.—"It may not be inexpedient to remind our countrymen that they have done nothing to shew their appreciation of his extraordinary talents, or the good which he has, in his singular defence, rendered to the country by upholding the most valuable of its privileges,—the freedom of the press. A subscription should certainly be set on foot in this city for him. We care not who begins it, but we say for ourselves that we will contribute to it TEN POUNDS, in whatever quarter it may originate. Some of our contemporaries, we are sure, would heartily join us. We appeal, however, not to the press, but the public.—Every man in society is indebted to Mr. HONE, and his obligation should be acknowledged, not, to be sure, in the way in which Lord DARLINGTON, Lord SEFTON, Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and others, have, in their contributions of 100 Guineas, recognised it, but in such a way, and under such circumstances as their stations and finances may admit. If any individual should think proper to deposit his subscription, whether it may be in pounds or shillings, with us, it shall be duly acknowledged and as regularly transmitted to the Committee appointed to manage the subscription. Our letter-box is open to those who may not wish to have their names or persons known."—The Freeman's Journal—Dublin.

CAPE BRETON.—We see by a paper published in this island,—the Acadian Recorder,—that certain acts of the government have called forth a remonstrance from the freeholders and inhabitants of the town of Sydney and its vicinity, in an address to the President, Colonel HERBERT. In this address, various heavy grievances are detailed, in very strong language; and it concludes with a hope, that the unauthorized ordinances will be revoked, and the Legislature required by the King's command be immediately formed.—Whether these complaints have been met and redressed, we know not; but we are disposed to think, that the peace and well-being of the Colony will not be much forwarded by Governor AINSLIE, if we may judge of his wisdom and virtue from his conduct at Grenada and Dominica. How this person, indeed, obtained the government of this island, after being deemed unfit to remain in the above commands, is quite inexplicable to us. Perhaps some of our readers may be able to trace the high interest,—for such surely it must have been,—which could have procured for him any such appointment, after the exposures which have taken place.

It is said, in the Rue de la Harpe, resides, it is said, in the Rue de la Harpe, an assumed name.

The Morning Post says, "That the Archduchess of PARMA, wife to NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, is expected to visit this country in the course of next Summer.

Man is prone to perpetuate his name. To this end our Minister, or some one in desperate circumstances, has hit on Hamlet's expedient—"There's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year; but by'r lady, he must build CHURCHES then."

THE RUSSIAN SUWARROW.—A Russian biographical account of SUWARROW contains some singular and curious details. Though the general cruelty of his disposition was evinced by the horrible massacres of OCZAKOFF, ISMAILOFF, and PRAGA, (where 60,000 Poles are said to have been sacrificed to his vengeance); yet he sometimes showed a more peculiar ardour of ferocity. To the French, in particular, he bore a sort of fanatical hatred—a rage of detestation. A proof of this passion was even exhibited in exercising his men. In commanding them to make a charge with the bayonet, they were to understand his directions in three different ways, according to the nation which they were supposed to combat. When he gave the word march against the Prussians, they charged straight forward with the point of the bayonet—against the Poles, they rapidly repeated the thrust—against the execrable French, they turned round their bayonets after the second thrust, to enlarge the wound. Original in every thing, and even affecting originality, this semi-barbarian sometimes appeared wrapped up in a sheep's skin, like a Cossack, and at other times covered with crosses, with badges of Orders, and portraits, which he had received. These latter ornaments, joined to his little grim countenance and his lank figure, gave him more the appearance of an Italian charlatan than the General of an army. Although he gave the world reason to suspect his sanity, yet, from sharing their dangers, their fatigues, and their frugal fare, he was always the idol of his soldiers. The anecdote of his quelling a mutiny among his troops in crossing the Alps is well known. His soldiers, overwhelmed with fatigues, and dispirited with hardships, no longer obeyed his voice, or observed their usual discipline. He ordered a ditch to be dug, and stretching himself in it, cried out to his mutinous soldiers, "Cover me up with earth, you General desires here to be interred, since you abandon him." They all threw themselves at his feet, and followed him with devotion and enthusiasm. The Emperor ALEXANDER has caused a statue to be erected to his name, and the Grand Duke CONSTANTINE has pronounced a public eulogium on his memory; but such honours will not remove the stain of capricious ferocity from his character, or induce history to paint him in any other colours than those of a fortunate military madman, or an enterprising savage.—Ghent paper.

In reply to a Correspondent signing himself "Coffee," we are sent the following, under the signature of "Tea":—"In perusing your Paper of Sunday week, I perceived an article under the special title of "A Caution," from a Correspondent signed "Coffee," stating, he had ordered a quantity of moist sugar to be sent to his lodgings from a Grocer's, in Blackfriar's-road, which he states was marked 9d. in the window, he refused, unless other goods were included in the purchase. That a stranger did order two pounds of moist sugar, to be sent to Walworth, is certain, which he might have out of the window or any part of the warehouse, if he thought proper to carry it home; but it is hardly reasonable to expect a Grocer should send his porter with two pounds of moist sugar (upon which he had no more than 1½d. profit) one mile and back, to any one that was not a known customer. This trade of "Coffee," shews he is as little acquainted with truth as with trade, and less with the use than the abuse of the Press, which I consider the guard and invaluable right of every Englishman."

We have authority for saying, that Mr. BROUGHAM is the Gentleman who has been called upon by the independent interest in Westmoreland, to represent them in the next Parliament.—Leeds Mercury.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The subject which suggested the beautiful Sonnet, in a late number, signed "Ghrastes," produced also the enclosed from another pen, which, if you deem it worthy insertion, is at your service. H. S.

OZYMANDIAS.

In Egypt's sandy silence, all alone,
Stands a gigantic Leg, which far off throws
The only shadow that the Desert knows:—
"I am great OZYMANDIAS," saith the stone,
"The King of Kings; this mighty City shows
The wonders of my hand."—The City's gone,— Nought but the Leg remaining to disclose
The site of this forgotten Babylon.
We wonder,—and some Hunter may express Wonder like ours, when thro' the wilderness
Where London stood, holding the Wolf in chase,
He meets some fragment huge, and stops to guess
What powerful but unrecorded race
Once dwelt in that annihilated place.

THE CROWN AND SCEPTRE.

A Painter, giving no offence,
Drew the Fifth EDWARD's State,
And placed the Crown a little above
The Royal Infant's pate.
2.
The same design'd our Second JAMES,
When he had left the land,
And drew the Sceptre just below
The Royal Exile's hand.
3.
Bât growing vain from such success
He sketched a madman's whim.
A Man with Sceptre and with Crown,
Half come, half leaving him.
4.
Wherein the Sceptre seem'd to hang
By a magnetic thread;
The Crown, an Island severed clean
From its Continent the Head.
5.
(So drawn the belly and the limbs
In Æsop's Fables see;
So too in Stephens' title-page
The branches and the tree.)
6.
Too true, the Knave had lost his wits,
For he inscribed the page,
"EDWARD in unperforming youth,
"JAMES in fulfilling age."

BANKRUPT SYSTEM.

MR. EXAMINER,—The notice you took in your last Paper of a circumstance mentioned at the conclusion of my book, on the Administration of the Bankrupt Laws, claims my attention: the statement is correct in substance, but differing in some immaterial points.

You of course was aware that presents had been made me, besides, at different times, by some Gentlemen in the Bankrupt Department, in BANK PAPER and other value, to the amount of about three pounds. These were delivered with expressions of feeling and kindness, that called forth my sincerest gratitude. It does not become a suppliant to ascribe motives to favours conferred. However differing in quality and value, both came to me through the same channel, and had their respective operation and effect.

I am aware that the mention in the Pamphlet of the present of writing-paper may, by some, be placed to prejudice: I would beg of those, to have the liberality to allow me a rank amongst human beings; and to consider what feelings, twelve years of illegal and very intemperate proceedings against them, would be likely to produce in their minds! I am warranted in using the word illegal by the admission of the Lord Chancellor himself, and no one who knows the case will question the intemperance of the proceedings against me.

It has never been a passion with me to meddle with party or politics. I have rather wished to go on quietly, satisfied with the laws the Legislature, in its wisdom, has enacted. I will, however, now venture to say I derive some comfort from contemplating the conclusion of the Speech from the Throne on Tuesday last, that "THE RELIGIOUS AND MORAL HABITS OF THE PEOPLE ARE THE MOST SURE AND FIRM FOUNDATION OF NATIONAL PROSPERITY." This, Sir, is my political Creed, and has ever been the ruling principle of my conduct, from a conviction that religious and moral habits could never be against law, and that one great object of the law was to protect those habits; and recommended now from the highest authority, there is great hope that the maxim will be deeply imprinted on every mind; when it may be expected that truth, equity, and justice, will receive a due observance from the highest to the lowest orders amongst us; and then, Sir, I may at length get out of my old piteful strains, and tell you, at a future time, how securely and peacefully I am jogging on to the end of the stage, under the protection of our revered old English Constitution.—Your old Correspondent and faithful servant,
EDMUND TOWNSEND.

ON THE PRACTICE OF PUNNING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I am a constant reader of the Examiner, and having recently had the pleasure of witnessing the good effects of some of your seasonable addresses to the public, in the revival of old usages with new interest, the diffusion of innocent mirth and open-hearted hilarity, I am inclined to hope, that good writing may do more towards the correction of bad habits of thinking and acting, than my observations upon society had hitherto led me to believe.

When you have leisure from teaching the world to think and to feel in matters of vital importance to the community, I beg to recommend to your notice a minor evil, which, by poisoning the springs of taste and knowledge, by bringing forward the flippant, and throwing back the reflective speaker, tends to embitter and destroy all the profit and pleasure of conversation: I allude to the vice of Punning. It is my fate to mix familiarly with a knot of individuals, each of them capable of sustaining a part in rational discourse, and of bringing to the intellectual conflict minds armed with vigour, and stored with learning; who, nevertheless, meet together to fritter away time, patience, and attention, with a series of unconnected quibbles and conceits. Their talk is not narrative, for nothing is related; not demonstrative, for nothing is maintained; not didactic, for nothing can be learned; not argumentative, for nothing can be proved; not confidential, for nothing is believed. Instead of the rich web of fancy glowing with the vivid creations of lively and intelligent minds, the hearers are presented with a motley intermixture of shreds of wit and patches of conceit—a chequer-work of incongruous images—the very orts and leavings of the “Feast of Reason”—the dregs and scum of science and literature. If I relate to this group of punsters the most affecting circumstance, I am heard with impatience and inattention, till I chance, unwittingly, to utter a word susceptible of a double or triple interpretation. The mischievous spark of folly is applied, the moral interest of my tale is undermined, and a loud report of laughter announces the explosion of folly. One of our eminent writers gave thanks that his name was not liable to a pun. Would that all pun-provoking cognominations might be changed by Act of Parliament! I shudder at the mention of an individual, whose “addition” may be likened to anything in heaven and earth, and had rather go without a meal than sit down with any of my furlishers of old jests to a dinner of tongue, brains, calve’s head, goose, &c. But what security can the most carefully constructed bill of fare afford me? If there are chicken at table, I am insultingly asked if I am a foul-feeder: the table-cloth is disgraced for an allusion to Greece; and when I call for beer, the most lugubre associations are produced. My dumb-waiter is condemned, because it will not answer; and when the salad appears, I am congealed with “Let us endeavour to do without salary.”

The Genius of Onkography frowns in vain: puns are by the laws of custom entitled to claim entrance into the sensorium, either by the eye or ear; but when a pseudo-pun (“for indeed there are counterfeits abroad, and it behoves men to be careful”) is perceptible to neither sense, when read it cannot be seen, and when heard it cannot be understood, to avoid the horror of an explanation, I find myself obliged to perjure myself by laughing in ignorance and very sadness, and thus sanction the practice I would fain abolish.

But, Mr. Examiner, shall I tell you all? What I have related is not the worst. It is little to hunger for the bread of wisdom, and be fed with the husks of folly: it is little to thirst for the Castalian fount, and see its waters idly wasted in sport or malice: it is little to seek for the interchange of souls, and find only the reciprocation of nonsense. All this I might endure, and patient suffering might purify and ennoble my nature; but—shall I confess it to you?—I, even I, who address these lamentations to you in the bitterness of my spirit, I am myself infected with the contagion of punning! Graceless and open-eyed sinner as I am, in spite of all my “compunctious visitings” of better taste, I find myself, like the brutalized companions of Ulysses, debased and perverted from my former self. I lose by degrees all my reverence for plain sense and singleness of mind, and am the very thing I hate and wonder at. Let me entreat you, Mr. Examiner, to aid me with your advice. Set forth, in strong colours, the enormity I have but feebly shadowed out. Spare not the cantory of satire to stop the gangrene of false wit. Be severe upon my friends, and treat me as ill as you please. My name is so obscure, that it would add no weight to my request; but it may interest you to know, I am the author, not translator, of a dramatic piece called Disguises, in which all that you praised was mine, and all that you condemned was added by the Manager. My case is desperate, for this is the only letter, without a pun, which has for many weeks been written by your humble servant.

FINE ARTS.

CAST FROM THE MOSES OF MICHAEL ANGELO, IN THE MEWS GALLERY.

THE professional character of MICHAEL ANGELO has ever been proverbial for austere greatness of style. Independently of the concurrent testimony of nearly all Artists and Writers on Art, the exalted opinion entertained of him by RAFFAELLE would be almost a sufficient evidence of the greatness of his character. RAFFAELLE thanked God for having been born in an age which boasted of such a man. But the improving effect which the sight of his works had upon the theory and practice of RAFFAELLE, is still more corroboratory of the justness of the general estimation of MICHAEL ANGELO's stupendous powers.—Until RAFFAELLE's genius was invigorated and additionally enlightened by that of his illustrious competitor, his style of Painting was comparatively tame. It had great grace, but little or nothing of grandeur. It was highly pleasing, but not powerful. It was much in the style of his Master PERUGINO, though more elegant. But the effect produced on it by M. ANGELO's genius was instantaneous and immense. This intellectual sun awakened his finer powers into glorious action, and expanded the latent seeds and buds of his genius into the most perfect productions that have ever appeared in the regions of Painting. That small part, then, of the public, and those Artists whose taste is improved to the highest reli-b, have now, in the Mews Gallery, an opportunity of enjoying it in a more eminent degree than ever, as far as that relish has been derived from good copies of the works of this grand and inspiring Master; for of his original productions there is, we believe, not one in this country, abounding as it does in so many of the best of other celebrated Geniuses of the Continent.* Here is an exact Cast from one of his most famous Sculptures, a figure of the great Jewish Leader Moses, and chiseled by M. ANGELO for his intended monument to Pope JULIUS II. The view of it is almost as gratifying as if it was the original, as the mode in which a fine plaster Cast is executed, renders it without a fractional difference the same in its forms and surface as the original. The figure is colossal, and being in the same place with Casts from the celebrated colossal figure of Achilles, and two of the Elgin Marbles, all after PHIDIAS, serves, though the subjects are so different, to convey some idea of the comparative styles of Sculpture, as practised by two of the greatest, if not the greatest, Statuaries of ancient and modern times. In comparing this and other figures of the great Florentine Artist with the performances of the Greeks, the latter appear a sublimer and more refined race. MICHAEL ANGELO's have all that can be given by anatomical knowledge, athletic form, and vigour of action; the Greeks have all these excellencies, with more perfection of shape and intellectuality. Vehemence of action, strength of marking, and anatomical knowledge, are the principles of the former: all the requisite energies of body, and a nobler and more refined temperament of mind, those of the latter. MICHAEL ANGELO's are admirable specimens of his species; those of the ancients are the best. We admire his; theirs we love as well as admire. We would wish to live with such beings as were sculptured by the ancients, as objects of affection or of reverence: we would rather retire from MICHAEL ANGELO's, as objects of awe. With all this great Artist's just claims to sublimity, he is considered, even by his greatest admirers, to have sometimes carried his energy into "caricature and caprice;"—and even in this justly famous figure of Moses, which is one of his finest, we are doubtful whether it would not as well represent a defying, athletic, well-robed, and well-bearded pugilist, as the Hebrew Ruler and Lawgiver; for to the venerable effect of the flowing beard, and the robe that, hanging from behind, falls over the knees, to the look of authority and of a lofty self-possession, are connected a sternness and a muscular tension and strength, that are induced by the bodily habits of porters and prize-fighters. This strength, in union with correct form, gives the effect of grandeur, inasmuch as immense power always communicates an emotion of the terrible; which is a constituent of the sublime.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

There was a private view, yesterday, of the works of British Artists, which are to be publicly exhibited tomorrow, at the Gallery of this Institution. That the visitors will find ample enjoyment may well be imagined, when it is stated that there are Paintings from the hands of Messrs. ALSTON, ALLAN, COLLINS, COOPER, CONSTABLE, FRADFLE, HOFFLAND, HARLOWE, JACKSON, WESTALL, WILKIE, and many others. Details in future Numbers.

The Revolt of Islam.—a Poem,—by Percy Bysshe Shelley.—London: C. and J. Ollier.

THIS is an extraordinary production. The ignorant will not understand it; the idle will not take the pains to get acquainted with it; even the intelligent will be startled at first with its air of mysticism and wildness; the livelier man of the world will shake his head at it good naturedly; the sulkier one will cry out against it; the bigot will be shocked, terrified, and enraged, and fall to proving all that is said against himself; the negatively virtuous will re-ent the little quarter that is given to mere custom; the slaves of bad customs or bad passions of any sort will either seize their weapons against it, trembling with rage or conscious worthlessness, or hope to let it quietly pass by, as an enthusiasm that must end in air; finally, the hopeless, if they are ill-tempered, will envy its hopefulness,—if good tempered, will sorrowfully anticipate its disappointment,—both from self-love, though of two different sorts;—but we will venture to say, that the intelligent and the good, who are yet healthy-minded, and who have not been so far blinded by fear and self-love as to confound superstition with desert, anger and hatred with firmness, or despondency with knowledge, will find themselves amply repaid by breaking through the outer shell of this production, even if it be with the single reflection, that so much ardour for the happy virtues, and so much power to recommend them, have united in the same person. To will them with hope indeed is to create them; and to extend that will is the object of the writer before us.

The story of the "Revolt of Islam" is this: The poet, rising from "visions of despair" occasioned by the late triumphs over the progress of mankind, goes meditating by the sea-shore, and after an awful and prophetic tempest, suddenly sees in the air the extraordinary spectacle of a combat between a serpent and an eagle:—

The Serpent's mailed and many-coloured skin Shone through the plumes its coils were twined within
By many a swollen and knotted fold; and high
And far, the neck, receding light and thin,
Sustained a crested head, which warily
Shifted and glanced before the Eagle's stedfast eye.

The Serpent is defeated, and falls into the sea, from whence he is received into the bosom of a beautiful woman who sits lamenting upon the shore. She invites the poet to go somewhere across the sea with them in a boat. He consents, more in fear for her than for himself; and in the course of the voyage she tells him that the Serpent and the Eagle are the Powers of Good and Evil, who combat with each other at intervals; that the Serpent or Power of Good has again been defeated; and that she herself is his selected companion, whom in his more radiant shape he appeared to once at night, and announced his having fallen in love with. The Serpent all this while lies still, recovering from the effects of the combat; and at last the voyagers come to a magnificent temple beyond the polar ocean, in which

There sat on many a sapphire throne
The Great, who had departed from mankind,
A mighty Senate;—some, whose white hair shone
Like mountain snow, mild, beautiful, and blind.
Some female forms, whose gestures beamed with mind;
And ardent youths,—and children bright and fair;
And some had lyres, whose strings were intertwined
With pale and clinging flames, which ever there
Waked faint yet thrilling sounds that pierced the chrysal air.

A magic and obscure circumstance then takes place, the result of which is, that the woman and serpent are seen no more, but that a cloud opens asunder, and a bright and beautiful shape, which seems compounded of both, is beheld sitting on a throne,—a circumstance apparently imitated from Milton:

Wonder and joy a passing faintness threw
Over my brow—a hand supported me,
Whose touch was magic strength: an eye of blue
Looked into mine, like moonlight, soothingly;
And a voice said—Thou must a listener be
This day—two mighty Spirits now return,
Like birds of calm from the world's raging sea;
They pour fresh light from Hope's immortal urn,
A tale of human power,—despair not—list and learn!
I looked, and lo! one stood forth eloquently;
His eyes were dark and deep, and the clear brow
Which shadowed them was like the morning sky,
The cloudless Heaven of Spring, when in their flow
Through the bright air, the soft winds as they blow,
Wake the green world.

Beneath the darkness of his outspread hair
He stood thus beautiful: but there was one
Who sat beside him like his shadow there,
And held his hand—far lovelier—she was known
To be thus fair by the few lines alone
Which through her floating locks and gathered cloaks, Glances of soul-dissolving glory shone.

This is a fine Grecian feeling, of what may be called the sentiment of shape. The two strangers are the hero and heroine of the poem; and here the more human part of the story commences. Laon, the hero, relates it. He was an ardent and speculative youth, born in modern Greece; and grew up with great admiration of the beauties and kindnesses of external nature, and a great horror of the superstitions and other oppressions with which his country and mankind in general were afflicted. A beautiful female orphan under the care of his parents shared these feelings with him; and a mutual love was the consequence. She even speculated upon taking some extraordinary though gentle step to deliver the world from its thralldom; when she was torn away from him by some slaves of the Grand Turk's Seraglio; and he himself, for endeavouring to rescue her, and for taking that opportunity of proclaiming freedom, was shut up in a prison in a rock, where his senses forsook him. The effect of the circumstance however is not lost. He is delivered from his dungeon by an old man, and after a second but milder insanity, is informed by his preserver, that the people had been awakened to new ideas, and that there was a maiden who went about exciting them to a bloodless freedom. It was his love Cythna, after having been made a victim of the tyrant's lust; and having been likewise imprisoned, and robbed of her senses. A considerable interval elapses while Laon recovers his reason; but on so doing, and hearing of the exploits of her whom he justly supposed to be his lovely friend, he takes leave of the old man, and journeys for Constantinople or the Golden City, where he finds the people risen, the tyrant fallen, and Cythna the predominant spirit of the change. He goes with others to the palace, and sees the "sceptered wretch" sitting silent and sullen on the footstool of his throne,—

Alone, but for one child, who led before him
A graceful dance:—weeping and murmuring
Mid her sad task of unregarded love,
That to no smiles it might his speechless sadness move.

She clasps the tyrant's feet, and then stands up when the strangers come nigh;—

Her lips and cheeks seemed very pale and wan,
But on her forehead, and within her eye
Lay beauty, which makes hearts that feed thereon
Sick with excess of sweetness; on the throne
She leaned; the King, with gathered brow and lips
Wreathed by long scorn, did only sneer and frown
With hue like that when some great painter dips
His pencil in the gloom of earthquake and eclipse.

Laon saves his life from the fury of the crowd; a festival is held at which Cythna presides like a visible angel, and every thing seems happiness and security. The Revolters however are suddenly assailed by the allies of the tyrant; and the fortune of the contest is changed. Cythna reaches Laon through the lost battle on a huge black Tartarian horse, "whose path makes a solitude;" and they fly to a distance through a desolate village, in the dwellings of which the flames and human beings were now dead:—

But the wide sky,
Flooded with lightning, was ribbed overhead
By the black rafters; and around did lie
Women, and babes, and men, slaughtered confusedly.

The only survivor is a female, who has gone mad, and fancies herself the Plague. The description of her desperate laughter and actions is appalling, though not without a tendency, we think, to something overwrought and artificial. When the travellers arrive at a place of rest, Cythna tells Laon her adventures. They have been briefly alluded to, and include a finely-fancied and pathetic account of a child which she had in her dungeon, and which was taken from her. Laon goes out from the retreat occasionally to get food and intelligence, and finds that Revenge, and subsequently Pestilence and Famine, have been making terrible havoc in the city. The tyrant and his slaves, in their terror, make frightened addresses to heaven, and a priest advises them to expiate its "vengeance" by sacrificing Laon and Cythna. He accordingly dispatches numbers to hunt them out; upon which Laon comes forward disguised, and offers to give up the man provided the woman be spared. They take an oath to do so, and he declares himself; but it is then declared impious to have made the oath; and at last, Cythna comes voluntarily forward, and shares the funeral pyre with her beloved friend, from which they find themselves suddenly sailing on a beautiful sea to the Paradise in which the Spirit of Good resides, where Cythna meets with her child who had died of the plague; and the poem concludes.

We gave the fine description of the preparation for the sacrifice last week; we shall pursue our criticism next, with further extracts, an account of the particular views of the author, and a summary of the poetical character of the work in general.

MR. HAZLITT'S LECTURES.

Mr. HAZLITT on Thursday gave his Third Lecture at the Surrey Institution. It was "on Shakespear and Milton." There was again a crowded, and, we may venture to affirm, a well-satisfied audience. A man of even common talents would readily be listened to on such an inspiring topic; and that Mr. H. deserved the attention of his hearers, let the following eloquent passage from his Lecture show:—it is a description of the bliss and misery experienced by our first Parents:—

—Of Adam and Eve it has been said, that the ordinary reader can feel little interest in them, because they have none of the passions, pursuits, or even relations of human life, except that of man and wife, the least interesting of all others, if not to the parties concerned, at least to the bystanders. The preference has on this account been given to Homer, who, it is said, has left very vivid and infinitely diversified pictures of all the passions and affections, public and private, incident to human nature, the relations of son and brother, parent, friend, citizen, and many others. Longinus preferred the Iliad to the Odyssey, on account of the greater number of battles it contains. But I can neither agree to his criticism, nor assent to the present objection. It is true there is little action in this part of Milton's poem; but there is much repose and more enjoyment. There are none of the every-day occurrences, contentions, disputes, wars, fightings, feuds, jealousies, trades, professions, liveries, and common handicrafts of life;—"no kind of traffic; letters are not known; no use of service, riches, poverty, contract, succession, bourn, bound of land, tilth, vineyard none; no occupation, no treason, felony, sword, pike, knife, gun, nor need of any engine!" So much the better; thank Heaven, all these were yet to come. But still the die was cast, and in them our doom was sealed. In them,—

"The generations were prepared; the pangs,
The internal pangs, were ready; the dread strife
Of poor humanity's afflicted will,
Struggling in vain with ruthless destiny."

In their first false step we trace all our future woe, with loss of Eden. But there was a short and precious interval between; like the first blush of morning before the day is overcast with tempest, the dawn of the world, the birth of nature from the "unapparent deep," with its first dews and freshness on its cheek, breathing odours. There was the first delicious taste of life, and on them depended all that was to come of it. In them hung trembling all our hopes and fears. They were as yet alone in the world, in the eye of nature, wondering at their new being, full of enjoyment and enraptured with one another; with the voice of their Maker walking in the garden; and ministering angels attendant on their steps, winged messengers from Heaven like rosy clouds descending in their sight. Nature played around them her virgin fancies wild, and spread for them a repast where no crude surfeit reigned. Was there nothing in this scene which God and Nature alone witnessed to interest a modern critic? What need was there of action, where the heart was full of bliss and innocence without it? They had nothing to do but feel their own happiness, and "know to know no more." "They toiled not, neither did they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." All things seem clothed with fresh beauty, and to acquire fresh sweetness in their sight. They tasted as it were for themselves and us of all that there ever was pure in human bliss. "In them the burthen of the mystery, the heavy and the weary weight of all this unintelligible world, is lightened."—They stood awhile perfect; but they afterwards fell, and were driven out of Paradise, tasting the first fruits of bitterness as they had of bliss. But their pangs were such as a pure spirit might feel at the sight; their "tears such as angels weep." The pathos is of that mild contemplative kind which arises from regret for the loss of happiness, and resignation to inevitable fate. There is none of the fierceness of intemperate passion, none of the agony of mind and turbulence of expression, which is the result of the habitual struggles of the will with circumstances, irritated by repeated disappointments, and constantly setting its desires most intensely on that which there is an impossibility of attaining. This would have destroyed the beauty of the whole picture. They had received their unlooked-for happiness as a free gift from their Creator's hands, and they submitted to its loss, not without sorrow, but without impious and stubborn repining.

In either hand the hast'ning angel caught
Our ling'ring parents; and to th' eastern gate
Led them direct, and down the cliff as fast
To the subjected plain; then disappear'd.
They looking back, all th' eastern side beheld
Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,
Wav'd over by that flaming brand, the gate
With dreadful faces throng'd, and fiery arms:
Some natural tears they dropp'd, but wip'd them soon;
The world was all before them, where to choose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide."

ABUSE OF THE PRESS—THE OBSERVER.

The Nottingham Review,—a paper always active in the cause of Liberty,—is before us, containing an article under the head of "The Trials at Derby," which should be perused by every Legislator, who, before he gives his final judgment on the conduct of Ministers, wishes to make himself master of that part of the question between the people and their rulers, which relates to those misguided and unhappy men, who, seduced as much by the Agents of Government as their own distresses, pursued a line of action equally absurd, reprehensible, and fatal.

The article we allude to is much too long for insertion in our paper; yet we must notice one or two points in it, that more immediately relate to the press,—an engine which is but too often used to promote the evil ends of selfish and abandoned individuals.

There is a paper in London called the Observer, which has a considerable circulation among the lower orders, as well from its being cheaper than many other weekly papers, as from its containing such lengthened details of accidents, offences, police news, and other intelligence of the kind, as may be supposed suited to the tastes of the humbler class of shopkeepers and the frequenters of public houses. This paper, however, would be perfectly harmless, and even useful in its way, if it confined itself to such topics; but it occasionally takes a higher flight; and whenever it thus ventures out of its proper element, it is almost always sure to exhibit its ignorance, its meanness, and its dislike to the cause of the people.

It appears from the Nottingham Review, that the Observer some time back contained "a string of falsehoods on what it termed the late insurrection at Pentridge, of a nature so malignant and base, that the attempt to follow it in all its mazes seems a task almost as difficult as that of cleansing the Augean Stable." The Nottingham paper goes on to give proof, that it does not bring this heavy charge against the Observer without great reason. It proves, that many of the "facts" which that paper put forth respecting the matter in question (and for which it "pledged itself for the truth of every particular") not only were not true, but could not possibly be true; and it concludes its judicious exposure by the insertion of a letter written by FRANCIS WARD, one of the unfortunate men lately confined under the Suspension Act, which he had written to the Conductor of the Observer, in answer to the falsehoods put forth in that paper against him and other of his fellow-sufferers,—but which that "Tool of Government," as the Nottingham Editor very justly concluded him to be, was absolutely mean enough and unjust enough to decline inserting!

Can there possibly be any thing more odious than such conduct? The Observer, it must be allowed, seldom aims its shafts at any of the "higher or privileged orders;" but let a poor creature, like ELIZA FENNING, be deprived of life on doubtful evidence, or an unfortunate man, like FRANCIS WOOD, lose his liberty on evidence still worse,—Oh, how the Conductor of the Observer hastens with its dirty supply of ink, to assist in blackening the memory of the dead, or in adding to the misfortunes of the living!

Such is the conduct of "one of the best Weekly Papers printed in London,"—as the Proprietor of the Observer, in his paid-for puffs in the provincial papers, modestly says of his own work!—And yet this is the very Newspaper, which the consistent Mr. COBBETT is repeatedly advising his readers to read in company with his own Register! Yes; strange, most strange as this is, it is absolutely true. Mr. COBBETT, the denouncer of Government and the champion of the oppressed people, begs all his readers to take in the Observer, the Proprietor of which openly boasts of the favours he receives from Government,* and takes abundant pains to hold up as agitators and traitors those very persons whom Mr. COBBETT avers are basely slandered and foully oppressed! The consistent politician can see no other paper so worthy of being perused by his admirers as the ministerial Observer, for which he passes by all the other weekly prints, some of which (like the Englishman for instance) are on the same plan as the Observer, and much more correctly edited, and others even advocate the same good cause, which Mr. COBBETT would make us believe he has so much at heart. To be sure, nothing can be more repulsive and more worthless than this.

Those papers who do the Examiner the honour to copy occasionally from its columns, will probably think that this conduct of the Observer and its Patron merits exposure. There is indeed a good deal of mystery in this strange union, which exposure may develop. The Reporter for the Observer, it came out on the trial of Mr. Watson, expected to be remunerated by Government, for his labours on a particular occasion—the Observer is a very loyal and slanderous paper,—and Mr. COBBETT, while he labours to depreciate Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and other consistent friends of Reform, recommends the said Observer.—All this is at least somewhat remarkable. And as, next to stoutly advocating the cause of Liberty and Truth, ranks the utility of exposing the vulgar and malignant arts of the enemies of both, it appears to us a duty to speak out on such matters, and to invite all those who respect their calling as Journalists to echo the warning cry.

* See a long advertisement from the Conductor, in which he boasts of the advantages obtained by the Proprietors, "who held local situations under his Majesty's Government,"—and dilates on his "unequivocal loyalty to the Brunswick family."—At this very time, we believe, this low trader was himself the principal retail vender of Mr. Cobbett's cheap Register!—Examiner.

THE DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

On Friday a numerous Meeting of the Gentlemen who have been engaged in dispensing relief to the distressed Seamen, took place at the King's Head, in the Poultry, for the purpose of discussing the question of the ultimate disposal of those claimants upon the Public bounty.

The LORD MAYOR, on taking the Chair, rejoiced to have this opportunity of declaring, that within a very short time those wretched-looking beings, who added to the number of afflicting objects in the streets of London, would be disposed of beyond the probability of a relapse into their unhappy condition.

The SECRETARY observed, in reply to some observations, that there did not appear to him to be ground either for suspecting the integrity of the poor fellows, or for giving them the name of beggars. The Committee had done nothing to confirm that imputation, which had, he thought, been erroneously applied. Their wants proceeded, it was pretty generally known, from unavoidable circumstances. They were not vagrants; the Committee were called upon to prevent them from being made so; and it was a fact that they were generally men of good character. The present prospect was certainly a pleasing one, for it presented the means of restoring those who were qualified to act to the former comfort and independence of their condition. He did not think there was a redundancy of seamen; but if there were, it would be unjust that those upon whose interests the Committee was employed should suffer for the general body. (Applause.)

The statement laid before the Meeting comprehended the following important facts:—

There are now in the River six ships for the use of the healthy seamen and one hospital ship. They are capable of receiving 1400 men.—One thousand and forty-one have been already received on board.—One hundred and ninety-seven of those have been disposed of effectually—some in merchant's service and others in the navy. There are in attendance upon the sick, a Physician, a Surgeon, and two Assistant Surgeons, paid by the Committee.—One Physician, Dr. Rankin, of the East India Company's service, attends gratuitously.—There are now on board 859, all of whom, with the exception of about ten, have been serving in the navy.—The men certainly fit for service do not amount to less than 500.—But four deaths have taken place since the ships were fitted out for the reception of the men.—About 120 have been cured of the itch.—Those applicants for relief whom it was impossible to accommodate at the commencement, were supplied with 3d. each and a fourth part of a quarter loaf every day.

Orders have been given for several days past to the Officer of the Abundance receiving ship, to take all seamen who apply on board for examination.

If any seaman afflicted with an infectious disease applies, he receives adequate relief, but is not suffered to have any intercourse with the men on board the vessels.

Among the applicants were, 59 foreigners, and 58 men of colour; and those who are not acceptable in their own country, on account of having fought for England, are considered as Englishmen.

The statement in a Sunday Paper*, that a black man had been denied relief on his application, and some comments on the cruelty stated to have accompanied this refusal, were pronounced gross and unfounded calumnies; and it was stated as the opinion of many, that all who are able to engage will be disposed of in about six weeks.

A Resolution was passed, signifying that the number stated above were received on board the ships fitted up for the purpose,

* The Examiner is the Paper alluded to. The statements which are thus complained of were contained in a Letter to the Editor, furnished by a respectable Gentleman, who had taken a strong interest in favour of the unhappy men. It will be seen, by the following communication from the same writer, that he vouches for the truth of his general account, while he makes a manly apology to Lord Cochrane for a mistake he had been led into by meeting that gallant and patriotic Officer, and appointing the 14th of February as the last day of admission, except to those who labour under bodily defect or infirmity.

It was also determined to apply to the Admiralty to grant relief to such of the Seamen as were unfit for service.—A Select Committee was then appointed to consider those several Resolutions and report thereon.

The expenses attending the plan amount to upwards of 800l. a week.

LORD COCHRANE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I have now the task of correcting a very cruel mistake, into which a man of a cooler head could not perhaps have fallen; but, at the same time, let it be recollected, that when a mistake is discovered, nothing can be more plain than the way to have avoided it.

In your last paper I unfortunately, but undoubtedly, asserted, that Lord Cochrane came down to the Committee for the Relief of Destitute Seamen, to support that Committee and not to serve the starving men; whereas Lord Cochrane never was there at all. I know not in what terms sufficiently to apologise to you and your readers, much less to his Lordship himself, when I declare, that, in so important a matter, I was mistaken in the person, though the facts were as I stated: a strange coincidence of circumstances deceived me: it was another Nobleman, who examined the Swede that turned pale, and who had made his appearance at the Board that morning for the first time.

That an indifferent person coming there under a prejudice (which the Placards issued by the Lord Mayor had excited) against the miserable applicants, as impostors and worthless men, should oppose sheltering or feeding any, until proved to be deserving, would scarcely, after what I had seen, have attracted my attention; but that Lord Cochrane, whose heart I had been taught to consider as no less feeling than brave, should act so,—that the sailors' friend, Lord Cochrane, should desert them in the hour of their distress, I could not bear: I ought to have doubted the evidence of my senses.

I have since seen Lord Cochrane for the first time in my life. On the very evening, when I received a note apprizing me of the mistake, and that, to my great astonishment, Lord Cochrane had never been at the Committee at all, I thought it would be the most manly way of proceeding to go to his Lordship, feeling confident in my own rectitude of heart and his Lordship's nobleness of character. I told a plain unvarnished tale, and found in Lord Cochrane all that I had expected. His courage being above suspicion, he made no parade of it by demanding public reparation; his Lordship judged by himself that I should give it without a threat; and here, Sir, I do it to the best of my power, with more pleasurable satisfaction, that I was mistaken, than of mortification at exposing my own precipitancy.

LAW.

"As if from a rubbish cart a continually increasing and ever shapeless mass of LAW is from time to time shot down upon the heads of the people; and out of this rubbish, and at his peril, is each man left to pick out what belongs to him. Thus, in pouring forth Law, does the Government, as it is written, rain down snares."—BENTHAM.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, Jan. 24.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.

After the Peremptory Paper had been disposed of, Lord ELLENBOROUGH observed, if there was any person present who had any motion to submit to the Court, they had better take this opportunity of doing it.

Mr. Johnston stepped forward and said, My Lord, I thank you for giving me this opportunity. I came yesterday unprepared; I had not ten pounds to throw away on Counsel. I went to Lord Sidmouth's office, but could get no redress. I came to your Lordship, but your Lordship told me you were not a Counsel, but a Judge.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH here interrupted him, and desired he would leave irrelevant matter and come to his motion, if he had any to make.

Mr. Johnston—Then, my Lord, I have to move that my recognizance be discharged, or that I be brought to trial forthwith.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH enquired if there was any recognizance in the name of Johnston returned to the Court.

Mr. Daltry said there was, and read the recognizance, by the terms of which the defendant was called on to appear in Court on the first day of the Term, and from day to day during the Term.

Mr. Johnston—I thought myself bound to appear.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—You have appeared, and need not appear again without notice.

Mr. Johnston—Will your Lordship hear my affidavit, in order to my being brought to trial.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—I have no power to bring you to trial.

Mr. Johnston—Then discharge my recognizance.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—Is there any thing in your affidavit which says your recognizance was illegally taken.

Mr. Johnston—Certainly not, my Lord.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Then you ask two things; to be brought to trial—that the Court can't do for you; to have your recognizance discharged—to that you have no right, as you say it was not illegally taken.

Mr. Johnston—Then I must continue here from day to day. I cannot return to my family with this burthen hanging over me; and I must beg of your Lordship to supply me with the means of living comfortably for the time I am obliged to dance attendance in town.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—To ask the Court to make you comfortable is rather too much. We can't do that, and you have no right to ask it.

Mr. Johnston—My Lord, my case is hard.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—You have had your answer; we cannot help you.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—My Lord, I have only one word to say; I have had no notice of this application, and have only to state, I have every reason to believe, that not only this gentleman, but all the other persons at Manchester, had notice that they would not be called on to appear, and therefore need not.

Mr. Johnston—My Lord, I do not contradict what the Attorney General says.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Then there is an end of the matter.

Mr. Johnston—My Lord, I hope your Lordship will hear me; I wish to state what sort of notice we received.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—You have had your answer; we can hear no more. If this course is to be adopted, there will be an end of all decorum.

Mr. Johnston—Then I suppose, my Lord, I must submit and bear it.

John Roberts—My Lord, I think I ought to have my recognizance set aside, or be brought to trial. I have been confined illegally, and my letters stopped.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—There are not any grounds for setting aside your recognizance.

Roberts—My Lord, I ask to be put to trial, or to have my affidavit read.

Mr. Justice HOLROYD—We cannot order your trial; nor can we read what we have nothing to do with.

Samuel Drummond—My Lord, I have the same complaint to make; what notice did Lord Sidmouth give? would he say our recognizances should end?

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—Do you say the recognizances were obtained illegally?

Drummond—No, my Lord; but we say our imprisonment was illegal; read my affidavit.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT—That we cannot do. We set here to do justice. Our time is the time of the Public; and we must not waste it in reading that with which we have nothing to do.

Another person was about to rise, when Mr. Serjeant PELL said, my Lords, I am in the next new trial, and I must now move that your Lordship's notes be read.

Mr. Justice HOLROYD proceeded to read his notes, which stopped all further proceedings on this subject.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.

When the Judges were about to retire, a man, stating his name to be W. Clift, said that he was one of the unfortunate men who had come from Manchester in order to appear in Court from day to day, as his recognizance required; and he entreated the Court that some day might be appointed on which he should answer any charge that should be preferred against him; or, in failure of such charge, that he should be suffered to return home without the danger of incurring any penalty in consequence of his not appearing every day during term in Court. He assured their Lordships that he was in great distress, and begged the advice of the Court.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—If there be any ground in your affidavit to prove that your recognizance was illegally obtained, you may state it to the Court, which will then give you redress.

Clift—My Lord, at the same time I entered into this recognizance, I was told by Dr. Cooke that I might as well enter into it then, for if I remained in prison six months longer, I should then be obliged to sign it; and having been confined 22 weeks in a lonesome cell, I thought proper to comply.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—Did you not receive notice that it was not requisite to come to town?

William Clift—No, my Lord. Will your Lordship give me leave to return home?

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—We cannot destroy your recognizance.

—Roberts made an application similar to the foregoing; but in the course of his address used expressions so warm, as to require the interference of the Court to check him.

F. Ward inquired whether he should be liable to penalty if he returned home. But upon being asked by the Court, whether he had any motion to make, he replied, that it appeared astonishing to him, that he should be bound to appear there, and yet that the Court could not decide on his case!

APPEAL OF MURDER.—ASHEORD v. THORNTON.

Mr. CLARK stated that W. Ashford, the appellant, was in Court, and ready to put in his rejoinder to the defendant's replication.

The rejoinder was accordingly put in and read. It was short, and only stated that the replication put in by the defendant, and the facts stated in it, were wholly insufficient to answer the plea; that the appellant humbly submitted he was not bound by law to answer the defendant in his claim of wager of battle; that he was not bound by law to answer the facts of the defendant's replication; and therefore he prayed that their Lordships would pronounce the defendant not entitled to his wager of battle.

Mr. READER, on the part of the defendant, said, his client was now prepared to join in demurrer with the appellant.

Mr. CLARK prayed that their Lordships would appoint a day for arguing the question of demurrer.

The Court, after some consultation, fixed Friday, the 6th of February.

OLD BAILEY.

On Tuesday the Sessions ended; when sentence of death was passed on C. Wood and J. Vale, for horse stealing; J. Bennett, for stealing goods in a dwelling house; Mary Alder, Ann Jones, Laurence Dealy, Mary Gildersleeves, H. Hall, M. Sullivan, J. Lucas, and W. Green, for like offences; J. Thompson, for stealing privately; Ann Cale and J. Farmer, for a like offence; M. Daniels and J. Smith, for house-breaking in the day time; and C. Russell, for a like offence; J. Norton, D. Stockwell, W. Grace, and C. Sims, for various burglaries; G. Scott and I. Chapman, for a highway robbery; W. White, J. Read, and T. Casey, for sheep-stealing; Wm. Kelly and T. Spicer, (the two boys) for forgery; W. H. Rawlinson and J. Rawlinson, for stealing on the River; and Rose O'Hara, Margaret Humphreys, and Hannah Brian, for a highway-robbery.

Eleven were ordered to be transported for life, viz. J. Dicks, Elizabeth Double, W. Edwards, J. Pickett, P. Wood, J. Hughes, J. Thomason, J. Collins, W. Smith, R. Knowles, and W. Barnaby.—Fifteen for 14 years, viz. C. W. Winkfield, W. Smith, J. Alder, Sarah Wilson, T. Watson, Louisa Kemble, Catherine Brown, W. Nichols, W. Belcher, T. Lawrence, J. Hearn, W. Benham, Ann Pilkington, Mary Gillis, and J. Lodge; and 60 for seven years.—Ten were sentenced for imprisonment in the House of Correction for London, 32 in that for Middlesex, and 16 in Newgate, for various periods. Among these are Messrs. O'Callaghan, Phelan, and Newbold, for the late duel, who are to be imprisoned three months; 12 to be privately, and two publicly whipped; six judgments were respited, four were fined 1s. each and discharged, and 29 were delivered by Proclamation. The Sessions were then adjourned to Wednesday, the 18th of February next.—The case of W. Baillie and R. Spencer, capitally convicted, is reserved for the opinion of the 12 Judges.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

On Tuesday, Mr. Ranson, of Judd-place, Somers'-town, was brought up from Cold-bath-fields Prison, to this Office for re-examination, on a charge of detaining a forged Bank of England note without lawful excuse, when the Solicitor for the Bank requested the examination might be postponed till Friday, that he might take the orders of the Court of Directors on the prosecution. Mr. Ranson declared it was his unaltered determination to abide all the consequences of a prosecution, that this question, so seriously affecting the interests of the community at large, should be legally settled.—Mr. BAKER observed, from the respectability of Mr. Ranson and the nature of the case, that he was ready to take bail, which was immediately given by Mr. Ranson in 200*l.* and two sureties in 100*l.* each.

On Friday, Mr. Ranson, the engraver, who stands charged with holding a forged note without lawful excuse, underwent a third examination.—The MAGISTRATE observed, that independent of an indictment upon the statute, it was his opinion that Mr. R. was liable to an indictment for a misdemeanour, in withholding the note from the Bank.—The defendant's Solicitor observed, that in giving up the note, his client would compromise the right upon which he stood.—Mr. Westwood said, that it was his duty to request that Mr. R. be remanded for a week. He had come there under an impression that the defendant would have given up the note. He had communicated such to the Bank, and it would be for him to receive further instructions upon the case.—The MAGISTRATE stated, that under these peculiar circumstances the case should stand over.—Mr. Ranson returned thanks to Mr. Baker, for his upright and manly conduct throughout the whole of the business.

SHADWELL.

On Friday a poor young woman applied for redress, having a child about ten months old in her arms, whose face was mangled in a dreadful manner. It appeared that the young woman was married to the son of the woman who inflicted the wound; from what cause she could not tell, she had some dislike towards the child, and was always ill-using it. On Thursday she was making a fire, and the child was standing playing with something, when she took up the poker, which she thrust at the child's head; it perforated the flesh on the cheek bone, just below the eye, and went to a considerable depth; on her pulling the poker out again it tore the flesh in a terrible manner. She instantly took it to a surgeon, who dressed the wound, and said it was in a dangerous condition, and if it had happened to be a little higher up it would have been the cause of instant death.—The Magistrate granted a warrant for her apprehension.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On the 15th June, 1817, Mr. Anderson, fourth Officer of the ship Charles Grant, was swimming, accompanied by a Quarter-master and a fore-castle-man. Mr. A. swam towards a Portuguese frigate, and he was followed by the two men. As they approached the frigate, Mr. A. was heard to say, "Don't drown me." On this exclamation the Quarter-master turned round, and, to his unspeakable horror saw an immense shark darting at Mr. Anderson; he immediately exerted his whole strength for his own safety, and succeeded in getting on board the frigate. The alarm was given, and the boats instantly lowered into the water, but unfortunately without preventing the fatal catastrophe. The shark passed Mr. Anderson, then turned round and took him under water, which was immediately discoloured by his blood. He rose again, but was then attacked by five or six more of those voracious animals, and he was gone in an instant. One shark was observed to be making after the fore-castle-man, on which a sentry on board the frigate, with great presence of mind, levelled his musket, and shot the fish, thereby preserving the life of the sailor; the next day a large shark was caught measuring upwards of twelve feet.—Bombay Courier.

Tuesday night, about ten o'clock, as Mr. Morley, of Battle-bridge, was returning home from the Theatre, along Drury-lane, he was attacked, at Middlesex-court, by five fellows, who knocked him down, kicked him violently, and robbed him of a silver watch, a silk handkerchief, 10*s.* in silver, and his hat.

Saturday evening, a female infant, apparently about a month old, was found at the door of Mr. Best, of Milman-street, near Brunswick-square. The poor infant was in a rush basket, and was dressed in a calico shift, a cap, and flannel bedgown, and wrapped in an old blanket. There was a note suspended from the child's neck, on which was written—"Poor Maria Thompson." The child was taken to the Work-house in Gray's Inn-lane.

Thursday evening about seven o'clock, as Miss Eliza Porter was passing along Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, she was met by two fellows, who followed her until she came to the corner of George-street, when one of them suddenly struck her a blow across the head, and at the same moment her veil, and a small basket she carried in her hand, were snatched from her; the thieves ran down George-street. The basket contained a steel purse with a one pound note, and 12*s.* in silver. Many robberies have lately been committed on this spot.

On Friday morning the neighbourhood of Charlton-street, Mary-le-bone, was much alarmed by a loud and violent screaming, proceeding from the house of Mr. Compton, a cabinet-maker. A great crowd collected, who were on the point of breaking open the door, when Mr. Compton came home. On entering he found his wife (an infirm woman about 60 years old) tied down in a chair, by his daughter, who was standing over her with a flat iron, with which she had beat her violently about the head. Mrs. C. on being released fainted away. A surgeon was sent for; and the unnatural daughter, who is 23 years of age, was given into custody. She was committed to prison.

MARRIAGES.

Jan. 31, at St. Paul's, Covent-Garden, by the Rev. Dr. Ransdolph, Mr. Henry Mills, of Great Winchester-street, to Miss Loftus, of Tavistock-street.

Jan. 8, Bab. Charrier, Esq. of Kingston, Jamaica, to Catherine, second daughter of the late N. Sartarelli, Esq. of Kensington House, Middlesex.

Jan. 18, at Exeter, Mr. Jas. Richards, cooper, aged 22, to Miss Stone, a damsel of seventy-two.—The bride was conveyed to the church in a sedan chair, the better to conceal her maiden blushes.

Jan. 23, at Bath, Rear-Admiral Macnamara, to the Hon. Mrs. Carleton, widow of the Hon. Lieut.-Colonel G. Carleton.

Jan. 24, the Baron Etienne De Pully, of the Chateau de Neuville, near Pontoise, to Miss Elizabeth Norton, of Sloane-street.

On Thursday, James Sadler, Esq. of Weyhill, to Miss Kibblewhite, of Liddiard, near Wootton Bassett, sister to one of the late Representatives for that rotten Borough.

DEATHS.

Jan. 27, at Bentley Priory, Stanmore, John James Hamilton, Marquis of Abercorn. So anxious was his Lordship to prevent the anxieties of his friends, that he forbade his domestics ever alluding to his illness in the slightest way. To prevent the parade of physicians attending him at his country seat, he came to town to meet them three times a week. The complaint existed in the stomach, said to be attended by an enlargement of the liver. He was in his 64th year.

Early on Wednesday morning, at his house in Devonshire-place, General Morse. His Lady died a few weeks ago.

On Thursday, in Lincoln's-Inn-fields, Sir Claude Champion de Crespigny, Bart. Receiver-General of the Droits of Admiralty, Director of the South Sea House, &c.

Jan. 21, at Saville Green, near Halifax, aged 59, John Rhodes, Esq. banker. Mr. Rhodes sat down to breakfast in apparent health; he retired hastily from the table, on account of a crumb of bread irritating the windpipe, which induced a fit of coughing, the violence of which broke a blood-vessel in his lungs, and in half an hour he was a corpse!

Jan. 22, Anne, wife of Charles Lukin, Esq. of Leigh-street, Brunswick-square.

Dec. 25, at Broughton, near Preston, aged 101, Mrs. Susan Mayor.

THE EXAMINER.

No. 528. SUNDAY, FEB. 8, 1818.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 513.

ON THE INTELLECTUAL INFERIORITY OF PARLIAMENT TO THE DEMANDS OF THE AGE.

THE Parliament has met again; and again have people been struck with a conviction which has been rapidly growing upon the community of late; we mean, the great inferiority of that Assembly to what should be expected of it in point of intellect as well as integrity. It satisfies none of the best qualities of the observers. By far the greater part of the House of Commons are known to be corruptly chosen; and the minds neither of them, nor of the Peers who return them, are at all such as to make up for this outrage upon decency. Their reflections and speeches are dull; their arguments neither good nor new; their information confined in small and partial spheres, and additionally cramped by the falsest notions of self-interest. When they first assemble, it is curious to see how completely their observations have been anticipated by the newspapers, and made in a better manner; and they go on in the same dogged way from beginning to end, blinking the real question if they are on the defensive side, and often avoiding it even on the other from a common sense of interest. It is a mere waste of time to confute them. It might have been otherwise once; but it is no longer necessary. The community see through their bad arguments in knowing their actual condition; for they know they cannot palter with it; it is Do so, or go out. There may be a few independent individuals, and there may be a few more individuals working their way up into independence, or into ambitious or even patriotic action; but the majority—the great majority, are clearly a very dull, interested, and contented set, who content nobody else; and the public are as sick of them, as of an old prosing and pretending gentleman in a coffee-room.

That there are clever men in Parliament nobody will deny. The names of Lord HOLLAND alone in the upper House, and of BRUGHAM, BURDETT, FOLKSTONE, TIERNEY, and CANNING, in the lower, are sufficient to shew it. Lord WELLESLEY and Lord GREY are intelligent men; and so seems Lord BATHURST, in spite of his want of proper taste and magnanimity in joking about the captive NAPoleon. In Lord GRENVILLE, we must own, we never could discover any thing but a heavy and formal aristocracy, gifted with much diplomacy of talking. Lord STANHOPE, a shrewd and original head, is unfortunately gone, and has left a successor, who seems in haste to shew himself his direct opposite, in eccentricity, opinion, wit, knowledge, and every thing else. CURRAN, another shrewd and clever man, has gone too; but Ireland, scandalously treated Ireland, still furnishes more than her due share of talent in this as in other respects, while GRATTAN and PLUNKETT survive.

But some of the best speakers in the House are not those which speak oftenest; and the cause of this is the same which prevents the herd of common-place men from speaking at all. It is the unnatural ascendancy of common-place itself. A few men, who are the representatives of the oligarchy of Boroughmongers, and who at once govern and serve them, carry every measure they please; that is not calculated to disturb the usurpers themselves; and as the clever men in the House cannot, for very shame and indignation, but come forward now and then to express their feelings, so the multitude of minds who are akin to the ruling powers have neither the ability nor the necessity to say any thing but Aye and No. The rulers themselves would say as little, if their very office did not compel them to talk.

We have heard it said, that there are many clever men in the House among those who never speak; and when we inquire further on the subject, we find that such and such a gentleman is very pleasant at table; that another is the author of some anonymous pamphlet; that a third is an elegant scholar, and was in high reputation at Eton or St. John's; that a fourth is shrewdly suspected of being the writer of some verses in the Anti-Jacobin, or the Odes for the Laureatship; that a fifth enjoys the admiration of Higgins or Tomkins, both of them very eminent with each other; and that a sixth is so, very clever—Good God! how very clever he is!

Now we are not disposed to deny the merits of these gentlemen in their way. We are admirers of elegant scholarship, and still more of pleasant companionship; and it would be hard if corruption had so corrupted even the yeas and nays retainers of Ministers, as to do away all the effects of education, and of that really wiser time of life when some little degree of sentiment or enthusiasm was mingled with their speculations. But it is easy for people to be all which these well educated persons are understood to be, with the help of a little early acquired taste. They are still far from what the times and the public intellect require; and can muster up so little original talent as well as independence among them, that a single sturdy English writer (COBBETT), in spite of the nonsense he talks about the learned languages, from knowing nothing about them, is enabled to talk it with the more effect on account of the really poor figure which these elegant gentlemen cut.

This is one class of the retainers of corruption; and it may be observed of them generally, that they are just informed and learned enough to be worldly wise, and ornament a little the dullness of their masters;—in other words, they are just accomplished enough to be livery servants to a more cunning or peremptory ignorance, and just clever enough to bully their own minds into a notion that they are successful and happy, when they feel and carry in their very faces that they are otherwise. Their scholarship, whatever words it may understand, is ignorant of the best meaning of them; it has no sentiment, no percep-

CASH PAYMENTS.

Lord LAUDERDALE moved for various financial accounts respecting the Public Debt and Revenue, and the issue of Bank Notes, preparatory to the important discussion which must shortly come on.

Lord KING thought that there was much to alarm the country in the avowal respecting the Bank restriction being continued. Nothing, in his opinion, could go on right till cash payments were resumed.

Lord LIVERPOOL was ready to repeat, that it was for the interest of the country that the Bank should resume its payments in cash. He, in fact, knew of nothing in the state of affairs which could prevent the resumption: but he was also bound to say, that circumstances might arise on the Continent, which might make it necessary for the House to consider how far such resumption would be advantageous to the country.

Lord LAUDERDALE thought that the Noble Earl's declaration was most dangerous. A full investigation was necessary, and the Bank Directors should be examined; for it now appeared that the resumption of cash payments no longer depended on the wisdom of Parliament, but on measures which any Continental Despot might pursue.—The motions were carried.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord SIDMOUTH moved that the various papers laid on the table respecting the State of the Country should be referred to a Secret Committee.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE was of opinion that the Noble Secretary should state his reasons which induced him to propose a secret investigation.

Lord SIDMOUTH said, that the object was to show what had been the State of the Country since the last Secret Report, and how Ministers had executed the powers granted to them.

Lord CARNARVON observed, that the House must not delude itself by consenting to go into an inquiry upon information furnished by the Ministers only: the Committee should have the power to call for other evidence and to examine other facts. A Report grounded on partial evidence, would be a mere mockery. After all that had been witnessed, there was too much reason to believe that the Servants of Government had themselves excited the disturbances that had occurred; and before a Bill of Indemnity was passed, they ought to be well satisfied on this head—(Hear, hear!)—If their Lordships should preclude all those from indemnity, who had languished in secret dungeons and groaned under the weight of fetters, merely on the Report of a Secret Committee, they would not be doing their duty; and he now entered his protest against entering on any inquiry into the conduct of Ministers with evidence of their own procuring, and thus making them their own accusers, witnesses, and judges!

Lord LIVERPOOL said, the only question was, whether they should follow the invariable usage on such occasions. It would be for the House to determine whether it would act on the representations of the Secret Committee, or order any further measures.

The question for referring the Papers to a Secret Committee was carried, and the House adjourned till Thursday.

Thursday, Feb. 5.

SECRET COMMITTEE.

The Secret Committee was chosen by ballot in the usual way: the Members were, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Harrowby, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Marquis Camden, the Duke of Montrose, Earl Fitzwilliam, Earl of Liverpool, Earl Powis, Lord Sidmouth, Lord Grenville, and Lord Redesdale.

Earl GROSVENOR remarked, that the Committee should have the power to probe matters to the quick, by sending for papers, persons, and records, in aid of their inquiries. For his part, he was persuaded that all the late acts of treason and disturbance might be traced to the hired Agents of Government; and it was their Lordships duty to inquire into the conduct of such persons, who had seduced others only to betray them. He therefore moved that the Secret Committee should have the power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Lord LIVERPOOL contended that there was no reason for departing from the usual course on such occasions. As to the Agents of Government, he had no doubt it would finally appear that their services were not of the nature imagined by the Noble Lord; but that question was not now before the House.

Earl Grosvenor's motion was negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

tion of the soul of beauty, no elevation. The very best which it has done for them is to polish a joke; and even this talent, besides being confined to but one or two, seems to have been spent together with the animal spirits of youth. It is curious to observe, either what an inferior man CANNING is to his Antijacobin days, or how impossible he finds it to be free and jocose under the dispensation of his dull and powerful friends.

In truth, the schools from which these more elegant retainers of stupidity issue forth, are very bad ones both for patriotism and genius. We allude to such as Eton and Westminster, where a system is carried on, with the countenance of the masters, calculated, under pretence of fitting the future men for the world, to render them nothing but alternate slaves and tyrants. Fit them for one sort of world it does, but only such a world as is most unfit for a generous youth to enter; a world, which sordid and violent minds have first made what it is, and then must spoil the better wisdom of youth in order to maintain.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, FEB. 2.—Baron Muffling, a Prussian General Officer, forming part of the Staff of the Duke of Wellington in the campaign of 1815, has arrived at Paris.

One of the Secretaries of the Spanish Ambassador at London passed, within a few days, through Bayonne, on his way to Madrid, to communicate the official intelligence of Mina, with other circumstances already known.

ITALY.

GENOA, JAN. 15.—The Vice-Consul of Sardinia, at Algiers, has arrived here, who relates the following facts:—A Sardinian brig had been captured and carried into Algiers, under the pretence that her papers were not regular. The Vice-Consul protested against the capture, and proceeded to the Palace of the Dey with his colleagues, the other Consuls. The Dey received them sword in hand, surrounded by his Guards.—The English Consul presented himself at the same time, to complain of acts of violence which had been committed upon his son and his two nieces. They had been stopped in the street; the young man had been thrown into a dungeon, and the two ladies had been conveyed to the seraglio of the Dey, where Turkish dresses had been given to them. The Dey, in a fury, ordered his Captain of the Guards to bring in the young Englishman, whose head was cut off in the presence of his father. The bleeding head was exposed at the gate of the Palace, and the English Consul withdrew trembling. The Sardinian Vice-Consul received no other answer to his representation, than an order immediately to quit Algiers, and they took from him his daughter by force. We have some difficulty in giving credit to this horrible statement.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

The Royal assent was given, by commission, to the Bill for the repeal of the Act of last Session, entitled an Act for the Repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 2.

Lord SIDMOUTH laid on the table various papers relative to the State of the Country, and to the transactions which had taken place since the 2d of last August.—Adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 6.

The House, after forwarding some business, adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

CONVICTS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH IN NEWGATE.

Mr. BENNET moved, that there should be laid before the House, a return of the number of persons, male and female, now under sentence of death in Newgate, distinguishing their ages, the dates of their sentences, and the crimes of which they were convicted. He was induced to make this motion, in consequence of there being at this moment 65 or 66 persons under sentence of death in the gaol in question; and from his having understood from his Majesty's Ministers, during the last Session, that an arrangement would be made for reporting the persons convicted in one Session before the other commenced. The situation of the unhappy persons to whom he alluded was truly miserable, and their treatment more than inhuman. They were confined together in cells, nine feet five inches long, by seven feet wide; and in these places they were shut up 16 hours out of the four-and-twenty. They were all mixed together indiscriminately, the young with the old, and thus the young had the opportunity of learning nothing but the trade of preying upon their fellow-creatures. He could not help thinking that the House had a right to expect that his Majesty's Ministers would have attended to their pledge. If there was not room sufficient in the gaol for the accommodation of its inmates, application should be made to Parliament on the subject.

Alderman ATKINS said, it was extremely to be regretted that the condemned cells in Newgate were only calculated for forty persons. It never was anticipated that there would be occasion for more accommodation.

Mr. BENNET stated, that the Recorder had been ready for some time with his last report; the delay took place on the part of his Majesty's Government.—The motion was then put and carried.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.

Mr. BENNET presented a Petition from Mr. Lenbow, a person apprehended under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and confined for eight months in Coldbath-fields prison, praying for redress. The Hon. Gentleman stated the substance of the Petition. The Petitioner was one of those persons who had been dragged without guilt, and thrust into prison by his Majesty's Ministers. He said without guilt, because he took it for granted, from the experience they had of those gentlemen's mercy, that if he were guilty he would have been brought to trial. When this person was examined before Lord Sidmouth, that Noble Lord promised, that he should have a fair trial; that he should have Counsel assigned him, and be furnished with a copy of the indictment against him, and a list of witnesses. This pledge had, however, never been redeemed; and he, along with others—a thing unprecedented, he believed, in an English Court of Justice—were now found entreating to be tried for High Treason, the crime with which they were charged! While in prison the letters of his wife were suppressed, and, in fact, every species of oppression was heaped upon him. His poverty was such, that he was under the necessity of asking for clothes of his gaoler, who insulted him by offering him the clothes apportioned to felons. The Petitioner was one of those who had refused to enter into recognizance on the 1st of January, and who was discharged on the 20th of the same month without recognizance. If it were just to call for his recognizance on the 1st, it was equally just to make the same demand on the 20th. The demand, however, was not made, and hence, he inferred an admission of its injustice.

The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 2.

At four o'clock there were not Members enough present to form a House.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 5.

On the motion of Lord CASTLEREAGH the Finance Committee was re-appointed, the same as last year.

Several Bank papers were ordered, on the motion of Mr. GRENFELL, who contended that till the cash payments were resumed the utmost confusion must prevail, and the longer the matter was deferred, the greater would be the difficulty and the more alarming the convulsion.

Lord CASTLEREAGH brought up the papers containing information respecting the internal state of the country.

Mr. BROUGHAM wished to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he could now give him any information whether the papers respecting the income-tax had been destroyed or not.

Mr. VANSITTART said, orders had been sent to the different collectors to destroy them all, except such as were necessary to recover the arrears; and he believed they had been destroyed.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, he understood that copies had been kept, though the originals had been destroyed; and that was just as bad as if the originals had been kept.

Mr. VANSITTART said, the orders sent were to destroy both copies and originals.

EX-OFFICIO PROSECUTIONS—MR. HONE.

Mr. W. SMITH moved for an account of the sums received from Mr. Hone at the Crown-office for copies of the ex-officio informations filed against him, &c. &c. He did this in order to procure the most authentic information in order to ground on it a future proceeding. As to Mr. Hone, he had no knowledge of him until he made his defence; but in common with others, he had admired the skill and fortitude with which he had defended himself. As to the Parodies, they were highly reprehensible. Mr. Hone, however, was praiseworthy in stopping the sale of them, as soon as he knew that the public opinion was against them. For his part, he did not think they were of a nature fit to be taken notice of in a Court of Justice. Mr. Hone complained of nothing but the state of the law. From the Attorney-General, and the Master of the Crown Office, he had received every polite attention; neither did he complain of Lord Ellenborough, for refusing to order him copies of the informations, because he (Hone) believed they were withheld from him according to law. This was, however, the only way in which he (Mr. Smith) could bring the subject regularly before the House, so as to call their attention to the state of the law on it.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that the Chief Justice had no right or power to order Mr. Hone to receive copies of the informations. The fees for copies were precisely the same in indictments, as in informations, and had continued the same since 1693, with the exception of the additions made from time to time in consequence of the Stamp Acts. If more had been demanded from Mr. Hone than others, that would have been a reason for this motion, which did not appear necessary, because no more information would be obtained by it than what every one knew, namely, that the fees went to the Officer of the Court, and not to the Master of the Crown-office; and that there had been no alteration in them since 1693. He concluded by moving the previous question.

Sir F. BURDETT thought no objection had been raised to the motion of the Learned Gentleman, whose only argument was that nothing could be gained by it beyond what every one knew. But the object of it was to bring the subject regularly before the House. While on his legs he could not help noticing the multiplied legal expences in consequence of stamps, and he hoped the Hon. Member would also bring that intolerable grievance before the House.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the reason he had put Mr. Hone's name into the motion, instead of making it a general one, was, that Mr. H.'s case was the strongest instance of intolerable injustice. His fees amounted to 9^l. before he could get copies of the informations, and he was obliged to sell part of his property at a great loss, in order to raise that sum. He (Mr. S.) had chosen this course as the most Parliamentary way of bring the subject before the House.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said the trial was allowed on all sides to have been conducted according to law; and Mr. Hone had not been called on to pay more than any other defendant. He (Lord C.) thought a direct negative was a better mode of meeting the motion than by the previous question.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, the Noble Lord had mistaken the object of the motion, which was only to shew the amount of fees, with a view to the establishing some legislative enquiry on the subject. For this purpose, it was wished to shew the House the amount of fees and stamps on each sheet of the informations, which could not be done by a general motion. That might be shewn in five or six other instances if they chose.

Mr. BATHURST said, every defendant had a right personally to inspect the informations against him without any fees. He opposed this motion, because it was made with a view to bring forward a particular case, and not remedy a generally-complained-of evil. For his own part, he was only astonished that the fees were so small, considering the expences of stamps required by the necessities of the times.

Lord FOLKSTONE said, that whenever a general motion was made on his side of the House, they were always called upon to state a particular case of grievance. It had been said, Mr. Hone might have perused the informations; but if he did not mistake, Mr. Hone was then a prisoner in the King's Bench without bail for the informations.

Mr. W. SMITH, when the motion was about to be put, withdrew it, in order to bring it forward in a general shape.

The Irish Grand Jury Prosecution Bill was passed.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 4.

Mr. W. SMITH, understanding there was no objection to the motion which he brought forward the preceding evening, if framed generally, would now merely move for an Account of Monies received by the Clerk of the Crown Office for Fees demanded from Persons applying for Copies of Informations.—Agreed to.

Sir F. BURDETT presented a Petition from the Inhabitants of Bath, praying that they may annually elect Members to Parliament.—Laid on the table.

Mr. C. WYNNE brought in a Bill to alter and amend the Laws relating to Elections, particularly the taking of Polls; his object being to shorten the time of polling, prohibiting the wearing of cockades, &c.

SUPPLY.

Mr. VANSITTART moved the House to go into a Committee of Supply.

Sir G. WARRENDER thought it unnecessary to go into detail on the subject of the Votes for the Naval Service. He should merely advert to the Sixth Report of the Committee of Enquiry, which was laid before the House last Session, and on which the Estimates were founded. The sum now demanded would be somewhat increased. Last year the number of Seamen was estimated at 19,000, but in consequence of the necessity for an increased number for foreign service, particularly South America, there would also be a small increase for Ordnance Service.

It was then resolved, that 20,000 Seamen be granted, and that a sum of 611,000*l.* for the wages of those Seamen. Also that a sum of 550,000*l.* for wear and tear, and 520,000*l.* for victualling, and for ordnance 91,000*l.* for the same period.

Mr. VANSITTART then stated, that it would be necessary to call on the Committee to vote a sum to replace two several Votes for 24 millions—18 millions—and nine millions of which Votes, Exchequer Bills, to a certain amount, were outstanding, which, in amount, was considerably less than last Session, or could be expected. It had been stated by an Hon. Friend, that the amount calculated to be outstanding on the 5th of January, 1818, might be about 60 millions. Now the fact was, that the whole amount outstanding was about 56 millions and a half. The Right Hon. Gentleman proceeded to make some further statements in respect to the debt, but they were delivered in so low a tone, that it was impossible to collect them correctly. He concluded with proposing a Vote of 25,000,000*l.* to pay off outstanding Exchequer Bills.

The motion was then agreed to.

A conversation took place. Mr. TIERNEY having asked what Exchequer Bills were outstanding as applicable to the revenue,

Mr. VANSITTART said, about one million.

The several sums of nine millions and six millions were then voted to pay off certain other outstanding Exchequer Bills.—The Report was then received.

POOR LAWS.

Mr. S. BOURNE moved for the appointment of a Committee to revise the Poor Laws. It was the opinion of the former Committee that time should be allowed to prepare and digest the same; and he would propose the same Members, with the exception of two, whose loss was of some moment. The one, Mr. Hall, who brought to the consideration of the subject an enlightened and well-informed mind, and whose loss would be felt by the Committee. The other, Mr. Rose, whose able and active mind was at all times devoted to the service of his country, particularly the last of his public acts, the Bill for Saving Banks.—He then moved for the appointment of the Committee.

Mr. CURWEN contended, that a radical change in the system of the Poor Laws would be the only practical benefit to be derived to the country from the labours of the Committee. He was much afraid that no good would accrue to the public, unless the Committee could hit upon some expedient which would elevate the labouring classes in the scale of society.

Sir F. BURDETT did not mean to impute blame to the Committee, nor did he think the present one would do much good.

The fault lay not with them; the mischief lay in the present situation of the country; for, when there was no inducement on the part of those who employed the labourer to give him the price of his labour, the fault lay with the Government; who, from certain circumstances, did not make it their interest to employ their capital, and to give work to the industrious labourer. But, in truth, the heavy taxation was the cause of the evil of pauperism. He could well recollect, when he was a boy, that it was the boast of the labourer around his father's estate that none of his family had ever been a burthen to the parish.—The best remedy for the grievance of poverty, was, to reduce taxation, to abolish sinecures, pensions, and useless places. It was an admitted fact, that if the Government took all the money out of the pockets of the rich, they rendered it impossible for them to employ the labouring classes of their fellow subjects.

Lord CASTLEREAGH contended, that much good had already arisen from the last Report of the Committee; and notwithstanding the gloomy views of the Hon. Baronet, he would recommend the adoption of the motion, because he was convinced that there was nothing in the Poor Laws which might not be amended to advantage, and be turned to much practical benefit.

Mr. CALCRAFT agreed with the Hon. Baronet, that taxation was the main ingredient which formed the evil now complained of.

Lord CASTLEREAGH wished it to be understood, that Government would do all in their power to forward the labours of the Committee, and to give those labours full effect; but it was thought by them to be better to allow the business to be investigated by a Committee.

The Committee was then appointed.—Adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 5.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord CASTLEREAGH moved for a Secret Committee to whom the Papers laid on the table should be referred. In the course of his remarks, he said, in reply to questions previously put, that the mode of appointment usual on such occasions should be maintained; and that as to investing the Committee with power to examine persons, papers, and records, he could see no reason for such a measure. The Committee was not wanted to recommend any particular measure in relation to the conduct of Ministers. He did not hesitate to say, that a Bill of Indemnity might be deemed expedient; but it was not for that object a Committee was intended. Communications had doubtless been received, which it would be highly improper to make public. When the time arrived, Ministers would enter into a satisfactory explanation of the whole of their conduct; but their immediate object was, to give in a Committee an explanation of the State of the Country at and since the period of last Session, when the wisdom of Parliament found it necessary to resort to the vigorous measures which were then enacted. At the same time, he must observe, that there were even now a great number of dangerous men, working with activity for the destruction of social order and established authority; so that the country should not rest satisfied with a belief that there was a total freedom from internal danger.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. TIERNEY believed the truth was, that Ministers wished to keep the knowledge of the papers in the sealed bag altogether from the House. They now they had made out a strong case against themselves, in the mind of every honest man, by their conduct last Sessions, and they now wished to make a strong case, if they could, in their favour.—(Hear, hear!)—The Noble Lord's candour was great in admitting that Ministers might want a Bill of Indemnity! Without this great candour, the House might have suspected as much. Though the form of a ballot was to be gone through, the other side knew already every Member who was to compose the Secret Committee.—(Hear, hear!)—Notwithstanding all the reports circulated by Ministers about the burning of barracks, the smothering of soldiers, and other horrid atrocities, he now declared most solemnly, that he did not think there had been any one ground to justify the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—(Hear, hear!)—Before they ought to obtain a Bill of Indemnity, they should prove that not one individual had been deprived of his liberty without the most urgent necessity. If Ministers could justify their conduct about those infernal Scoundrels (Hear, hear!) their Spies, they might hope for something from the House, but not till then. He used strong language, but he could find no other words to express his abhorrence of a set of men, who mixed with the distressed people, and instigated them to crimes, for the purpose of informing against them! This proposal for a Secret Committee was a coarse juggle; Ministers wanted to be the judges of their own conduct: they were afraid of some motion on the subject, so they put a bold front on the matter, and pretended to court inquiry, well knowing what the result would be!—All they sought for was an indemnity for their misconduct; they sent down a bag, and said, "there are our characters, impeach them who can."—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. B. BATHURST maintained, that experience had shown that the mode now recommended was the wisest and best that could be followed. The Suspension Act had restored the country to tranquillity, and Ministers, for doing their duty, ought not to be left to the resentment of those who differed with them. No matter whether the Conspirators had been persons of high or low rank: it was equally necessary that they should be put down. He denied that any of the disturbances that had taken place had been caused by the person named Oliver: on the contrary, that person had been the cause of preventing very great evils. Mr. Oliver had accidentally procured information, and had very properly given it to Government, who then directed him to continue his observations. This he had done; and was this more than ought to have been done?—(Hear!)—It was unfair to cast such imputations, and he would be always ready to defend Mr. Oliver against them!

Mr. F. N. DOUGLAS said, that Ministers were about to obtain a Committee to inquire into their conduct, which was to be composed of the criminals themselves!—(Hear, hear, and laughter.)—Why were Ministers afraid of laying their conduct openly before the House? The reason was, they dared not enter on a fair discussion of their conduct. Instead of such fair inquiry, a Bill of Indemnity was to be called for, which the House was to pass on the strength of another Green Bag! There was nothing like fair dealing in this line of action. Though Oliver might not have been the first cause of the disturbances, yet he thought that the seductions of that person had occasioned slight agitations to proceed to the lengths they had finally reached. It was highly reprehensible that such deluders should escape, while their poor dupes were sacrificed to the laws.

Sir S. ROMILLY contended that the House should be aware of the nature of the inquiry which was to take place. A Bill of Indemnity, it appeared, was to be called for, and therefore not a mere formal and delusive investigation, but ample and fair inquiry, was particularly necessary. By the appointment of a Committee, the accused persons would obtain a majority of their Judges. The tumults in the North had been put down by the ordinary operation of the laws, so that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act could not have been the remedy there. The proceedings of last Session called for full atonement, which the House could only now make by a rigid inquiry. Individuals had suffered greatly, and the Constitution had suffered. The precedent might be fatal, in after times, to the liberty of the country. He should vote for inquiry—not secret and delusive inquiry, but open and public.

Mr. PHILIPS was of opinion, that nothing could more injure the House in the public opinion than the proposed measure. It was clear that all the plots had originated with Spies and Informers.

Mr. C. W. WYNN was of a different opinion, believing that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had rescued the country from great calamities. (Hear!)

Sir W. BURROUGHS observed, that the late events had, in his judgment, all shown the inutilty of the Suspension. Had Oliver been produced at Derby, it would have been seen that the rising had been only partial. There had been no sort of proof that a treasonable connexion had existed. How could Ministers justify themselves for dismissing men untried, who had been charged with the highest crimes? The late melancholy event had proved that there was no disaffection to the House of Brunswick in the country; but the feelings of general distress had been worked upon for the worst of purposes. The Constitution had been violated, and the injured were now to be debarred all redress: but he hoped the House would not allow of such acts of oppression.

Sir J. SEBRIGHT took blame to himself for having last year voted for the Suspension, as from what had since appeared, he was satisfied the measure was uncalled-for. He had indeed been most egregiously deceived in the business (Hear, hear!) but then Ministers themselves might also have been deceived!—The unfortunate sufferers had been the tools of designing men.

Col. ELLISON approved of the Suspension:—still, if Ministers could not afford a full justification of their conduct, he should not vote for a bill of indemnity.

Mr. SAVILLE and Mr. FORBES approved of the measures of Ministers.

Mr. BROUGHAM made some brief observations as to the formation of the Committee; and concluded with asking, whether the Noble Lord ought to be a Member of a Committee, which was to decide on his own conduct?

Mr. CANNING remarked, that unless the Noble Lord was voted into the Committee by a majority of the House, he could not form a part of it.

The House divided on the question of ballot—For it, 102.—Against it, 29.—Majority, 73.—Adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 6.

Petitions were presented from Messrs. Knight and Haynes, of Manchester and Nottingham, praying for redress on account of unjust imprisonment and other ill treatment.—Ordered to lie on the table.

A Petition from Wellington, in Salop, signed by the principal inhabitants, against the employment of Climbing boys, in Sweeping Chimnies, was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. VANSITTART had to propose the usual and annual grants, and a further grant for replacing of Exchequer Bills, of 30 millions.

Mr. TIERNEY wished to know whether this sum would be sufficient, and whether the six millions to the Bank were to be paid in money?

Mr. VANSITTART said, that the payment to the Bank was to be made in money, not in bills.—(Hear!)—This would enable the Bank to support the commercial interests of the country. It was difficult to give a precise answer to the other question of the Hon. Gentleman.

Some conversation arose, in which Lord CASTLEREAGH observed, that he regretted the prevailing disposition for vesting capital in funds abroad—and he was anxious that the country should seriously contemplate the possible consequences of placing too much confidence in foreign securities. (Hear, hear!) The resolutions were all agreed to.

THE SECRET COMMITTEE.

The Scrutineers brought up the List of Members chosen by ballot to form the Committee of Secrecy. The following were the names:—

Lord Milton, Lord George Cavendish, Lord Castlereagh, Lord Lascelles, Right Hon. C. Bathurst, Hon. W. Lamb, Sir A. Pigott, Sir W. Scott, Sir J. Nicholl, Mr. W. Wynn, the Solicitor-General, the Attorney-General, Mr. Canning, Mr. C. Yorke, Mr. W. Egerton, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Wilbraham Bootle, Mr. W. Dundas, Mr. Peel, Sir Wm. Curtis, and Admiral Frank.

It was proposed, as Lord G. Cavendish could not possibly attend, that Mr. Tierney should be elected in his room; but this was negatived.

Mr. BROUGHAM protested against Lord Castlereagh's sitting on a Committee of the kind, as he might have to decide on questions in which he was personally concerned.

After some conversation, however, the question was decided as proposed by Ministers—and the Committee was arranged, seven being a quorum—to whom all secret papers were to be referred.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 8.

THE most extraordinary piece of news this week is concerning those incorrigible ruffians or miserable ignorant wretches (which you will) the Algerines. The Dey is said to have committed an atrocity, not unparalleled we fear, but certainly not witnessed by Europeans for many years. The first account came from Genoa, (see the Foreign Head) and it concludes with the following remark:—“We have some difficulty in giving credit to this horrible statement.”

This difficulty was naturally shared by every body else. Besides the exaggerations common to most stories at first, especially those of a fearful cast, it was thought impossible that the Dey could have conducted himself so outrageously just after the lesson he had received from our naval armament; and the feelings of our countrymen have since been relieved by other accounts from Frankfort and Genoa. The first, after copying the statement as it appeared in the French papers, adds in a strong contradictory manner;—

“The Dey received the Consuls surrounded by his guards, and with his sabre in his hand: but he fell into such a rage, that he threatened the English Consul to have his son's head cut off, and to have it fixed up at the door of the hall of audience, if they troubled him any further. At the request of the terrified father, all the Consuls desisted for a moment. The next day the Sardinian Vice-Consul was ordered to leave Algiers.”—If the half of this is true, it is sufficient to excite the indignation of all Europe against those barbarians. The opinion is, that confirmation of these circumstances must be waited for.

The second Genoa account confines the insult to the Sardinian Ambassador and his niece, but is dated three days earlier than the original one. It is this:—

“Genoa, Jan. 12.

“The present Dey of ALGIERS exceeds in wickedness and arrogance all his predecessors.—A Genoese merchantman, lately captured by one of his corsairs, having been carried into the port of Algiers, the Sardinian Vice-Consul, Mr. CARON, considered it to be his duty to demand its release. Instead of paying just attention to this demand, the Dey ordered the cargo to be immediately put up to auction, caused the Consul to be conveyed on board the captured vessel, having previously had his niece seized and put into his harem. Mr. CARON has already arrived at Genoa, where he is put under quarantine.—Our Monarch is highly incensed at the inhuman conduct of the Dey, and has ordered the immediate equipment of some frigates and corvettes to obtain satisfaction.”

The following paragraph succeeds:—

“We learn from Constantinople, that the Deys of TUNIS and ALGIERS have concluded a treaty of peace under the guarantee of the GRAND SIGNIOR, and at the same time, in conjunction with the Dey of TRIPOLI, have entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Emperor of MOROCCO.”

Now twenty such alliances as these are not worth a rush, if the European Governments chose to behave themselves, and finally abate this atrocious nuisance. We make a show of punishment occasionally, and the last had certainly something in it; but we have taught these fellows before, and to no purpose. We should finish their studies for them. The truth, however, is, that there are several reasons why the European Governments do not like to deal in a summary manner with them, and all of them scandalous. One is, that they are jealous of each others' ultimate advantages in clearing the Barbary coast; a second, that the pirate system can be turned into means of annoyance against one another, as occasion suits; a third, that they are grossly ignorant of the real safe and good way of trading with Africa, and appear as if they were fairly cowed by the insolence of the pirates to the Consuls and the English residents; and a fourth, (which prevented the matter from being settled the other day), that they do not like to meddle with old institutions and arbitrary governments even in their most disgusting shape. Mr. BRUCE, the celebrated traveller, was once Consul at Algiers, and those who wish to get information on this and other such matters connected with Africa, and see the habitual and outrageous insolence and tyranny of DEYS and BEYS of all sorts towards Europeans, will do well to consult his works, particularly the first volume, and the curious correspondence between him and Lord HALIFAX in the Appendix to the Life.

Another Secret Committee has been chosen by ballot for the purpose of gravely opening a certain Green Bag, and recommending the Ministers, if found worthy, to a Bill of Indemnity. “It is one of the coarsest juggles,” to use the words of Mr. TIERNEX, “which has ever been played off upon mankind.” The whole system is indeed a coarse and too visible juggle from beginning to end. Peers and other boroughmongers nominate the majority of the House, and barter and truck it with the Ministers. The Ministers, by means of this suspension of the Constitution, give themselves the power of carrying any other; they carried one accordingly the other day; and now they and their friends, with a mawkish Whig Lord or so brought in by way of seeming impartial, are going to examine their own accounts of the matter; they will hum and haw over them a due time, and then they come forward and state that they have a clear right to an indemnity, and they decree themselves one accordingly. There is no necessity of discussing such questions, as if in fact they were any questions at all. It is doing their grave impudence too much honour. They are already known most notoriously, by their fruits as well as themselves. The root of the evil is where we state it to be: and it is that,—it is that, we must discuss and destroy.

We were last night assured in the City, that regular accounts have been received from the Agents of Lloyd's at Genoa, bearing date the 23d. of January, eight days later than that of the intelligence relating to Algiers; that letters have also reached several merchants immediately connected with that city, and that through neither of the above channels has the slightest notice transpired of the circumstances in question.—Little doubt, we should hope, can thence be entertained, that the whole, or leading parts of the information, are unfounded.—Courier.—Saturday.

Paris Papers received yesterday state, that the Duke of WELLINGTON dined on Monday with Prince TALLEYRAND.

There have been rumours that the Lords LIVERPOOL and SIDMOUTH have had some differences with their Colleagues, and are about to retire from office. We give little credit to these rumours, though they are somewhat confidently asserted, and can only add, that we should feel deep regret if they had any solid foundation.—Sun, Saturday.

A private letter from Paris, in a Ghent Paper, says,—“That the flight of MAUBREUIL, who has escaped from the prison of Douay, has excited no surprise. People do not doubt but that his flight was facilitated, to avoid the scandal of his confessions. It is known, that he always persisted in his declarations, that very exalted personages had charged him with missions very hostile to the Ex-Imperial Family. The arrest of the gaoler is considered as an inere farce, which will lead to nothing.”

Prince FREDERIC JOSEPH LOUIS, of Hesse Hombourg, is in his 49th year, being born in July 1767. He commanded the Austrian Hussars with distinguished gallantry; and we learn from Officers that served with him, that he is an officer of great military merit. His union with our amiable Princess ELIZABETH is fixed; his Serene Highness will be introduced at the Prince's levee on Thursday next. The marriage will take place at Easter. The Princess ELIZABETH will have a marriage portion of 40,000*l.* and her annual income is 15,000*l.* a-year. Her intended consort is hereditary Prince, and the reigning Duke is in his 71st year.—Rumour says that a matrimonial negotiation is also on the tapis between his Royal Highness the Duke of CLARENCE and a Princess of Denmark. We do not know which of the Ladies. The daughter of the present King is 25 years of age. The two daughters of the King's Uncle are both older, and are both widows.—Morning Chronicle.

There seems to be a mighty stir among all the Royal Old Maids and Old Bachelors. But what will it all produce?

The speeches at the Crown and Anchor will be read with much interest. Nothing can possibly justify the treatment which these “suspected persons” endured; and yet those who caused their sufferings, and who now shrink from the consequences, would wish us to believe that they possess lofty notions of justice and honour, and high feelings of humanity! Some of them, too, are very pious, go to church regularly, and talk of doing as they would be done by!—It stirs one's blood to contemplate such meanness, oppression, and hypocrisy.

A Meeting was held on Friday at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of raising a fund to assist in the building of additional Churches and Chapels throughout the kingdom. The Archbishop of CANTERBURY was in the Chair.—Nearly the whole Bench of Bishops, and at least 25 lay Peers were present. A number of Resolutions were passed, and the Assembly separated.

The heavy fogs of Friday and yesterday, it is feared, have been the cause of many accidents. It was with difficulty that people found their way in the suburbs—and riding perhaps was full as dangerous as walking.

A Correspondent requests us to state (which we do with pleasure, though not in the habit of announcing works), that a very full and authentic Life of the late Mr. CURRAN, by his son, W. H. CURRAN, Esq. of the Irish Bar, will be shortly in the press. He adds, that the work, if properly treated, must possess great interest, inasmuch as “the particulars of the progress of that distinguished Irishman's mind and fortunes, and of his conduct on many most important and trying occasions, are as yet generally unknown.”

APSLEY-HOUSE.—Thirty thousand pounds was the sum paid by the Duke of WELLINGTON to his brother, the Marquis of WELLESLEY, for his residence in Piccadilly, including the furniture, to which his Grace has since added many superb additions of French manufacture. It was intended to have changed the name of Apsley-house to that of the new owner; but the Duke being told that there was a Wellington-house in every street, where dwelt a linen-draper or a haberdasher, he determined to preserve the old name by way of distinction.

BURLINGTON-HOUSE.—The extensive improvements and alterations in this magnificent mansion are nearly completed. The apartments in the principal building have been newly arranged, so as to form a suite of rooms unequalled in the metropolis. The east wing is already furnished, and has for some time been occupied by Mr. CHARLES CAVENDISH, the second son of Lord GEORGE. In front of the extensive wall towards Piccadilly are placed twelve large square lanterns, which are to be illuminated with gas, as are all the lamps in the interior of the court-yard.

A young Gentleman, whose name it appears is ST. GEORGE GREGG, has made a most successful debut on the Dublin stage, and is announced for a second appearance in the character of Don Felix, in the Wonder.

APPREHENSION OF MAJOR LOCKYER.—A letter from Newport, Isle of Wight, dated February 5, says,—“Yesterday was apprehended, at Portsmouth, Major LOCKYER, and brought here this morning before the Coroner, THOS. SEWELL, Esq. who committed him immediately to Winchester Jail, to take his trial at the next Assizes.—It will be recollected, that Major LOCKYER killed Mr. JOHN SUTTON, at West Cowes, in a duel. Major LOCKYER shot him through the heart the first fire; Mr. SUTTON never discharged his pistol, which was found on the half-cock lying near him, after Major LOCKYER and the two seconds had absconded, which they did together directly Mr. SUTTON fell. The day following, Mr. HAND, the second of Mr. SUTTON, was apprehended at Portsmouth, by the Constable of West Cowes; but Major LOCKYER, and Mr. REDESDALE, his second, had the address to deceive the Officer, and made their escape; and it was not till yesterday that LOCKYER was taken, but REDESDALE is still at large.”

The new sect, recently sprung up, under the denomination of PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, or by the vulgar and reproachful, the Ranters, have already gained so many proselytes to their cause in Loughborough, that they have purchased a piece of ground near the Unicorn Inn, at the bottom of Church-street, and have already begun to erect a commodious chapel thereon; which, to speak more minutely, is marked out in a parallelogram form, seventeen yards and a half by twelve yards and a half.—Nottingham Review.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONNET.

TO THE AUTHOR OF "THE REVOLT OF ISLAM."

O THOU bold Herald of aspirings high,
No prostituted Muse inspired thy story,
But human Love lent thee his wings to fly
Forward into a coming age of glory,
When Tyrannies and Superstitions hoary
Beneath the foot of Liberty shall lie,
And men shall turn from those oppressor's gory
To worship Peace, and Love, and Charity.
The heart that could conceive so bright a day,
Is proof that it may come;—therefore shall they
Who live on tears and darkness, steep each tooth
In poison'd gall to make that heart their prey;
But thou shalt smile and pity, giving thy youth
To glorious hopes, and all-defying Truth.

NEGATA TENTAT ITER VIA.

Alas! this world was no meet place for thee!
Thy tender form play'd like a dream of light
Thro' the young days of childhood, pure and free;
Thy heedless bosom warding sorrow's blight.
And when the stern realities of life
Press'd on thy gentle mood, thou would'st have tried (Too lovely as thou wert for earthly strife)
That rugged way, but Heaven the path denied.

ATHENAI8.

[These, though amiable verses, are not the ones we should have selected from the packet with which the young and fair author's friend favoured us; but a weekly paper is too often pressed for room, and the time he allowed us presses also. If it can be extended, as we hope it will, we shall indulge ourselves with a much superior extract.—Exam.]

LORD SIDMOUTH CHALLENGED BY MR. THISTLEWOOD.

In the Court of King's Bench, yesterday morning, the Attorney-General entered the Court, and took his usual seat. Soon after, Lord Sidmouth was seated on the Bench; and on Lord Ellenborough coming into Court, he, as usual, addressed the Attorney-General first. "Mr. Attorney-General, will you move?" The ATTORNEY-GENERAL addressed the Court as follows:—My Lords,—I am about to exhibit articles of the peace, to which the Noble Lord on the Bench must swear before I address your Lordships.

The Attorney-General then handed the articles to Lord Sidmouth, who being sworn, stated that the contents of them were true.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then proceeded:—My Lords, I am to move your Lordships to exhibit articles of the peace, on the part of my Lord Sidmouth, against a person of the name of Arthur Thistlewood. This application, my Lords, is made on the part of my Lord Sidmouth, and in these articles he states that he does not exhibit any ill will or malice towards the person against whom they are exhibited, but he exhibits them for the preservation of his person from violence, which he apprehends. I shall state to your Lordships the act that has been done by this person on which the apprehension is founded—it is a letter sent to his Lordship, conveying a challenge to fight. My Lord Sidmouth has never seen this person actually write, but there is sufficient stated in the articles for believing that it has been sent by Arthur Thistlewood; but that there might be no doubt, the articles will be supported by the affidavit of a person who knows his hand-writing. It is necessary I should state, that some time ago Arthur Thistlewood was in custody in the Tower upon a charge of high treason, and whilst he was in custody, my Lord Sidmouth received a letter from him. That letter therefore he believes to have come from him, and the article states, that it was the same hand-writing as the present. He has also received several other letters, and he verily believes that the letter in question was sent by him, and he verily believes it to be the hand-writing of Arthur Thistlewood. I will read to your Lordship the letter in question; it is addressed to Lord Sidmouth, and it was received on the 3d of February, the day it bears date. It is dated from "40, Stanhope-street, Clare-market." Now many of the letters which his Lordship has received from this person since his discharge bear date from the same place. This letter is in these terms:—

"My Lord,—Having addressed you repeatedly, with a view to procure redress for the injuries I have received from you, as Secretary of State, and my applications receiving no answer, I am compelled to seek redress in another manner. I therefore demand that satisfaction which as an injured man I am entitled to receive at your hands. I leave the choice of sword or pistol to your Lordship, and place. As for time, I shall admit of no delay, and an immediate answer is expected.

"I am, my Lord, &c.

"ARTHUR THISTLEWOOD."

My Lord Sidmouth has felt, and if my opinion be taken, has most justly felt this proceeding a duty which he owes to the high station which he now fills in this country, and he has thought it right to take the steps which he has now taken for the protection of himself from violence; and not only with a consideration towards his own person, but as a duty which he owes to his office, and to all other persons who may have the honour hereafter to be placed in that most important station. I have stated thus much shortly, my Lords, as I have felt it my duty, and I now humbly move that these articles be exhibited, which will be verified by the affidavit I have spoken of.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—Let the articles be read.

Mr. BARLOW then read the document.

ARTICLES OF THE PEACE—exhibited by the Right Hon. Henry Lord Sidmouth, one of his Majesty's Ministers, and Secretary of State for the Home Department, against Arthur Thistlewood, of Stanhope-street, Clare-market. And the said Right Hon. Lord Sidmouth states, that he does not exhibit these articles from any malice or ill will towards the said Arthur Thistlewood, but for the protection of himself from bodily injury. That in the month of April last, the above named Arthur Thistlewood was committed to the Tower of London on a charge of High Treason; and during the time he was in the Tower as aforesaid, he received a letter signed "Arthur Thistlewood," which he verily believed the said Arthur Thistlewood sent to him; and since the said Arthur Thistlewood has been discharged from the Tower, he has received several letters, dated from Stanhope-street, Clare-market, which he believes to be all of the same hand-writing; and that on the 3d day of February he received a certain letter, directed to him at his house at Clifford's place, which was in the same hand-writing as the former letters he had received from the said Arthur Thistlewood, and which he verily believes was sent to this examinant by the said Arthur Thistlewood; which letter is to the tenor and effect following, that is to say, &c. [Here the articles set forth the above letter, read by the Attorney-General.] "And this examinant believes that the said last-mentioned letter conveys a challenge to provoke and excite this examinant to a breach of the peace. This examinant further swears, that he has had no intercourse or communication with the said Arthur Thistlewood, except in his character of one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State; nor does he know any other person of the name of Arthur Thistlewood, except the foresaid Arthur Thistlewood above-mentioned; and this examinant verily believes that the said Arthur Thistlewood meditates and intends to him some great bodily harm; and he is not induced to exhibit these articles from any malice or ill will, but for the preservation of his life or person from violence, which he apprehends from the said Arthur Thistlewood."

Mr. BARLOW (to Lord Sidmouth)—"My Lord, do you pray these articles to be exhibited not from malice or ill-will."

Lord SIDMOUTH—"I do."

Mr. BARLOW—"And for the preservation of your life and person from danger?"

Lord SIDMOUTH—"I do."

Here the affidavit of Rose Butall, Esq. was read, in which he certified that the hand-writing of the letter in question was the hand-writing of Arthur Thistlewood.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Let these articles be filed.

[In consequence of the above proceeding, the tipstiffs of the Court were immediately dispatched to apprehend the defendant.]

APPEAL OF MURDER.

The Court of King's Bench was occupied on Friday and yesterday with the case of Ashford v. Thornton. Mr. CHITTY's argument was very long, dry, and learned; and he urged, in conclusion, that their Lordships were not now trying the cause whether the defendant were or were not guilty, but merely ascertaining whether there was sufficient presumption against him to defeat the trial by battle: whether enough was not stated in the counter-plea to induce their Lordships to resort to the original constitutional mode of trial, instead of following a practice which all must deplore had ever been pursued. If the appellee were innocent, he would go down to his trial in the country with all the advantages of his innocence: if an alibi existed, he might prove it, and no doubt all prejudice, if it existed any where, would be banished from a Court of justice: the probability seemed rather to be, that a Jury on their oaths in a case of life or death, would be disposed to think favourably of an individual placed in the situation of the appellee. On all these grounds he submitted that the replication to the counter-plea was insufficient, and that the appellee ought not to be permitted to wage battle with the appellant, but must submit to the constitutional trial by the country.

Mr. TINDAL argued against the Demurrer, in reply to Mr. CHITTY. His argument contended, that the Appellor ought to take nothing by his writ, and that the Appellee should go sine die.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, on understanding that Mr. CHITTY would occupy more time than on Friday, ordered, that no further proceedings should be had till Thursday, the 16th of April.

Mr. READER moved to admit the Appellee to bail; but the Court, supposing that he had not bail ready, gave him leave to bring the question forward on another day, if he thought fit.

FINANCE.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has sounded his bugle, as Mr. Tierney expresses it, as to the prosperous state of the country. On Wednesday, he asserted that there was a real reduction of the Debt in the last year, amounting to near three millions. I shall show what these sort of assertions are worth, at a time when the accounts are not laid before the public.

It has long been the practice of Ministers, at the commencement of the Session, to make a kind of off-hand statement of this sort, respecting the Finances of the country, in which a great deal more is assumed than is ever proved; it serves, however, to give a tone to many persons who, from various causes, are willing either to be deceived themselves, or to deceive others. To the supporters of Ministers it gives the cue, and points out the course they are expected to follow. Of this kind was the speech of Mr. Vansittart on Wednesday evening. Mr. V. recommended the comparing the results of two following years; this was, he said, a fair way of ascertaining the increase or decrease of the National Debt. I agree with him for once, and adopt his advice. I will also render him another service, by bringing to his recollection some of the assertions made at the commencement of the last Session, and by opposing to them the facts which he himself furnished.

On the first day of the Session, Lord Valletort, who was on that occasion the mouth-piece of Ministers, said "the expenditure in one year had been reduced fifty millions—from one hundred and twenty millions to seventy millions." It is probable that on the day Lord V. made his speech, the annual accounts were made up: when they were printed, instead of the expenditure having been reduced to 70,000,000*l.*, it was there shewn to be 80,186,828*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*

Mr. Ponsonby, in reply, said, "the House had heard the professions of Ministers as to economy last year, and the country could judge how far they were to be credited. They had advised his Royal Highness to tell both Houses of Parliament that the country was in a flourishing condition; but in no one instance had that been proved to be true." The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, he had made sufficient provision for the exigencies of the year; but how was it made up?—

3,000,000*l.* in one account with the Bank.

6,000,000*l.* on another.

5,000,000*l.* surplus of unapplied grants of 1815.

3,000,000*l.* which he assumed as the surplus of the Consolidated Fund."

£17,000,000

"But," said Mr. Ponsonby, "there is no surplus of the Consolidated Fund:" and so in fact it proved; for in the Finance Account the account stands thus:—

Fol. 77. Charge on the Consolidated Fund	£44,251,938 7 10
76. Whole Income of ditto	43,642,116 6 4
Deficiency	£ 609,822 1 6

Thus, instead of a surplus there was a deficiency, making a difference between the assertion of the Minister and the real fact, of no less a sum than 3,609,872*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* on this account only.

Lord Castlereagh, in a speech of his, said the peace establishment would not exceed 19,000,000*l.*, and some of the Members who are not usually led by Ministers were induced to believe the expenditure would not exceed the income by so large a sum as 3,000,000*l.* and this belief was propagated with great industry; yet the accounts shew that no less a sum was borrowed than 19,314,139*l.* The items for this sum are as follow:—

FINANCE ACCOUNT FOR 1816.

Fol. 48. Loans, including
Ireland	£5,939,802
Deduct Loans for
Ireland	2,581,148
Loans for England	£3,358,654 carried forward.
On the 5th Jan. 1817, the "amount of the Unfounded Debt and Demands outstanding,
Fol. 233.	£50,047,088
The same, 5th Jan. 1816,
Fol. 233.	48,725,359
	£ 1,321,729 carried forward.
Loans brought forward	£3,358,654
Increase Unfounded Debt, ditto	1,321,729
Fol. 255. Bank Advance on Bills	6,000,000
Ditto, for increase of their Capital	3,000,000
Fol. 248. Surplus Grants of 1815	5,663,755
Total Sum borrowed in 1816	19,344,138
Given to Sinking Fund Commissioners	13,252,600
	£ 6,091,538

Thus the actual deficiency of Income to meet the Expenditure, instead of being between two and three millions, was not less a sum than 19,344,138*l.* including the Sinking Fund; and if there had been no money so applied, and none borrowed on that account, still there would have been a deficiency of income to meet the expenditure of 6,491,539*l.*

I trust enough has been said to induce our Readers to pause, before they give credit to the assertions of Ministers, until they have the opportunity of comparing them, as I have done.

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer boasted of the improved state of the Finances, he had probably forgotten, that a paper had been "printed by order of the House of Commons, on the 7th of July last, containing an Account of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain, in the years ending 5th July, 1816, and 5th July, 1817."

In the first of these years the Produce was £64,567,533
In the last - - - - - 50,420,367

Difference - £14,147,166

It remains with Mr. Vansittart to shew that reductions in the Expenditure have been made equal to this amount, to make the deficiency no more than it was in 1816; and whatever the reduction of expense may fall short of this sum, must be added the amount of the deficiency of 1816.

The accounts for 1817 shall also be contrasted with those of 1816, as soon as the annual papers on Finance are printed.

DRURY-LANE.

A new piece, called the Bride of Abydos, founded on the poems of Lord Byron, was produced here on Thursday. It is attributed to Mr. DIMOND—which perhaps will give the Reader an idea of it at once. Mr. DIMOND is a gentleman with what is called "a pretty taste," that is to say, a sort of concentrated essence of common-place, perfumed with the customary flowers. The genius of his original, in the present instance, has clocked him into a more solid endeavour; but the only result is, that he is neither one thing nor the other, neither so flowery as before, nor at all able to climb the frowning heights of his poet. We need not detail to our Readers the plot of his Lordship's poem. The drama is made up of the Bride of Abydos and the Corsair, with the addition of a happy ending, and the omission of the best part of the genius. It is a fault, perhaps, of the originals, that they have a tendency to something pantomimic or melo-dramatic in their plots,—something too much of fierce gestures, mysterious desperadoes, clashing swords, and carried-off ladies. The genius of the Noble Poet is not at its best, we think, in his narratives, though for obvious reasons they are the most popular,—but in his reveries, and his heart-breaking songs. There is more real poetry in a few passages of those songs, of the third canto of Childe Harold, and of Manfred, than in all his narratives put together; and we are much mistaken if, in the course of a few years, he does not produce poems that shall beat even these, excellent as they are. His is a mind that must go on "conquering and to conquer."

Still however the new piece is quite worth going to see. A drama founded on his Lordship's poetry cannot be without enough interest to be attractive; and the Managers deserve every credit for the way in which the whole is got up. The scenery is various, abundant, and beautiful; the eastern dresses, elegant and noble in themselves, are of as many different kinds as the story will allow; and the processions are full of variety also, splendid, and even multitudinous. The music is not very new, but it is not unpleasing, especially the ballad of My dying Sire, and the trio at the conclusion. Parts of Mr. KEAN's acting in the hero are, as usual, very fine and genuine, particularly the more passionate bursts and exclamations; and the piece is of a nature to give him an opportunity of exhibiting his powers of attitude and combating, which he does to the great delight of the spectators. A great painter could not have planned some of his postures more nobly. Mr. H. JOHNSTON, as the Pacha, cuts an imposing figure of the proper semi-barbarous cast, splendidly dressed, and physically powerful. When standing opposite to KEAN, and the latter has his coat of mail on, he looks like PORUS encountering ALEXANDER. What is the matter with Mr. HOLLAND's legs in the old Governor? He walks as if on little stilts, or as in his earlier days he had been a slave at the galleys and got his legs cramped with chains and rowing, or as if he were walking for a wager with his knee-pans fastened up. If he means to imitate old age, this rigid procedure on the part of his legs and thighs is the very worst method he can adopt. Old men have bending knees, and shuffling but not stiffly-planted feet. Mrs. MARDYN is the heroine; and though often worth hearing for her delivery as well as voice, and always worth seeing for her beauty, does not appear to such advantage in characters of this nature as in decidedly comic ones. She is not dressed in as good costume as she might be, and is somewhat too coquettish, though we began hardly to think so, when we recollected how the eastern ladies are educated. But Lord BYRON, at all events, certainly did not intend his heroine to carry this faculty any great length, however the English ones may go to an opposite extreme. In the scene where Selim rejects her flower, we could not help thinking of STOTHARD's exquisite picture, which is engraved for one of the editions of his Lordship's poems. The living one was certainly a considerable falling off from that delightful compound of grace, sentiment, and voluptuousness. Mrs. MARDYN made her advances with the flower with too much levity and ostentation of hope, stepping and perking her head about like a peacock. We never saw or heard Mrs. BELCHAMBERS to so much advantage as in the Page. She is a genteel and handsome looking woman, but her voice had hitherto not been consulted in the songs given to her, and it is not at all good when set at the usual female pitch. She has luckily in the present instance got lower tones assigned her; and she does them justice with a voice singularly deep for a woman.

but not at all unfeminine either. It is very placid, mellow, and feeling.

The audience displayed a remarkable enthusiasm at the end of the piece, and insisted upon having KEAN to come forward and give it out for repetition. This idea seems taken from a custom of the French. Perhaps Lord BYRON's name had something to do with it: and if so, it is doubly pleasant as a piece of grateful homage paid to another and higher intellect who has so often delighted them.

[A Tragedy called Fazio, which has been some time in print, was produced the same evening, and to-morrow is the first night of its repetition. We cannot speak of it therefore till next week, when we shall also have another criticism on the Opera.]

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

Genius is an inherent, untaught energy. It may be elicited and improved by study and patronage, but it never can be created by either. It is the rich soil of intellect which nature only can create, but which, like that of the earth that sustains us, must be sedulously cultivated to be efficiently productive. The great pains and labour that are required to render it productive necessarily demand the most operative stimulants, and these are honour and profit. It was these, and principally the first, together with a love for Art, which is a practical ardour to imitate the beautiful and the sublime in nature, that set at work the stately minds of the Artists of Greece and Italy, and brought out the latent and glorious treasures of their souls, treasures "richer than gold, yea, than fine gold, sweeter than honey and the honey-comb,"—the wealth of Art, constituted of coloured and chiseled

"Forms, that we set up as idols in the soul
For love and zealous praise."

For painting the Pæcile, a celebrated portico at Athens, POLYNOTUS, who refused payment for his work, received the solemn thanks of the Amphictyons, and had a residence assigned to him at the public expense in all the cities of Greece. LORENZO DE MEDICI, by the honours and pecuniary rewards he conferred on Artists, and by promoting in every possible way the cultivation of Art, most essentially contributed to the renown of Italy as well as his own. In his own garden he had a school of Art established, which he furnished at very great expense with whatever precious remains of antiquity he could collect. Here MICHAEL ANGELO studied, residing in the palace, and "sitting at the table of the Medici among the most honoured guests, where by a commendable regulation the troublesome distinctions of rank were abolished, and every person took his place in the order of his arrival." He made a suitable provision for M. ANGELO's father. "He raised a bust to the memory of Giotto, the Painter, the inscription of which was supplied by POLITIAN, and ordered a monument of marble to be raised in memory of FILIPPO LIPPI, the inscription of which was also by POLITIAN. He not only allowed competent stipends to the students, but appointed considerable premiums as the rewards of their proficiency." The labours of RAFFAELLE, of TITIAN, of RUBENS, were called forth and rewarded by similar honour and great pecuniary rewards, as were indeed almost all the Artists of distinction since the revival of the Arts.—It is then for all these reasons, and for this kind of patronage, that we have all along regarded with much satisfaction, though with some small exceptions, the attention of the noblemen and gentlemen of the British Institution, to the interests of the Arts, if we may compare small with great things, for this Institution is still in its infancy as to the degree of its patronage. Its means of encouragement are however necessarily encreasing. The countenance of so many individuals of taste and wealth, in conjunction with the annual receipts from the public, must gradually enlarge to a very great extent its means of benefiting those noble Arts that encrease the grandeur, the wealth and power of nations.

1. The Angel Uriel. WM. ALSTON.—This is an Archangel introduced into some pleasing lines from a poetical Vision, called a Visit to the Sun, which describes him as the same

"That once entranced th' immortal Milton saw."—

The same which Satan in his journey from Hell to Earth addressed on his arrival in the sun, and who saw him as

"A glorious Angel stand,
On some great charge employed
He seem'd, or fixed in cogitation deep."

From these lines in MILTON, and from the following in the Vision, the Painter has given not an unsuccessful poetical portrait of the Archangel:

"The gorgeous Form that now upon his throne
Of rocky amber, like some mountain peak
Dark 'gainst a lunar sky, before me rose
In giant majesty!"

Now as this is a subject which mingles the beautiful and the grand with a poetic fervour of feeling, that fixes thought not on the common place or even elegant of what is earthly, upon a nobler species of beings, upon an object unearthly and celestial, even a partial success in painting it demands much praise for the Artist, and this praise we cordially bestow on Mr. ALSTON, whose pictures always have a high and in part at least a successful aim. His is no "vulgar bosom,

But alive to thoughts of honourable fame."

But still we confess that nothing less than the powerful grasp of intellect, the high pictorial attainment of a DA VINCI, a CORRÈGgio, a RAFFAELLE, will prevent us from feeling some disappointment in the representation of subjects of such a high poetical cast. In the St. Cecilia of REYNOLDS, we feel regard for the feminine grace, gentleness, and musical powers of the performer; but in the St. Cecilia of RAFFAELLE, as copied by the tender and pathetic GUTDO, and as seen in the Mews Gallery, we feel a hallowed love, a sacred respect for a being, who, beautiful beyond any that have touched our hearts among living mortals, appears as if her thoughts were raised above earthly things, while she elevates ours by the seraphic eloquence of her look, the rapt composure of her limbs and eyes. Though we are here judging our Artists by the highest standard of genius, it will not, we trust, render us insensible to their beauties, for of merit there are infinite degrees; and as well as those who may not see such hitherto unapproached excellence as we think we do in the productions of former times, we can equally with them admire, in Mr. ALSTON's Uriel, that Form, whose colossal size, and pliant and well-turn'd limbs, indicate the powerful "Regent of the Sun," but which power is agreeably tempered by such a complacency of expression, as shews that the celestial being enjoys the bliss and is conscious of "the approving smile of Heaven," mixed and enlivened with a look that becomes the activity of ken and movement of him, whom MILTON describes as "One of the seven,

Who in God's presence, nearest to his throne,
Stand ready at command, and are his eyes
That run thro' all the Heav'ns, or down to the earth Bear his swift errands."

Not a small part of the beauty of this figure arises from the agreeable balance of vivid light and sober shade, the first displaying the fresh complexion of the Angel, and the fervour of the solar atmosphere; and the latter, by softening down a degree of that fervour, aiding the placid sentiment of the picture. We here, however, think, that there is a little discordance from the change of warm fleshy tints in the lights to too grey a tint in the shadows.—This picture would make a striking print. It is already engraved on our hearts.

SINGULAR DOCUMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The following is a copy of a Document found in the possession of the late Sir Soulden Lawrence, (who was one of his Majesty's Justices of the Court of King's Bench) at the time of his decease; and which is now in my possession; it is in the hand-writing of Mr. BEDINGFIELD, Inspector of Seamen's Wills, &c. the Gentleman who complains in it of being injured, and the initials of whose name are signed at the bottom of it; viz.

"Sic vos non Vobis."

"N. B.—This Act amends a former one, 26 Geo. 3. ch. 63, it includes the Marines, their Attornies, and Executors and Heirs. It invests the Inspector with additional discretionary powers, (pages 617, 623, 633.) It has a retrospective operation (page 620), and the Inspector is required to investigate instruments appearing to have been executed prior to the Acts of Parliament by which his Office is instituted. I carried this Act into execution during seven years, at the same salary as before it was enacted; and ——— being First Lord of the Treasury, received at the rate of 70*l.* per annum for this Service.

"1st May, 1803.

"J. B."

I shewed the Document to JOSEPH BUTTERWORTH, Esq. M.P. who, after inspecting it, advised me not to part with the possession of it to any Member of the House of Commons; but declined to advise me further how to act, except to avoid Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Cochrane, as they were both Jacobins.

Mr. Butterworth subsequently advised me to send the Document to the party accused; but not to take money for it. I however transmitted only a copy of it, that his Lordship might be enabled to call upon Mr. Bedingfield for an explanation.

About two days after this, I addressed George Harrison, Esq. the Law Secretary of the Treasury, regarding it, for the information of their Lordships, and furnished him with a copy of the Document, at the same time acquainting him that I had forwarded a similar copy to the Noble Lord charged by Mr. Bedingfield; but Mr. Harrison having observed the most profound silence to that, as also to a subsequent letter, I drew up a Petition to the House of Commons, detailing the facts, humbly requesting their direction regarding the disposition of the Document, and inclosed it in a letter to Mr. Wilberforce, who, after having kept it a considerable time, and I having written to him twice on the subject, wrote me a note, saying, "That he supposed his former letter to me must have miscarried, wherein he had declined presenting my Petition."

I had an interview with Mr. Brougham; he took my Petition, and having obtained my permission to consult Mr. Tierney on the subject, kept it till nearly the close of the Session of 1816; when he told me that he did not think the mode of bringing it forward by Petition was the way that he should prefer; but that at all events, it was too late in the Session then for to do any thing.

Thus, Mr. Editor, is every avenue shut; neither Saint nor Sinner will intermeddle—And if you shall also think that the matter ought not to be inquired into, I hope you will never attempt again to call the attention of the Public to any thing that wears the appearance of abuse, but let it proceed, till it turns its back upon itself.

If, on the other hand, you, or any of your readers, will point out a way by which I can carry it into the House, I shall feel obliged.—I am, Sir, your most obedient Servant,

J. P. FESSEMEYER.

FORGED BANK NOTES.

It seems to us manifest, from the late great increase in the number of forged Bank Notes, that unless some plan be adopted to render the task of forgery much more difficult than it is at present, the retail dealers, and indeed all persons who are in the frequent habit of receiving payments in notes, will be constantly in a state of suffering; as it is impossible for a common eye to discern the difference between a forged and a genuine Note—so easy is it to imitate the clumsy, ill-invented, and worse executed pieces of paper, now put forth by the Bank of England.

Transportation and hanging without mercy, it seems equally manifest, will not correct the evil, and therefore some other course should at least be tried, if not for humanity's sake, for the sake of the mercantile interests of the nation.

We learn, however, that it is not only possible, but that it is even an easy task, so to fabricate Bank Notes, with the aid of ingenious machinery and skilful engravers, that it would almost amount to an impossibility to imitate them with any chance of success. It is true, that by this plan, several able artists must be constantly employed, which would cost the Bank a few thousands annually more than at present. Here, it seems, is the rub. The Bank is rich and flourishing. Riches, we all know, harden the heart; and while there is a chance of restraining the mischief by rigorous laws, by imprisonings, banishings, and deaths—why it would not be prudent in a monied Company to invade the pecuniary interests of its members, by adopting a plan, however efficacious, which would take a few thousands extra from coffers already filled to overflowing.

Some good people, we find, still express their wonder how it is possible that "respectable gentlemen" can go on sleeping comfortably in their beds, knowing as they do that numberless unhappy wretches are constantly suffering the utmost penalty of the laws, for doing that, which a little trouble and a little expense would render an impossible work. But these worthy souls should by this time have discovered,—what others have long seen,—that public bodies have generally no more feeling than the Portland stone of which their edifices are composed;—that interest, pecuniary interest, is the great lever by which they are moved;—that the claims of generosity and humanity are not among their rules and regulations;—and that if they are at any time to be touched and moved by any thing but interest, it must be by reiterated exposure, and a fear of the consequences of public opinion;—which, after all, is nothing but selfishness.

Parliament, it will be seen by the strange clause below,* has thought fit to interfere in behalf of the Bank—let it therefore now interfere in behalf of the public, and make

* VI. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, from and after the passing of this Act, purchase or receive from any other person or persons any forged or counterfeited Bank Note, Bank Bill of Exchange, Bank Post Bill, or Blank Bank Note, Blank Bank Bill of Exchange, or Blank Bank Post Bill, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeited, or shall knowingly or wittingly have in his, her, or their possession or custody, or in his, her, or their dwelling-house, outhouse, lodgings, or apartments, any forged or counterfeited Bank Note, Bank Bill of Exchange, or Bank Post Bill, or Blank Bank Note, Blank Bank Bill of Exchange, or Blank Bank Post Bill, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeited (without lawful excuse, the proof whereof shall lie upon the person accused) every person or persons so offending, and being thereof convicted according to law, shall be adjudged a felon, and shall be transported for the term of fourteen years.—Act for the Punishment of Forgery, passed July 1805.

the Directors at any rate attempt to improve on their system of Note-making. Let able Artists be called together—let their opinions be obtained—their plans examined—their skill tried—and we will almost venture to affirm, from what we have heard upon the subject, that a mode would be struck out in this way, which would cut up the forging system by the roots, and consequently save the public from heavy losses, destroy the powerful temptation to crime, and thus avoid all those horrid scenes of suffering and death, which are equally hostile to individual happiness and injurious to the national character.

The Bank, we understand, has often been privately addressed on this subject; but it is so occupied, we suppose, in counting its gains, that it has no time for making experiments in favour of humanity and justice. The public voice will alone be listened to; and that must echo loudly in the subterranean vaults and splendid rotundas in Threadneedle-street, before the Directors will be roused from their barbarous apathy.

God knows, we speak thus strongly neither from individual antipathies, nor from alarms for our own private interests. We are not likely to be much perplexed by Bank-notes, either forged or genuine: but we are vexed to see the daily accounts of losses sustained by persons who are ill able to bear them in these days of distress, and are disgusted and shocked at the repeated executions for the offence of forgery;—a crime unquestionably of great magnitude, but which can never merit the last and fearful punishment which justly deprives the murderer of life.

The Bank must now begin to look about them; for, as it will be seen from what follows, they have sustained a signal defeat on the subject of forged Notes, owing to the manly resistance made by Mr. RANSON.

The parties met on Friday, at the Marlborough-street Office,—when

Mr. WESTWOOD said to the Magistrate—"I have to make this declaration, that the Bank, under all the circumstances of the case, have declined to prosecute Mr. Ranson, and I therefore desire, with your permission, that his bail be discharged."

Mr. RANSON—"I don't thank you for your intelligence, Mr. Westwood; but I beg to return thanks to the other Gentlemen present."

MAGISTRATE—"I am sorry for this decision; because I had much rather that the Bank had set the question at rest."

The Bank proceeds, no doubt, on the best legal advice; so it now appears that they have no right to take any Note they may choose to print "forged" upon, from a holder who has obtained it in the usual way. The question naturally arises, by what right do they thus venture to mark "forged" on any Note they please? Are they good and impartial judges? Mr. RANSON of course keeps the Note in dispute; but he has been bullied, threatened, imprisoned, put to expense, and suffered loss of time. Is he to have no remedy? We shall have more to say on this subject.

SUFFERERS UNDER the SUSPENSION ACT.

On Monday a numerous Meeting took place at the Crown and Anchor, to propose a subscription for the relief of those who had been confined under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill. About one o'clock, Sir F. Burdett, accompanied by his brother and Lord Cochrane, entered the room amidst loud cheering.

Sir F. BURDETT having taken the Chair, said, he would not take up their time by entering into the topics connected with the object of the Meeting, as there were no doubt many who were desirous to address them, and particularly such as had suffered by long continuance in prison. He could not but congratulate them and the Public on the Meeting being so numerous. It could not, however, be otherwise, unless Englishmen were dead to all those generous feelings by which they ought to be actuated.

He would now merely beg their attention to whatever might be offered by any Gentleman who was disposed to offer his sentiments. The Resolutions were prepared and would be submitted immediately to their consideration.

Lord COCHRANE said, that upon coming into the Crown and Anchor, various resolutions had been put into his hand, which indicated the object of the Meeting. It was a pleasure to him to see that the spirit of the people was thus awake to the conduct of Government; and that a Meeting so numerous and respectable had been assembled. Had the same spirit prevailed in France under its ancient Government, the despotism which oppressed the people would not have continued so long.—It was lamentable to see, that now, after a war of 20 years duration, after expending the treasures of the country, and loading the people with an intolerable burthen of taxes, under pretence of maintaining the liberties of Europe, they were at last reduced to live under a tyranny, while Frenchmen were comparatively free—(Loud Applause)—even though living under a military Government. That Government was imposed upon them, and supported by England. Oppressive, however, as it might be, even a military despotism was not more ruinous to the liberties of a people, than the suspension of the Habeas Corpus—(Loud cheering)—France, by the aid of British troops, joined to those of the despots of Europe, was kept in a state of degrading subjection. What necessity was there for this? If the French Government was a good one, why did not Frenchmen themselves support it?—(Applause)—In this country, too, they could not walk through a single street without meeting soldiers, at the theatres, at exhibitions, at every place of public business or public amusement? Was this the state in which Englishmen should be placed? How different was the situation of America as represented in the last speech of the President! There the people were completely free from taxes; they had no military establishment, or at least a very small one. Justice was impartially and readily administered in their Courts of Law. They were allowed to be their own protectors, and in place of oppressing them with a large standing army, 100,000 muskets were placed in the hands of the people—(Applause)—No power was exercised in that country but by the people themselves. There a person was in no danger of being oppressed under the forms of law and justice. The iniquities practised in our Courts were not to be met with. Formerly Juries were packed; but, until lately, this packing was not openly avowed—even the Judges on the Bench attempted to justify it. While the list in the Crown Office continued upon the former plan, the names of such persons were selected to serve upon Juries as were known to be disposed to a compliance with Government. The partiality of the Courts to the packing of Juries was notorious. He had himself, in his own case, made various efforts to have justice done him, but all to no purpose—(Applause)—It was this which perhaps induced him to express himself with so much warmth upon a matter of this nature. He hoped the Resolutions to be adopted that day would prove that the people would not be put down by tyranny, but that their spirit would rise in proportion to the despotic efforts that were made against it.—[The Noble Lord then read a string of Resolutions expressive of their disgust at the frequent suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act within the last 24 years; of their admiration of the resistance of Messrs. Evans and Benbow to the demand made to them that they should enter into recognizances before they should be liberated; and of their opinion that a subscription should be entered into for their relief, and that of any others who have suffered under the same Act, and who may be deemed worthy of such aid by the Committee.]—His Lordship trusted the People of England would not be deterred from meeting for the purpose of that Reform, of which they had, by the machinations of Ministers, been hitherto deprived. He hoped they would not petition Parliament in classes of 20 merely, but in bodies of an hundred, tens of hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands. He exhorted them never to cease meeting and demanding a Constitutional Reform, until it was conceded to them.

Mr. WOOLER seconded the resolutions. It was to him a subject of proud gratification, to see so many persons assembled together to celebrate what might aptly be called the signal defeat of Ministers in their last ministerial campaign against the rights and liberties of the people. At this period last year, Ministers were full in arms against the people, ranging their forces in every direction, and attempting to assume such an aspect, as if they thought the Gorgon of Ministerial terrors would frighten every one from the field; or excite the fear, that if any one should have the hardihood to remain, the halter, the gibbet, or some other expedient, would terminate his career. He had no doubt that the language of the Meeting this day would prove that there was a considerable degree of liberty in England.

Sir F. BURDETT stated, that Major Cartwright had not been able to attend; but he had sent his mite to promote the object of the Meeting, accompanied by a letter, which he begged to be read.

Mr. CLEARY read it to the company. The writer began by maintaining, that Parliament had not the power to suspend, at any time, or under any circumstances, the liberties of Englishmen. This assertion he did not make on the fact of the House of Commons not being the fair representation of the People, but on much broader grounds; for although the Parliament might have been ever so well constituted, and although the House of Commons were the true Representatives of the People, still they could have no authority to suspend their liberties for a single moment, because the People were a power greater than their Delegates. A set of inferior Magistrates might as well attempt to suspend the power of the Court of King's Bench; and that Court, in its turn, might as well try to suspend the authority of the Parliament. As no power, then, could suspend a higher power, so that of Parliament could not suspend the rights of the People. The only pretence for doing this was necessity, which was always the tyrant's plea—a necessity which none of the men in power thought fit, or were even able, to explain.—The letter, which was long, contained a variety of other arguments to the same effect; and before it was read through, it was suggested that the letter should be printed. This was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTONE, one of the sufferers under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, addressed the Meeting. He observed, that he had been ten months in confinement, without having committed any act which could justly call for animadversion. He was a married man, and had three children living; he had buried four. He had long advocated the cause of Parliamentary Reform, and therefore thought he knew something of the subject. In October, 1816, he attempted to address a Meeting in Manchester, who were called together to consider of the distressed state of the country. What he said on that occasion happened to please the people; and he was afterwards solicited to go to Lancaster, to Yorkshire, and to Staffordshire, in order to assist at Meetings which were called for similar purposes. He went in pursuance of the invitations, and he spoke boldly his sentiments; for he had no secrets at his heart. On Sunday night, the 9th of March last, he was comfortably in bed asleep, when he was alarmed by a loud knocking at his door. On looking out of his window, he perceived 12 men, whose appearance and behaviour were equally discreditable. They could with difficulty be persuaded to wait until his wife had dressed herself, in order to let them in. They refused to tell what their business was, contenting themselves with vociferating, "open the door!" To please his wife, who became alarmed, he attempted to make his escape. He, however, knew he had no hope of success, but he was willing to give way to the wishes of one who was naturally dear to him. He got upon a wall, and jumped into an adjoining yard, but was immediately seized by three persons, one of whom was the Deputy Constable of Manchester, who behaved in the most ruffianly manner, and exclaimed, "You—tailoring thief, we have got you safe at last." They then ransacked his papers, and took every thing which could, or could not, excite suspicion. He was subsequently conducted to the New Prison, where for two days he was confined under circumstances of great cruelty, being kept upon the gaol allowance of half a small loaf of coarse bread, and a bit of cheese which it was scandalous to offer to any man.—(Cries of shame!)—On the Tuesday following he was taken from the New Prison, in order to be conveyed to London, preparations to which attempts were made to force irons on his legs, on which he wore boots, such as were used with the worst of felons. This effort gave him the greatest pain, and it was with the utmost reluctance time was allowed him to send for shoes. At length he was chained to a fellow sufferer and travelled to London. On his arrival, he was conducted to Coldbath-fields Prison, where he spent his first night in an infirmary, containing eight beds, seven of which were occupied by persons labouring under disease or insanity. Next day, Mr. Adkins, the Governor, gave him comfortable bedding. On the 15th of March he was taken to the Office of the Secretary of State, where he underwent a sort of examination. He then made one request of Lord S., which was, that as he had some friends living in and near London, he might be confined, if he was to be confined, near that place. Lord Sidmouth promised him faithfully his request should be granted: to shew how much his Lordship was to be relied on, however, he had only to state, that on the 10th of April he was again handcuffed to a brother sufferer and carried to Dorechester, from whence, on the 28th of the same month, he was carried in like manner to Exeter Castle.—(Shame, Shame!)—Here Mr. Brown, the gaoler, behaved towards him with the utmost humanity; when he left the gaol, Mr. Brown gave him 12l. to bear his expences home. He then briefly stated the manner in which he was treated in the Court of King's Bench, and informed the company, that finding there appeared to be no further business for him, he sent a letter to the Attorney-General the day after his liberation, directing that worthy Gentleman to the Swan with two Necks, Lad-lane, if he should have any occasion for the presence of the ill-treated Mr. Johnston. Whatever might be the consequence of the line of conduct he (Mr. Johnston) should pursue, he was determined to support with his last breath the cause that had brought him to his dungeon.

Mr. J. BAGULEY informed the Meeting, that he too was one of the sufferers of Manchester. He described the blanketing expedition (as it was called) as a legal Meeting, assembled for no other purpose than that of petitioning the Regent upon the grievances under which the people laboured. But what was the consequence? The military trampled upon those who met together, and after using him with the utmost violence, dragged him to the New Bailey, where 30 lb. weight of iron was put upon him. Upon being brought before the Privy Council, he saw Lord Sidmouth at the head of the table, sitting with the gravity of a Bishop; and was informed by him that he was sorry to commit so young a man, but was obliged to do so for no less a crime than high treason; and on being asked what the evidence consisted of, his Lordship replied, after a pause,—"That is confidential." Nothing more happened at the Privy Council, but the comfortable assurance that he should have solitary confinement. He was conveyed to Horsemonger-lane gaol, where the Governor, who acted with the greatest humanity, reluctantly put upon him the irons, and expressed his deep regret that his orders excluded all friends. From the 16th of March till the 10th of April, he did not pull off his clothes, for the irons rendered so necessary a change impossible.—(Cries of Shame, shame, horrible!)—At this period came a person, accompanied by a Bow-street runner, who told him he must go to the country.—The irons were then taken off, and he (Mr. Baguley), felt as if he was in a balloon; but in the midst of this delightful sensation, the execrable runner caught him by the wrists, and told him the handcuffs must go to work. This was, with horror, refused by the speaker, who, however, was bound by his leg to another, and thus sent off to Gloucester gaol, where he was treated in the most inhuman manner by the keeper, and compelled to dip in a tub of cold water, from which an illness proceeded, which confined him to the hospital, where he was still refused a visit from a human being. Lord Sidmouth afterwards thought that it would be necessary that he should be brought before the Court of King's Bench, and he (Mr. B.) came to town purposely to demand that his recognizance should be nullified. They all (as might have been heard) came to the Court of King's Bench, and went there day after day, without getting any satisfaction, until they began to clamour.—(Applause)—He was fearful that a similar clamour must be resorted to in the House of Commons, before a redress of those grievances under which the public groaned would be obtained. One circumstance, however, he thought it necessary to advert to before he got down, which was a letter which had been sent to his father by Lord Sidmouth since his enlargement, begging him to use his parental and correctional influence over his son.—(Laughter and applause)—Mr. B. then proceeded to state, that after his father had written to Lord Sidmouth, praying that he (Mr. B.) might be permitted to see his mother, who was on the point of death, Lord Sidmouth caused the following answer to be sent:—"I am directed by Lord Sidmouth to acknowledge the receipt of your letter respecting your son; and I am further directed to inform you, that Lord Sidmouth had previously ordered a warrant for your son's liberation. Lord Sidmouth is happy you are sensible of your son's error, and hopes that you and your wife will in future use such paternal and correctional influence over his conduct as will render him a loyal and good subject."

Thus after nine months' incarceration, Lord Sidmouth consented to his discharge, provided his father would stop his mouth.—(Laughter and applause)—Just so would his Majesty's Ministers stop the mouths of the people if they could; and should these means be found insufficient, they would then resort to the green bag information. He concluded by observing, that with regard to Reform, his Majesty's Ministers had, by their proceedings, made the people of Manchester ten thousand times more anxious than they were before.

Mr. GALE JONES said, his principal object in rising was to propose that a word inserted in one of the Resolutions might be left out, for the purpose of substituting another. It was proposed to the Meeting, in one of the Resolutions, to declare that they viewed with alarm the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. He would not consent to a declaration that they could view with alarm any measure that could be adopted by so feeble an Administration as the present—(Great applause)—He should wish, therefore, that the word alarm might be struck out, for the purpose of inserting, that they viewed with indignation such a measure. He concluded by moving a Resolution to the following effect:—"That the subjecting Mr. Evans and his son, together with others, to irons, three days and three nights, was a gross violation of the law of the land, an outrage of humanity, an insult to the whole people of England, derogatory from the character of Englishmen, and inconsistent with the principles of the British Constitution."

Mr. J. MITCHELL, of Liverpool, seconded the Resolution, and proceeded to give a detail of his sufferings while in confinement. He then stated the circumstance of his having got into company, while in London, with a notorious fellow, who pretended to be a friend to liberty. This fellow was Oliver; and this man he introduced into different parts of the country, supposing him to have been equally friendly to the cause of freedom with himself. He solemnly declared, that neither he, nor the friends with whom he acted, had ever contemplated any act of treason, nor had any other object in view than that of obtaining a Reform in Parliament by legal and constitutional means. He assured the Meeting, that although he had suffered the greatest hardships by an imprisonment of six months, and by being reduced to beggary, he was still as hearty in the cause as ever.

Mr. WM. CLIFF, from Derby, said, a person came to his shop, and asked him to go and meet a Delegate from London: he was induced to go, because the man was represented as coming from Lord Cochrane and others. He went and saw the man at an inn—the man was Oliver! They entered into conversation: in the course of which Oliver said, it was of no use to petition for a Parliamentary Reform; and that the people of the country were ready to rise up, and obtain the Reform by force. He (Mr. C.) threw cold water on all that this fellow said, and told him his plan would not do. Oliver insisted it was the only to obtain it; and said the people of Derby ought to rise up. Some days after this, a Messenger and two Constables broke into his house, and said that Lord Sidmouth wished to speak to him, and must see him in London. He was then taken to the county gaol, loaded with irons, and soon after put into a carriage with another man, in order to be conveyed to London. They were both chained together, even while in bed. At last he arrived in London, and was brought before Lord Sidmouth, whom he defied to bring any charge against him. Lord Sidmouth replied, that he had evidence from a most respectable source, that he had committed acts of treason. He was then sent to Coldbath-fields Prison, where he remained a few days; he was afterwards sent to Gloucester Gaol, where he was thrown into the cell of a condemned murderer. Here his clothes were always damp, and he endured the greatest hardships. While he underwent these sufferings, his trade, by which he had maintained his family respectably, was entirely broke up, and his wife and children had been since living on a miserable pittance from the parish.—(This address produced a strong sensation among the company.)

A Committee was then appointed, and a list of the subscriptions read by the Secretary, Mr. Cleary; amongst those were, Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Cochrane, for 100 guineas each.

The thanks were voted to Lord Cochrane. In his address of acknowledgment, his Lordship declared that he unequivocally approved of the conduct of his Honourable Colleague, Sir F. Burdett; that he should constantly imitate the same, and tread in his steps. The company gave three cheers and dispersed.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

RECOGNIZANCES.—STATE PRISONERS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL argued against the rule obtained against Sir N. Conant, calling him to show cause why the recognizance entered into by Mr. Joseph Mitchell should not be discharged, on the ground that he had not actually entered into such recognizance.

Evidence was adduced, which proved that Mr. Mitchell had verbally entered into such recognizance; and Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, Mr. Mitchell appeared to have laboured under a mistake, in supposing that it was necessary, to render the recognizance legal, that he should have signed it. Such, however, was not necessary; the verbal assent he had given was sufficient: under these circumstances there were no grounds for the rule against Sir N. Conant.

The rule was ordered to be discharged.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the legal question being now disposed of, he was prepared to move, on the part of his Majesty's Government, that the recognizances of all these persons should be discharged.—The Learned Counsel then read over a list of upwards of forty names, amongst whom was Mitchell, and moved the Court that the recognizances into which all these people had entered should be discharged.—The Court ordered they should accordingly be discharged.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Thursday, Mr. T. Gill, an optician, and a man calling himself Capt. B. Henry, were charged with conspiring to defraud a great number of opticians and others. Mr. Dolland, of St. Paul's Church-yard, stated, that Henry came on the 19th of December to his shop, and stating himself to be a sea Captain, gave an order for eight of Sikes's hydrometers and two others, amounting to about 60*l.*; and gave particular directions that they should be manufactured by Gill, the other defendant. He stated, that he resided at Hoxton, and left a sum of money as a deposit. Witness gave the order to Gill, by whom it was executed, and the instruments were brought home on the Friday following; when he requested, having been ill for some time, immediate payment, which amounted to 38*l.* The witness instantly gave him a cheque for the amount. He heard no more of the Captain till the 5th ult. when he received a letter, stating, that in consequence of a domestic calamity, he had been prevented calling, but would come shortly; at the same time requesting that Mr. Dolland would give Gill an order to manufacture 15 more of the same kind of instruments. The witness, however, having a suspicion that something was wrong, the order was never executed, nor did the Captain call for the others, which were thus thrown upon his hands. Mr. Harris, of Holborn; Mr. Webb, of Tottenham-court-road; Mr. Banks, Mr. Bate, and several others of the profession, were in attendance, ready to prefer similar charges, but to a much greater amount.—The defendant Gill declared, that until ten days ago Henry was a total stranger to him. However, T. Watson, porter to Mr. Dolland, swore, that he saw them drinking together in a public-house for upwards of an hour, on the very day that Henry made his first application to Mr. Dolland.—The Lord Mayor ordered the defendants to find two sureties, each in 50*l.* and give their own recognizances of 100*l.* for their appearance at the next Old Bailey Sessions.

GUILDHALL.

W. H. Wilkes was brought up for re-examination, on a charge of uttering a forged Bank-note.—Mr. Westwood stated, that it was not the intention of the Bank to prosecute the case any further.—Alderman ATKINS observed, that he did not understand the principle on which the Bank acted in thus interfering and dictating who should be prosecuted, and who should not.—Mr. Westwood said, it was an interference sanctioned by the Judges. Alderman ATKINS—That may be; still it is no rule for me; let the prisoner be remanded, and let the original evidence be ordered to attend.

HATTON-GARDEN.

On Wednesday, J. Dawson was charged with an assault, of a very indelicate nature, on the person of Miss Harrold, 11 years of age. Mr. Harrold stated, that on Sunday night as he, Mrs. H. and his daughter, were walking in Gray's-Inn-lane, his daughter ran on before them; and shortly after he was alarmed at her screams. He immediately ran forward and found her surrounded by three ruffians, who were taking very indecent liberties with her; two of the villains effected their escape, but he secured the prisoner, who was taken to the watch-house, where there was charge given of him. The complainant confirmed her father's statement; and the charge being proved, the prisoner, for want of bail, was committed.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Ellen Putman, wife of a tradesman in Queen-street, Edge-ware-road, charged J. Barrows, a master shoemaker in Old Cavendish-street, with assaulting her. The prosecutrix stated, that she was passing down Oxford-street a few evenings since, when the defendant pressed her with his importunities; and at length began to use language too obscene to state, accompanied with an assault of the most impudent kind. Mrs. Patman flew from the defendant's grasp into a chemist's shop, and the alarm had occasioned her several days illness.—The defendant was ordered to find bail.

UNION-HALL.

On Thursday, — Collins, an Irishman, was charged as an impostor. Birch, the Beadle of Christ Church, Blackfriars, stated, that the prisoner applied to him for leave to sit up in the watchhouse, and also for a morsel of bread, as he had not eaten any thing for two days, and was destitute of the means of getting a lodging. His requests were granted; but the Beadle observing something bulky in his waistcoat pocket, which the prisoner seemed desirous of hiding, insisted on searching him; when he found on him money to the amount of 5*l.* 7*s.* In defence, he said, he had acquired it by honest begging; and the Magistrate sent him to the House of Correction for a month, to be employed in honest labour.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Another act of culpable homicide, if not of actual murder, is supposed to have taken place at Deighton, on the night of Saturday week. In the course of that Day, John Blackburn, alias John Marsden, a notorious character, had been apprehended by Mr. Tiffney, the Constable, on a charge of robbery, and lodged in a room at an inn. The place of confinement, it seems, was not very secure, for Blackburn taking advantage of the Constable's absence, escaped out of the window. At midnight the Constable repaired to the house of the offender, and after a fruitless search, he was about to depart, when he discovered a communication between the chamber of Blackburn's house and an adjoining hay-loft. At this opening he entered, and what then occurred we are incapable of stating, but on the following morning the Constable was stretched on the barn floor a lifeless corpse! The Police-office has offered a reward for the apprehension of Blackburn, who has absconded; and from circumstances that have transpired, it is conjectured that one of his arms was either broken or dislocated, in the rencounter which terminated in the Constable's death.—Nottingham Review.

On Wednesday, an Inquest was held in St. Giles's, on the body of C. Mahoney, aged 36.—P. Pori, a shoe-maker, in High-street, said, the deceased was employed by him to clean his shop-window; and, just as he had begun, witness was told he had fallen from the steps. He was brought into the shop, and two medical men attended, who attempted to bleed him, but in vain. He understood he had been out of employ a considerable time, and was in a very impoverished state, having a wife just recovered from her lying-in, and five children; and it was his opinion that he died from want!—The Jury were informed by the Beadle that the Surgeon refused to attend unless paid for his trouble.—One of the Jurymen contended that he had a right to attend; but the Coroner (Mr. Sterling) said he had no doubt the cause of the death was the rupture of a blood-vessel; and if that was the opinion of the Jury, he would record it as their verdict. In this opinion the Jury concurred.—Died by the Visitation of God.

Another Inquest was held in Brown-street, Edgware-road, on the body of Mrs. Jenkins, aged 30, who, while speaking to an acquaintance, apparently in perfect health, fell down in a fit of apoplexy, and expired immediately. Verdict—Died by the Visitation of God.—A Surgeon stated to the Jury that this was the fourth case of apoplexy he had attended in the last two days.

Monday an Inquest was held at the Sun, in Chapel-street, Grosvenor-place, on the body of Mrs. Benfield, who was found in her apartment on Sunday evening, with her throat cut, and two bloody razors lying near her. The deceased's husband is cook to Lord Craven, and is at present with his Lordship at Rome. It was proved in evidence, that for some years past she had evinced great dejection of spirits, which had much increased since the absence of her husband. In consequence of which the Jury returned a verdict of—Insanity.

On Thursday an Inquest was held in Fashion-street, Spital-fields, on the body of Miss Simmons, 21 years of age, daughter of Mr. Simmons, of Rose-street. This young Lady, after a courtship of near five years, was to have been married to the object of her choice on Monday. The company were assembled, the Priest and bridegroom were in the house, and a sumptuous dinner provided for their entertainment, when she retired to her apartment; but remaining too long, her sister went up stairs to call her, and found her lying on the bed, in a state of insensibility; on which she gave an alarm, and the family came up stairs, when on the table was found a cup of coffee, and another cup empty, which had contained some oil of vitriol. Assistance was instantly sent for, and a Surgeon and Physician gave an emetic, which revived her. On questioning her, she said she had taken some vitriol, being weary of her life; and she had something very heavy on her mind. She died in 24 hours afterwards. It was proved that insanity reigned on the mother's side of the family. Verdict—Lunacy.

On Thursday an Inquest was held in Leather-lane, on the body of T. Forcand, late coachman to Mr. Meux, who suspended himself in a stable near that place. The deceased had been sickly and out of employ for some time past, and it is supposed distress had occasioned derangement of mind. Verdict—Insanity.

On Wednesday morning the dead body of — Fleetwood was found hanging in a stable in Fetter-lane. He had been in good circumstances; but was to have been removed that morning to the Workhouse, which was supposed to be the cause of the rash act.

On Wednesday a great alarm of fire was produced by a chimney at Mr. Toxey's, a sawyer, in the north-east corner of White's-alley, Chancery-lane. The chimney was so foul, that for more than half an hour such a vast body of smoke spread in every direction, that it was difficult to find from what house it issued. This notice is given to caution all persons to take care to keep their chimnies properly cleansed; for, independent of the mischief occasioned, it adds an expence of 9*l.* for the attendant engines, and which is not borne by an Insurance Office, being settled, by an Act of Parliament, upon the occupier of the apartment from whence the fire originated.

David Milne, Esq. an eminent insurance-broker, was at Lloyd's on Thursday, transacting his business, in perfect health and spirits; at five o'clock he went to the Albion Tavern, where he dined with a party. Not coming home all night, the greatest anxiety was experienced by his family, and messengers were dispatched in all directions. Information was on Friday received of the body being taken out of the river at Dockhead.

Thursday afternoon, Mrs. Violetta Parker, a lady occupying a house in Bryan-street, Shoreditch, was found hanging to the bannisters by a rope; she was cut down whilst warm, but was quite dead.

MARRIAGES.

Feb. 2, Capt. Chas. Jones, of the 15th Hussars, to Charlotte Matilda, only daughter of the late Alex. Annesley, Esq. of Hyde Hall, Hertfordshire.

Feb. 3, Wm. Bennett Rich, Esq. of Bermondsey, to Sarah, youngest daughter of the late Hen. Cobb, Esq. of Town-place, Kent.

DEATHS.

Feb. 1, the Right Hon. John Fitzpatrick, Earl of Upper Ossory. His Lordship was born May 7, 1745, and succeeded his father, the late Earl, in 1758, and married, in 1769, the Duchess of Grafton, by whom (who died in 1804) he had issue two daughters, Anne and Gertrude.—His Lordship had two sisters, one the mother of the present Marquis of Lansdown; the other, the mother of the present Lord Holland.—There being no issue male living of his father or of himself, the title is, we believe, extinct. His Lordship was Lord Lieutenant of Bedfordshire, Keeper of Waltham Forest, in Lincolnshire, and of Rockingham Forest, Northants.

Feb. 1, Mr. John Pearkes, one of the Officers of the Public Office, Bow-street.

Feb. 2, Mr. John Grindle, chemist, of Pall-mall.

On Sunday week, aged 41 years, of the cramp in his stomach, the Rev. Thomas Pickersgill, of Bishopton Grove, near Ripon; having retired to rest, in less than two hours afterwards he was a corpse.

On Monday week, at an advanced age, Mr. Wm. Sharp, of Keighley. This man, by a parsimony exceeding either an Elwes or a Damer, amassed an immense property, which he held fast till his death.

ON THE INTELLECTUAL INFERIORITY OF PARLIAMENT TO THE DEMANDS OF THE AGE.—MOTION FOR AN ENQUIRY ABOUT THE SPIES.

We have spoken of the more scholarly part of the retainers of corruption, whose books would have taught them better, had their teachers given them better habits. We wish to observe however, that in the remark we made on this subject we meant to confine it, as we actually did, to the earlier places of education, and not to the universities. There are many political objections, it is true, to the system pursued at the latter;* but it is not liable to the same great and elementary objections as the former, especially when we consider how many university-men are not brought up in the schools alluded to. Many young men, who know nothing of their alternate slavery and tyranny, are sent to Cambridge and Oxford from more private schools, or from foundations of a truly manlier character; many come from educations entirely private; and some from little or no education, out of a voluntary impulse towards knowledge. We have had a variety of great men from the Universities, but very few of them came from the more fashionable schools: and of those who have come, we suspect that a remarkable circumstance will almost invariably be found true; and that is, that their character and opinions have been materially modified by an antipathy against what they had experienced, rather than a love for it.

A less informed part of the ministerial majorities is composed of money-getters, whether they are called the trading interest, or fund-holders, or what not. The ministerial system could no more go on without these persons than without the boroughmongers; and one day or other, not far distant, they will most likely be the death of it, not without terrible scars on their own side;—but this is not the subject of our present paper. These gentlemen, with very few exceptions indeed, are as profoundly ignorant as they well can be. They know nothing out of the pale of their own sordid desires. They put on guineas for spectacles, and can see nothing else. They live in a murky and yellow atmosphere, which makes the petty objects about them appear great; and see nothing beyond it, however grand, or vital, or even alarming. A wide policy, a distant but certain danger, an extended view of any thing, is to them as shut out from sight, as the hills of Surrey from Lombard-street. They seldom speak in the House even on their own subjects, so little knowledge have they of the smallest accomplishments, or so little necessity to say any thing which the Minister is not well assured of beforehand. This is the consequence of that fatal ascendancy of mere riches, between which and ignorance a perpetual reaction takes place. One produces the other, and is reproduced by it in turn. The true mercantile spirit,—that which made the LORENZO DE MEDICIS of old, the gallant discoveries of a subsequent period, and a few independent men of wealth in later times, whose connection with remote and unfamiliar countries gave a tinge of something romantic to their speculations,—can exist only at intervals of that nature,—at periods when it grows young again. When mere plodding begins, it is gone; and then comes an alarming time for a nation which has begun to be corrupted by a bribing Government,—we mean the time, when the most powerful facilities are laid open to every coarse hand; and any body can obtain influence and a silent share in that Government by one single unintellectual talent,—that of physical application. It is the same with this class of persons as with the former;—the truly generous spirits who get in it by chance are quick in despising its habits, and grow fond of theories which seem to threaten their own interest. They may say as the Jailor does in Cymbeline;—"I speak against my present profit; but my wish hath a preferment in it." However, there are few such in Parliament. The money-getters go there as they go elsewhere, purely to get money or the influence connected with money; and a most wretched figure they cut,—seldom daring to utter a word, blundering when they do, and contemptible always.

The mere clerks in office are another class of the corrupt majority, including however some of each of those just mentioned. Most of them are adventurers, of the true description; that is to say, persons, whose sole object is to get on, as the phrase is, in the world,—ready to work for their hire's sake, and to speak as well as act just as they are ordered. They are getters of any thing, as contrasted with the mere money-getters; and their diversity of object is favourable to them in one respect, inasmuch as they have a few more ideas in their head, and are obliged to be a little readier with their wits. The late Mr. ROSE, and the living CROKER, are good specimens of the two chief varieties of this species, the dull and the pert,—each occasionally making incursions into the others' territory. ROSE (whom we mention as well as the other, because every body knows him) was the ultimatum of a plodder,—the very Deity of Tare and Tret. He was prudent, indefatigable, cold blooded from a half experience, with a conscience as elastic as his purse, carrying off matters nevertheless to other people, and doubtless in great measure to himself, by a certain air of plainness and good intention, and finally, extremely fond of the sense of power for its own sake,—an appetite foolishly attributed to genius exclusively, but in fact not belonging to the very highest, nor ever so strongly possessed as by instinctive imbecility. Weakness loves a sense of power, as bad nerves love drams. ROSE contented himself with getting on, and saying Aye and No, while his old masters were alive; but when Mr. PITT's young clerks got into office, and took the lead of him by dint of not being quite such plodders as himself, he mustered up a little courage and began to have some opinions, always falling in however with the powers that were. His old age too relaxed his dullness a little; and he "vowed to Gon" with so much vivacity, that the persons whom he undertook to speak for trembled both for him and themselves. On the other hand, CROKER does not wait for old age to render him confident. He would be as busy or at least as humming as a bee, if his employers or something else would let him; and perks himself as forward as much as he can in the Courier and the Quarterly, if not in the House. He began with voluntarily turning spy on Mrs. CLARKE, after she had quarrelled with the Duke of York; and has ended, for the present, with having grave letters addressed to him from the most manly and above-board set of men in the world,—the British naval officers. He also urged his wish to keep his war-salary in time of peace, at a time when numbers of those officers were thrown out of employment, and the widows of others were lifting up their feeble hands for a little more help. Such are the freaks, tastes, and pretensions of this class of government retainers. Mr. CANNING would be numbered among them, and indeed richly deserves it for some things, especially for his strange taste in taunting people with the origin of their ancestors; but it must be acknowledged, that he has talents which give him some just pretensions to publicity, though not sufficient to render him impatient of serving his present dull masters. CROKER to CANNING is what a shrewd footman is to a shrewder butler, who surpasses all the rest of the mansion.

By the way, since noticing in our last the apparent neutralization of Mr. CANNING's wit by the prevailing dullness of his more powerful friends, he has issued forth again, and made one of the best displays of himself we ever remember. (For the report at length, the reader must consult the Courier.) Look at the reasoning part of it however; and see to what sorry sophistications he is reduced. The stratagem, upon which his speech manoeuvred, is curious and worth the public attention. Mr. FAZAKERLY (a gentleman, we believe, of taste and spirit, whom we are glad to see coming forward out of the better class of the silent) made a motion, the object of which was to instruct the Committee of Secrecy to inquire into the conduct of OLIVER and the other spies. Now the Committee of Secrecy had been justly ridiculed and denounced by the Opposition, as a set of self-nominated persons interested in quashing or misrepresenting the very inquiries they pretended to institute; and this, which is a truth notorious to the whole country, Mr. CANNING took occasion to thrust in the teeth of the mover as a piece of reaction against his proposal; asking, with what face the gentlemen of the other side could propose to submit so vital a matter to a Committee of so deadly a nature. The question seems but just, and the result was—as it would have been under any circumstances; the Ministers got their majority. But the fact is, that although Mr. CANNING pretended, and enabled the majority to pretend, that the tables were turned upon the mover solely because the Opposition had convicted themselves of an accusation which they did not feel to be just, or rather of a mere inconsistency, he and the others knew very well, that the motion was in reality absurd, not because the Secret Committee had been so characterized by the Opposition, but because they had been rightly characterized. It was the very consciousness of the hollowness of the Committee which enabled it's own friends to pretend, that the Opposition had been discomfited for falsely accusing it!—Such are the strange freaks of a state of things so sophisticated.

Mr. FAZAKERLY was overmatched in cunning. He was complimented too—(we were going to say however, but we changed the word instinctively)—he was complimented, in the midst of a quantity of sarcasm, on his talent and independence, and on his ingenuousness. Ingenuousness is a noble thing, and the mark of something much wiser than cunning; and we hope to see that Mr. FAZAKERLY has not been dashed back into silence by the sarcasms, or bowed, and smiled, and frightened back by the compliment,—by the good opinion.

But see the upper hand which corruption first gets, which folly gravely upholds, and face carries through. The Opposition denounce the Committee seriously,—and then it is a very shocking accusation, and the Ministers hum and haw and look big:—but a Member not accustomed to make motions, suddenly takes the advocates of the Committee at their word, and proposes to lay some grave matters before it; and then up starts the gayest of it's friends, and says "What, bring honest and grave matters before so shocking a Committee!" and all the dull rogues laugh, and the resistance is effected either way.

This comes of the flattering Yea-and-Nay habits to which a bad state of things has habituated all classes in the House. It is high time for the really honest part of its Members to forego the habits of their respective parties, and speak out; for let Mr. CANNING talk as he will about ROBESPIERRE and such stuff, and endeavour to revive the Anti-Jacobin enthusiasm as well as joking, the time is gone by; and the Country is not much longer to be trifled with, whatever the House may be.

[To be concluded in our next.]

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 9.

MANCHESTER PETITION.

Lord HOLLAND said, he had to apologise to the House, and to the Gentlemen who had entrusted to him a Petition which he ought to have presented; but by some accident it could not be found. It was a Petition of very great importance, signed by several very respectable persons of Manchester. He had not read the Petition carefully; but he could state the object of it, from a similar one, to be presented in another place, which the Gentleman to whom it had been entrusted was so good as to let him see. The Petition contained many very strong representations of facts, which went to prove that there was little or no disturbance in those parts of the country which had been represented as in a state of insurrection; and that where any disturbance did break out, it was fomented by the hired agents of Government, who, when apprehended, were constantly discharged by the Magistrates. The Petition was therefore one of the highest importance; and he trusted that the Report of the Committee on the State of the Country would not be brought up before a new Petition could be presented.—Adjourned.

[There was nothing of moment before this House during the rest of the week.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 9.

CLIMBING BOYS.

Mr. BENNET moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent the further use of climbing boys. The evils and cruelty of this system were well established; it was indeed nothing else but a slave trade established in this country. The children usually employed in this trade, were of the most delicate constitution, frequently not more than four or five years old; it was necessary they should be of this age only, and of small stature, since the generality of chimneys in the country were not more than eight inches square. It was with feelings of great satisfaction that he had to state, that in the course of the last year the practice of employing climbing boys had materially decreased. Notwithstanding which, no less than five fatal accidents had occurred since the subject was last before the House. He trusted the House would be of opinion with him, that this was a system which ought no longer to be allowed to exist.—Leave given.—The Bill was afterwards brought in, read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on Friday.

MANCHESTER PETITION—GOVERNMENT SPIES.

Mr. PHILLIPS presented a Petition from certain individuals residing in Manchester and its neighbourhood, complaining of the proceedings which had taken place respecting the blanketeers, and the meetings of the 10th of March last. The Hon. Member here entered at length into a detail of the circumstances attending that Meeting, which, he believed, was only to present their Petition to Parliament. He had heard that some of the leaders, as they were called, on this occasion, were sensible of the folly of the proposed expedition of these miserable wretches, and remonstrated with them: one of them observed, that if they should determine on their expedition to London, they must determine on one of two things; either to be turned back on the road, or to cut their way through the opposition they would meet. To this they replied, their intention was innocent—they should go on their way quietly, and that all they wished to do, was to go to London, throw themselves at the Prince Regent's feet, and intreat from him a redress of grievances. This was their object. The meeting of the 10th of March did, however, take place; the military were called in, and facts already well known followed. The Hon. Member then proceeded to state his opinion, that this meeting, and all the other meetings which took place, were the work of three persons, who were nothing less than spies. One of these was a person named Lomar: this man had insinuated himself into the confidence of several of these deluded people, and pretended that he was connected with a Secret Committee. On the 10th of March, he called on a person named Akers, and told him he was going to the place where the Secret Committee were sitting, and would take him with him. He accordingly went to a house, where Lomar desired Akers would wait, whilst he went into the room where the Secret Committee were sitting. Akers waited some time, and becoming weary of waiting, he determined to enter the Committee-room: here he found indeed that it was a Secret Committee, for no one was present except Lomar himself! This same man, Lomar, afterwards went to several other persons, and told them of pretended meetings, and intentions of setting fire to all the factories in Manchester, and of general risings in Manchester, London, and other places, thus irritating and agitating the public mind.—He continued these practices till the 28th of May, when he was apprehended and sent to prison. But would the House believe him, when he stated that this man was liberated the next day? The second man he had to allude to, was a man named Dewhurst, who adopted the same course as Lomar had done, going about from place to place, endeavouring to impress on the minds of the lower orders, that a plot did exist. This man, in the course of conversation with a poor man named Hulton, after talking of the strength of the party, said he knew where he could get one thousand guineas, and he also knew an old woman who lived alone, and had plenty of plate: he wished he had the guineas, and plate melted down, and that would serve to set them going. Hulton expressed his horror at such a proposition, when Dewhurst said, he was only in joke. Another man, of the same description and character was Waddington, who had been most active in persuading the people to attend public meetings; and on one occasion, when Hulton said he was tired of attending meetings, and would attend no more, Dewhurst gave him a shilling to go to the meeting of the 28th. Thus, continued the Hon. Member, when these poor people became tired of attending these meetings, the Spies went about urging, and even bribing them to attend them. He had abundance of other facts, but he did not think it was necessary to trouble the House with them. He thought thus much appeared, from what he had stated, namely, that with all the exertions used by these Spies, a meeting could not be got together of more than eleven persons. On the 28th of March, these eleven persons were apprehended, and on the 29th, the Magistrates published their letter, stating that they had received information of a most diabolical plot, which was to have taken place on the 30th. On that day the military were parading Manchester, though that town, and all others, were in a state as tranquil as ever they had been at any period. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Hay, (the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions), stated that the conspiracy had existed, and declared he did not believe any person could conscientiously doubt it. Did the conspiracy exist, and were these persons guilty? If so, how was it that they should all have been liberated without trial? If they were guilty, they ought not to have been liberated without trial, to do still further mischief. If Government had been deceived by the information they had received, then enquiry ought to be instituted to set the public mind at rest.

The Petition was then read; it was signed by several inhabitants of Manchester and its neighbourhood, and prayed that enquiry might be instituted. The Petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

TREATY WITH SPAIN.

Lord CASTLEREAGH moved the Order of the Day for a Committee to consider the Treaties entered into with Spain, for the abolition of the Slave Trade. The Noble Lord congratulated the House and the country on the progress which had been made in obtaining the great object—the abolition of this traffic, within the last few years; and especially on the great stride which had been made towards the object last year. Now there was not a single nation, with the exception of Portugal, which had not given up that branch of trade; and Portugal only retained it south of the line. Until the present Treaty was entered into it was impossible the trade could be put an end to, since, through Spain, all other nations North of the Equator were supplied. Now that Spain had been induced to consent to this Treaty, the foundation was laid for doing away the trade altogether, since from the date at which this Treaty was to take place, namely, May, 1820, no Slave Trade could exist North of the Line, on any pretence whatever; and after that period, all which this country would have to do, would be to attend to the trade as carried on by Portugal South of the Line. The Sovereigns at the Congress of Vienna had done every thing in their power to put an end totally to this horrid traffic; but they had not entirely succeeded. It would be vain to attempt to conceal that there had been, up to this time, an illicit Slave Trade carrying on on the Coast of Africa, and, perhaps, with greater instances of cruelty, though not to such an extent, as formerly: with more cruelty, because the vessels engaged in it, from the nature of their traffic, were formed rather for resistance or flight, than for the comfort and convenience of the unfortunate wretches on board of them. He, however, was convinced, that this illicit trade was not carried on with the sanction of any of the Governments of Europe, but the contrary. France, in particular, had exerted herself to prevent it, and called on us for our aid and assistance. It was not now, however, as in time of war, in our power to prevent the trade to so great an extent, because in time of war we had a large extent of dominion under our controul. Our interference, or that of other Powers, effectually to put an end to this traffic, must be bottomed on a mutual confidence, and a consent that each should have the power of exerting her endeavours to attain that object. Whilst any flag was to be considered as a protection, the trade would still exist. To attain the end in view as far as possible, in the present Treaty it was agreed, that under certain regulations the ships of war of each Power should have the power of searching merchant vessels, and to detain them where they were found contravening the law. But to prevent vexatious detentions, it was provided that no ship should be subject to detention, unless slaves were absolutely found on board. In making this arrangement, we did not concede too much; since, he was sorry to say, that a very great portion of the illicit traffic at present going on, under whatever flag it might be carried, was, in fact, British. And if the law of abolition was important, the regulation of prevention was, he was persuaded, equally or even more so. Another object of this Treaty was, as far as possible, to prevent any disputes or unpleasant circumstances arising from the detention of the vessels of any Power by us, or our vessels by any other Power: and to obtain that object, the establishment of a mixed tribunal in each country had been agreed on, before which the cases of detention would come for decision. With respect to the pecuniary provisions of this Treaty, he was prepared to contend, that the Spanish Government had now consented to the abolition on terms far more advantageous than those which had been offered on former occasions, where the terms were to have been a bonus of 850,000*l.* and a loan of 10,000,000 of dollars, and this offer was made under the sanction of Parliament. This was a millstone about the neck of our Government in the late negotiation, and it was with difficulty that the Spanish Government was brought to accede to any terms short of the offer we had before made her. With respect to any difference of opinion, if any should arise, he hoped Gentlemen would not mix the subject of the Slave Trade with that of America, and that nothing would be said to embitter the bond of union on this subject, upon which all hands were agreed. It was, indeed, a question embracing such a variety of policy, and so many topics for discussion, that he should deplore, most sincerely, any attempt at disturbing the unanimity which should prevail.—The Noble Lord concluded with moving, that the Committee should take the regulations adopted in consequence of the Treaty entered into with Spain into consideration.

Sir G. HATHCOTE could not avoid observing, that so large a sum as 400,000*l.* might, in the present distressed situation of the country, be better applied in relieving our fellow subjects. At the rate of 25*l.* per family, relief could be afforded to 16,000 families. The House ought, if they wished to regain any confidence, to begin by setting their faces against grants of this nature, and act as if they were really the constitutional guardians of the public purse. Economy should be the watch-word—our coffers were nearly empty, and the old proverb, to be "just before you are generous," would be proper in practice. He therefore entered his protest against the vote.

Mr. WILBERFORCE thought the question was one of the greatest importance, and the Noble Lord was entitled to his gratitude for his very great and earnest labours for putting an end to the abominable traffic. In a moral point of view it was one of the utmost consequence. It was the duty of this country to use its utmost endeavours, so that the other nations might actually be convinced of the necessity of giving up the Trade in Slaves; and he hoped to see the day when such a Trade would be considered piracy, and be punished accordingly.—(Hear, hear!)—He hoped the Hon. Baronet would, when he considered the subject dispassionately, be of opinion the money was well applied; and on certain occasions, whatever might be thought of generosity, it was in some respects justice.

Sir O. MOSELEY observed, that the sum now demanded as a grant would enable Old Spain to carry on a war against the Colonies; and thus, in fact, the House would, by so doing, be lending their assistance in upholding a system of White Slavery. Feeling this, he should carry the Grant to a vote.

Sir J. MACKINTOSH voted with pleasure for the Resolution, because it sanctioned the maritime right of search and visitation, in order to put an end to the traffic in slavery. Every step in abolition he must approve, because it would tend to the total extinction of the trade.

Mr. C. GRANT said, that the Merchants of Spain had offered a boon of two millions, for the privilege of carrying on the Trade in Slaves. Would they then object to the grant of 400,000*l.* to abolish a trade so lucrative?

Mr. BENNET supported the proposition, but reminded the Noble Lord and the House, that though the Ordinance of the French King abolished the Trade in Slaves in the French Colonies, yet there was nothing in the Ordinance which prevented them from trafficking. He wished to know from the Noble Lord whether any security had been taken at the Congress for the prevention of the Trade, because he believed it was mere delusion to suppose that slavery was at an end.

Lord CASTLEREAGH observed, that it was impossible for him to say what the legal point of view was in which the engagements would be taken in the French Law Courts. He could positively say, that the orders to the Colonies were peremptory. The Governor of the Colony of Bourbon was displaced, because he had not taken measures to repress Slavery, in conformity with the orders he had received. With respect to the laws of France on Slavery, he had a communication with the French Minister upon the subject, who had received instructions from his Court, to inform him (Lord C.) that it was the wish of France to assimilate the Slave Laws of that kingdom with those of England, and to completely put the trade down.

Mr. GORDON opposed the Resolution; and observed, he did not think that the Merchants of Spain had offered four times the sum to carry on the Trade. No doubt, the King would take the 400,000*l.* and then, when he had it safe, he might listen to the proposition of the Merchants; and, perhaps, take their offer also. The House divided—Ayes, 56—Noes, 4.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 10.

WHITECROSS-STREET PRISON FOR DEBTORS.

Sir WM. CURTIS moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable the City to raise a further sum to cover the cost of completing this prison, which altogether amounted to 130,000*l.* The sum now to be raised was 30,000*l.*; and the City applied for liberty to raise it through the medium of the Orphans' Fund, as it was improperly called. This Fund in fact had nothing to do with Orphans; it was raised by a tax on coals; and was in truth a fund for the improvement of London.

Mr. BENNET observed, that the Prison in Whitecross-street, though a most expensive one, was at the same time most unfit for its object. So ill adapted was this clumsy edifice, that it was not even fire-proof. When any ministerial object was to be promoted, the City could be most liberal of its swords, snuff-boxes, &c. but they should rescue their jails from their notoriously discreditable state, before they exhibited their unnecessary ostentation. The state of Newgate was scandalous, and the Borough Compter had scarcely a whole pane of glass in it! The House should know how the City funds had already been disposed of.

Sir J. SHAW defended the City for its liberality to "the Liberators of Europe."

Mr. SUMNER contended that there was a system of jobbing connected with the City loans which should be explained. Upon the last loan, 3000*l.* was set down as the expense of carrying the Bill through Parliament, and a similar sum for making out the bonds!—Mr. S. concluded by moving that the motion be postponed.

Mr. Alderman WOOD thought that the Whitecross-street Prison was particularly commodious, and the prisoners were supplied with coals, bread, meat, and bedding. Its annual expense was 3000*l.* and the City paid, not less than 30,000*l.* a-year for the police and maintenance of its various prisons.

After some further conversation, Mr. Sumner's amendment was withdrawn, and the original motion carried; it being understood that the state of the Orphans' Fund should be laid before the House.

LABOURERS IN THE COTTON MANUFACTORIES.

Sir R. PEEL presented a Petition from a numerous body of men, praying that the house would interfere, and limit the employment of labourers in the Cotton Manufactories to 10½ hours a-day, including half an hour for breakfast and one hour for dinner. Sir Robert stated, that the statements of the Petitioners, and their emaciated appearance, had excited him to tears.—(Hear, hear!)—These poor people, in rooms badly ventilated and much over-heated, were compelled to work from 14 to 15 hours a-day! Premature old age and incurable disease were the inevitable consequences. Since the Bill had passed for the regulation of the labour of apprentices, the masters refused to take any, and pauper children were now employed without limitation. He hoped the House would interfere for the prevention of inhumanity.—(Hear, hear.)

After some conversation, in which it was denied by some that the labourers were injured by excessive labour, the Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

STATE TRIALS IN SCOTLAND.

Lord A. HAMILTON stated the circumstances connected with the late Trial of M'Kinley, in Edinburgh, charged with administering unlawful oaths. On the trial, one Campbell, a witness, being asked whether he had received any reward or promise of reward, replied in the affirmative, to the surprise of the whole Court! It was upon this answer, that he (Lord A. H.) grounded his present motion, for the production of the Record, which would prove the charge he made against the Scotch Crown Officers, of having endeavoured to produce evidence against M'Kinley, which they must have known, from their own previous tampering, would have been perjured evidence, if not disqualified by its own confession. Campbell made an open declaration, that he had been tampered with when in jail. Here his Lordship stated the particulars, the substance of which was, that when Campbell, (who was confined on a charge of treason) was in prison, he was examined at different times by Mr. Home Drummond, the Advocate Depute, Mr. Salmon, the Procurator Fiscal, the Sheriff-Depute, and other Officers of the Crown, by whom he was at first threatened that they had evidence which would hang him—and then promised, if he gave such evidence as would please the Judge Advocate, he should neither be tried nor called upon as a witness. Mr. Drummond talked of writing to Lord Sidmouth to get him a place in the Excise; and he was promised protection, and the means of going to the Continent with his family.—Sir Wm. Rae, the Sheriff of Edinburgh, cautioned Campbell not to put his signature to any such terms, as if he afterwards swore that he had received no promise of reward, he would perjure himself—(Hear, hear!)—Mr. Drummond then assured him that “he might rely on them as gentlemen.” Such proceedings (said Lord A. H.) amounted to subornation of perjury; and had McKinley been convicted, he would have had a right to say, that he had been a victim to the foul practices of the Crown Officers, who had thus indeed violated the sanctity of the laws more palpably than McKinley had in the crime with which he had been charged—(Hear, hear!)—All he wanted was the Record of the Trial. The Noble and Learned Lord (the Judge Advocate) would hardly object, he thought, to be tried by that document, especially as it was one of their own manufacturing. What defence could be put up for such practices, he could not possibly imagine.—Lord A. H. concluded by moving for the document in question.

The LORD ADVOCATE said, that McKinley had been tried for administering unlawful oaths to many persons at Glasgow. The issue of the trial was the verdict of “Not proven,” which meant, that the person charged was implicated in the guilt, though the legal evidence was insufficient to convict him. Campbell had been pointed out as being able to give evidence of the guilt of the parties, and Mr. Drummond had been directed to promise him a pardon if he would communicate his information, and the means of going abroad, as he said his life was in danger; but he was not authorized to promise him a situation. In all this he acted according to his duty. He knew that Campbell had given a different colour to this transaction; but there had not been even an attempt to show that he had been at all instructed what to say on the trial. All that the promise of protection went to was, that the evidence might come forward without fear, and speak the truth. This Parliamentary discussion was an interference with the proper administration of justice. (Hear, hear!) All the prisoners had been dealt with according to the common law of the land, and the parties had their remedy if they had been unjustly treated.—He trusted that the House would see good reason for not acceding to the motion.

Mr. J. P. GRANT stated the particulars of this case at much length, having been one of the Advocates of the accused. He contended, that if what Campbell had stated was false, he should be indicted for perjury; but the charge should not remain uncontradicted. The paper containing the proposed terms, it was admitted, had been burnt by the Sheriff, but it was argued that there was nothing in it but what might fairly see the light (Hear, and a laugh.) Had they put this witness into the box, they would have done so with the knowledge that he could not have served them, or that if he had served them, he must have been perjured! (Hear, hear!) Out of this dilemma they could not possibly get.—Campbell's evidence was deemed by the Court inadmissible, and therefore he was not examined. He never before heard that it was legal thus to deal with witnesses. It was a question of vital importance: the justice of the country was not to be trifled with. He felt for the unfortunate Gentlemen concerned in this transaction; but such feelings must give way to a sense of what was due to the pure administration of justice, for it was the chief protection of our liberties.

Mr. A. COLQUHOUN had never heard more unfounded charges brought forward. The chief part of the accusation rested on the incredible assertions of Campbell, who pretended that Mr. Drummond had offered to procure him the place of an exciseman. This was directly contradicted in the next passage, which stated that Mr. Drummond thought that Campbell's life was in danger. Would Mr. Drummond, in order to protect a man whose life he was afraid of, make him a marked character as a person holding an office obtained by his unfounded disclosures? (Hear, and cries of misstatement.) The offer to send the man abroad was called a reward; was it a reward to send a man into exile? The granting the motion would convey an indirect stigma against the Noble and Learned Lord, and those who acted with him.

Mr. C. WYNN admitted, that implicit credit certainly should not be given to Campbell; but it was not an unfrequent occurrence for a witness to give evidence in favour of the prisoner, when it was previously thought he would be on the side of the prosecution. The Hon. Gentleman was wrong when he talked of a contradiction in the deposition of Campbell. He said that he could not live in Glasgow, or any manufacturing town, and consequently could not accept the place of an exciseman there; for this reason, Mr. Drummond proposed that he should go abroad. He trusted the House would not overlook so flagrant a case, or suffer it to stand on record without inquiry and examination.

LORD CASTLEREAGH said, that unless the purpose was to punish Campbell for perjury or to prosecute the Lord Advocate, there could be no reason to call for the record. His evidence had been considered so incredible by the Court, that it could not be entertained. Was it therefore to be deemed worthy of credit in Parliament? It was absurd to suppose the Lord Advocate made any offer not justified by morality and law. This was a conspiracy against the Advocate and his own truth. If the House countenanced this sort of trick, and the getting up cases of this nature was too frequent, (Hear, hear!) individual testimony would soon not be considered credible on oath.

SIR S. ROMILLY contended that there could be no fitter place for an inquiry into this important subject than that House. Lord Gillies thought the evidence of Campbell not incredible, but inadmissible from the misconduct of the prosecutor. Nothing could take from the credibility of the witness, until his evidence had been disproved, and as that had not been done, the Noble Lord was bound to believe it; and he would say, that notwithstanding the confidence of the Learned Lord, that when inquiry took place, it would require better authority than his to show that Campbell's evidence was incredible. The Lord Advocate had stated, that the verdict of “not proven” proved that guilt was inferred. This was not so. The verdict meant, that neither the guilt nor innocence of the accused was clearly established. It was an acquittal, but not an honourable one. The Noble Lord, whatever majority he might gain in that House, would gain none in the country. Every witness was obliged to swear, previously to the trial, that he had received no reward, nor promise nor good deed, for giving evidence. Now, Campbell had been worked on, both by the hope of reward and the threat of death. He was told that there were six witnesses against him, and knowing the mode of obtaining evidence, he knew also that innocence was of no avail; and with these powerful engines of hope and fear was he sent forth to give his evidence. Nothing but an investigation would remove from them the cloud of the worst suspicion of unfair practices when men's lives were at stake.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he saw that Campbell was a very artful man, who mixed up a little truth with a great deal of falsehood, but yet he did not think he could be prosecuted for perjury; as Mr. Home Drummond would be the only witness against him. For his own part, if fear was urged by any one as an objection to come forward, he thought it only his duty to the public to assure him at once of protection. He did not think that such promise rendered Campbell's evidence inadmissible.

Mr. FINLAY supported the motion. The general impression in Scotland was, that Campbell had been bargained with before he was adduced at the trial.

LORD A. HAMILTON said, the Attorney-General had remarked that Campbell could not be prosecuted for perjury, because there was only one witness. The Learned Gentleman then seemed to forget, that as the witness had spoken of communications with the Sheriff Substitute, &c., there were many who could contradict him. He had never once been charged with falsehood. It was therefore quite in vain for the Noble Lord to suppose that any Vote of that House would acquit him in the public estimation. Even the direct negative of the motion would avail little either for the character of the Learned Lord, or for that of the House itself!

The House divided—For the motion, 71—Against it, 136—Majority against all inquiry, 65.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

Mr. MELLISH brought in a Bill for the better payment of Coroners; which was read a first time, after some opposition by Col. THORNTON, who was of opinion that Coroners were already very well paid.

Mr. OGLES brought in a Bill for the better regulation of Gaming-houses, which was ordered to be printed.

SLAVE TRADE.

Lord CASTLEREAGH brought up the papers on the Convention entered into with Portugal respecting the Slave Trade. He afterwards moved, that the sum of 400,000*l.* be granted to carry into execution the Treaty with Spain on this subject; which motion was carried, after some conversation, in which Sir R. HERON observed, that this money would go to assist Spain in the subjugation of her Colonies, and that no good could be expected till Slavery was itself abolished, which should be gradually proceeded in.

PROCEEDINGS RESPECTING SPIES, &c.

Mr. FIZAKERLEY observed, that in the Report of the Secret Committee of last Session, it was stated, that the language and conduct of certain persons, who had been employed to watch the movements of the disaffected, might have contributed to encourage the practices which it was the object of Government to suppress. He wished therefore to ask, whether any steps had been taken to bring the persons alluded to to justice? (Hear, hear!) During the Suspension Law, the jails were crowded by the victims of these Spies and Informers, and itinerant State Prisoners were paraded about the country, exhibiting as strange a mixture of strong and weak measures as had ever distinguished any Administration. (Hear, hear!) Multitudes had been taken up and then dismissed without trial, and no cause whatever appeared for such conduct. Inquiry was therefore every way necessary. The Hon. Member concluded by moving, "That instructions be given to the Secret Committee, to examine and report, whether any and what measures had been taken to detect and bring to justice all or any of those persons who had been described in the Secret Report of June 1817, as having been in any manner the cause of the disturbances which took place last year."

Mr. C. BATHURST said, the Hon. Gentleman was mistaken in imagining that the Report had designated the Spies as the cause of the disaffection; the Report said no such thing, though it admitted that the conduct of certain individuals sent to procure information, was calculated to encourage disaffection. Those persons were not the authors of the disturbances which had taken place, though they must of course have seemed to encourage the disaffection it was meant to put down. Before Oliver went among them, meetings had been held. When persons were detected in their guilt, it was common for them to turn round and accuse of guilt those who had so detected them—(Hear!)—In fact, not one individual had been arrested on the information of Oliver, nor was it on his evidence that the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended—(Hear, hear!)—Under all the circumstances, he saw no reason why Government should be called upon to proceed against persons who had only procured proper information, and he should oppose the motion.

Lord MILTON observed, that if ever he should become a Spy, he would not wish a better master than the Right Hon. Gentleman—(Laughter)—for he should be sure of being defended by him in anything he should do. The House, however, would not do its duty unless it entered on a diligent inquiry. It was too much to hear the conduct of Spies treated with so little disesteem in that House—(Hear, hear!)—instead of viewing it with proper indignation.

Mr. C. GRANT jun. argued that it was the duty of Government to act on the information of agents; and as no extraordinary ground had been shown for interference, he should oppose the motion.

Mr. BENNETT said, that if a case could be made out, the country would be satisfied that this was one of the grossest juggles that any Ministers had ventured to impose on the people. He did not wish to give any general opinion on the employment of Spies; but he knew that they were edge-tools which were very dangerous to be handled. Some wretched individuals at Manchester and other places had been induced to accept the sanguinary employment of spies by a small addition to their weekly earnings. He held in his hand a pamphlet published by a Capt. Raines, of the Militia, in which the author stated that he had procured persons to join Luddites, and take a horrid oath, for the purpose of breaking it and betraying others who took it. The Right Hon. Gentleman had given a sort of challenge respecting the character of the persons lately employed, which he would meet. To begin with Castles—he was a bully, an utterer of forged notes, and had been a Spy before under the Transport Office. Another, Oliver, had begun his career by being guilty of bigamy, and the rest of his character was equally bad; he owed to the mercy of a benefactor, whom he had basely injured, the infamous life which he now held. On the 24th of April, Oliver set out for Liverpool. He afterwards went to Leeds and Manchester, where he called on most respectable persons. Wherever he went he insisted on the absolute necessity of physical force, and the uselessness of petitioning. At one meeting on the 5th May, when there were ten delegates present, Oliver had desired a person to write down and sign a list of the number of those who would join, which he (Mr. Bennet) firmly believed was the origin of the assertion in the Report of the Secret Committee, that lists of men and arms had been prepared; and he believed that Oliver himself wrote those lists. It was certain that Oliver had been at Derby. The Hon. Gentleman then read an affidavit, which gave an account of Oliver's proceedings at Derby, his having attended a meeting there, where he said, that all the rest of the country was ready to rise, and that 60,000 proclamations had been printed by Mr. Wooler, &c. It further stated, that he (Oliver) saw Brandreth on the 16th. He read a part of Brandreth's own statement, made to his Solicitor in confidence, which confessed the acts he had been accused of, but showed how he had been instigated: it mentioned his meeting with Oliver, who repeated the same story that he had every where told. Oliver then went to Nottingham and Birmingham with the same mischievous intent. One very material fact was, that tranquillity was restored the very day that Oliver ceased his employment.—Great distress had existed, of which some factious men had taken advantage, but their designs could have inspired no fear, had not Oliver been present to stimulate and direct them.—It had been said, that if Oliver had instigated the men at Derby, he might have been called as evidence; he was certainly on the spot, ready to purchase the blood-money of Brandreth; but to have called him would have proved the very guilt which they denied. This argument was a disgrace—(Loud cries of Hear, hear!)—a disgrace to the justice of the country. He was prepared to prove the truth of his assertions by oaths and credible witnesses—(Hear, hear!)—most credible witnesses; and he challenged the Hon. and Learned Gentleman to show they were not. (Hear, hear!) The Noble Lord might cry hear, hear! and deny the motion in that House; but that would not do with the country before which they stood, and a verdict would be given such as the enormity of the case deserved!

Mr. WILBERFORCE objected to the motion, as it was founded on a false assumption. He did not mean to say that nothing of the disturbances was to be attributed to Oliver; but what had just been stated came also from a doubtful source; and he should like to hear what Oliver would say to the charges against him. (Hear, hear!) If they were true, it would be a service to the public to bring him to justice. With respect to the employment of Spies, it was certainly not allowable in a religious view. The God of Truth abhorred falsehood and deceit; and even in a political point, though their employment might at times produce temporary advantages, yet, when he considered all the distrust which such a system must occasion—when he considered the temptations to false information of every description—the suspicions and disaffection that must be excited against the Government itself, and the general confusion such a system would excite—he was of opinion that their employment was false policy. (Hear, hear!) He for one condemned the practice: the country and the Government would lose more than they gained by them. But, notwithstanding all that had been said by the disaffected, and notwithstanding all the real sufferings of the people in a season of distress, this country enjoyed a greater share of liberty, than had been ever possessed in any age or by any other nation—there never was a more prosperous, a more moral, or a happier nation! Still, by the use of such agents, the people would have their principles perverted and their sympathies turned in favour of their worst enemies. No; the British nation did not stand in need of the assistance of such base associates—(Loud cries of hear!)—He must say, however, he was against the motion itself, (Hear, and laughter) because it involved an inquiry which could not be carried on in the Committee.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL denied that the passage in the Report would bear the construction now put upon it; it in fact imputed nothing that could be the foundation of a criminal indictment. The Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bennet) had not given the names of the persons from whom he had derived his information; but he had mentioned the name of Mitchell, and this was a clue to the rest. That person had been charged with treason, and was he therefore to be thought a proper witness to depreciate the characters of those who had been employed to detect his designs? Then there was Pendlil and Stephen, who had fled to America, and they might have furnished the information. Did a charge of treason increase the credibility of the persons so charged?—(Hear, hear!)—He knew that, now a days, persons who had been brought before a Court of Justice were deemed proper objects of the bounty and patronage of the public. By raising a cry against Oliver and the Spies, they thought they could shift from themselves the load of criminality, and impute the whole to a Government Conspiracy—(Hear, hear!)—Oliver, forsooth, had done all the mischief! The Hon. Gentleman had said, that Oliver was ready to be produced at Derby to sell the blood of the prisoners; but he could not have been produced as a witness, for he was not on the list furnished to the prisoners. He allowed, that had Oliver been called by the prisoners, his testimony must have gone to convict them: but if they could have proved that they had been deluded by him into crime, it would have operated in their favour when they were called up for judgment. Nothing had been proved which tended to shew that Oliver had arranged the conspiracy. He had now shown that the motion was unnecessary, as it was founded on a mistake of the meaning of the Report.

Sir S. ROMILLY remarked, that after the charges brought by his Hon. Friend, which he had offered to substantiate on oath, he thought the House should not dare to resist inquiry into the truth. But the Learned Gentleman suspected that the information came from what he termed a polluted source. Mitchell had been arrested,—no matter on what evidence,—had been imprisoned, and therefore his evidence was inadmissible! Thus a new expedient had been discovered by one of the first Law Officers of the Crown, for disqualifying any evidence that might be brought against Ministers. According to this new plan, Government had only to throw an obnoxious individual into prison, and then his testimony would become incredible!—(Hear, hear!)—The moment he was taken up, he would lose both his liberty and his character! Such reasoning, however, could not affect the charge nor satisfy the country.—The Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilberforce) had strongly censured the employment of Spies. It was very singular, however, that deeming them pests of society, and showing that their encouragement led to all sorts of mischief, he yet voted against the motion, which would lead to inquiry! It was a subject, he said, of vital importance; and yet he refused to take a single step which would lead to a suppression of the evil!—If, concluded Sir Samuel, the motion was negatived, as he believed it would be, he hoped that the Hon. Member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce) would come forward with a motion consistent with his speech, some early day, to inquire into the recent encouragement of Spies, whose employment he deemed so destructive of the happiness, morality, and religion of the community.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. CANNING observed, that the House would doubtless do its duty, notwithstanding the organized shouts and unorganized speeches of the other side. If Ministers had acted improperly, let the accusation be made, and it would be fairly met; but the present motion was a silly mockery, perfectly childish and unmeaning. The Committee had been described as one possessing neither common talents nor common honesty,—which had been assembled for the purpose of deluding the nation—(Cheers)—and yet these were the men who were now to be trusted with these vital matters, these high interests! This was truly a very consistent course. The Committee were pronounced incompetent, yet they were now to be burthened with fresh and solemn labours!—(Continued Cheers.) It was a waste of time to talk on such a subject. It had been alleged that last year alarms had been spread by the agents of Government: Government, however, could not go on were they to refuse information respecting plots. Suppose information had reached them of the existence of a revolutionary spirit, not arising from any temporary distresses, and this information had come from the Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire (Earl Fitzwilliam) and not from some petty authority,—would Government be justified in passing it over? The Lord Lieutenant, indeed, affected to look back with surprise at the arts which had been practised, but Government were justified in acting upon his information, though he afterwards might change his opinion. Disaffection did exist, and it was necessary to probe it to the bottom, and they were obliged to avail themselves of the means within their reach. No person of common humanity or principle would set a man on to seduce others into crime: but when it was, "Will you avail yourself of this man's information, or let the State go to wreck,"—he felt as little hesitation here as in the other alternative. If none but unsullied characters were to be employed, the State might be ruined before such could be found. Oliver had not fomented the disturbances; he had merely given information of what he saw and heard.—(Mr. Canning, on concluding his speech, was loudly cheered by the Ministerial side of the House.)

Mr. TURNER argued, that if the Officers of the Crown did justice to the People as to the Government, they would have prosecuted the Spies before this time. But the Government did not dare to touch a hair of Oliver's head: his retort upon them would be more than they could endure. (Hear, hear!)—The House was called upon to quiet the disgust that generally prevailed against the employment of Spies: if they refused this motion, they proved they were not alive to the liberties of the people. (Continued cheering.)—If inquiry was refused, suspicion must attach to some of the highest characters in the country. The letter from Earl Fitzwilliam was dated in December 1816; but strong measures were not proposed till the following February, nor till after an unfortunate pebble had been thrown in the Park! He admitted that there was disaffection; but it was caused by distress; and it was proved that not one man among the disaffected was of a higher rank than a weaver. For the greater part were paupers—always excepting the moral Mr. Oliver and Co. If Oliver had not excited the disaffection, he had turned it into the only course in which it was likely to be mischievous. Did the House believe that the vote of a majority would set this question at rest? He wished to speak in measured terms; but he must warn the House not to trespass too far on the temper and patience of the people. (Hear, hear!)

Lord MILTON said, that one letter had been produced; while another had been kept back.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH complained that this was an unfair statement.

The House divided. For the motion, 53—Against it, 111.—Second Majority against all inquiry, 58.—Adjourned at two o'clock.

Thursday, Feb. 12.

FINANCE.

Some questions having been put to Mr. VANSITTART respecting the rumoured Loan and the intended Financial Measures, he said that he meant to propose nothing further in the present early part of the Session; and that making partial statements respecting plans not sufficiently decided on, was likely to be very inconvenient.

Various Bills, &c. were proceeded in, and the House adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 13.

Petitions were presented for permission to build new Bridges over the Thames at Rotherhithe and Hammersmith.

SUFFERERS UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.

Mr. BENNET presented Petitions from Joseph Mitchell and Thos. Evans,—the former of whom prayed for indemnification for his cruel sufferings under the Suspension Act; and the latter solicited that inquiry should be entered upon as to the truth of his former Petition, which complained also of various cruel inflictions.

Mr. Mitchell's Petition was ordered to be printed; after Mr. VANSITTART had asked "whether there was any thing in it disrespectful to the House,"—and Mr. Evans's Petition was received and laid on the table.

Mr. BENNET presented another Petition from Wm. Ogden of Glasgow, from which it appeared that he was 74 years of age; that he had been heavily chained with boys of 17 and 18; that the effects of this heavy ironing had been such as to oblige him to undergo an operation, which had rendered him unfit for labour, so that he could no longer help to provide for his family of 17 children; that the weight of the manacle, 30 lbs., had dislocated his arm, and such was the pain he endured, that he cried out bitterly for aid, but none came, and he underwent this excruciating torture for 16 hours (Hear, hear!)—that he had always been a strenuous advocate for Parliamentary Reform; but he declared before God that he had done no wrong, though he had been thus treated and imprisoned for nine months!—The aged Petitioner prayed that the House would pass no Bill of Indemnity.—Ordered to be printed.

Sir F. BURDETT observed, it was a national disgrace that so many innocent men should thus have been subjected to imprisonment, to want, and to torture, merely at the pleasure of Ministers,—and then dismissed without trial.—The worthy Baronet then presented a Petition from another Sufferer, John Stewart, a weaver of Glasgow, who had been kept in prison three days without food, and had been, with his wife and three children, ruined by his sufferings and imprisonment.—The Petitioner prayed for redress.—Petition ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Sir F. BURDETT presented a Petition for Reform from St. George's, Hanover-square. After speaking of the House as the instrument of a contemptible Administration, and as not representing the people in any useful or intelligible sense, it went on to observe, that "if the House would not listen to their complaints, they would most certainly resist paying Taxes!"

Lord CASTLEREAGH, upon this, desired the Clerk to read this passage again, which he accordingly did. He then (amid the cheers of the persons accused by the Petitioners as being the instruments of a contemptible Administration) proposed that the Petition be rejected, as being neither constitutional nor respectful.

Sir F. BURDETT contended, that it was a principle of the Constitution, that the people should not be taxed but through their Representatives. If, therefore, they were not represented, it was constitutional in them to refuse the payment of taxes. As they only meant to resist in a legal manner, the Petition ought not to be rejected.

Lord CASTLEREAGH then read again the obnoxious passage; upon which there was a call for strangers to withdraw; but the Petition was rejected without a division.

Sir F. BURDETT then presented other Petitions for Reform, from Bath, which were ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH BOROUGHES.

Lord A. HAMILTON made various observations on the mode of keeping accounts and electing Magistrates adopted in the Scotch Boroughs; upon which much dissatisfaction prevailed throughout Scotland. The burgesses had no voice in the choice of their Magistrates, who elected themselves, and contracted debts which the people were bound to pay! His object was, to enable the burgesses to manage their own affairs, and to dismiss those self-elected Magistrates; and he moved, therefore, for a copy of the act or warrant by which the Magistrates of Montrose had been appointed.

A conversation ensued.—Lord CASTLEREAGH objected to the motion, on the grounds that it would lead to a Reform in Parliament, and that he did not know where the national character and decorum were more strictly preserved, than in the Royal Boroughs of Scotland.—Mr. ABERCROMBY argued for the motion.—The LORD ADVOCATE said that the Magistrates had no power to tax the inhabitants without Parliamentary authority.—Sir J. MACKINTOSH and Mr. J. P. GRANT, and others, supported the motion, as it was a question in which the people were deeply interested.—It was however negatived without a division.

The Surgeons Bill was ordered to be printed.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 15.

THE foreign news is very barren this week. All that is worth notice is the final agreement of the French Chambers respecting the recruiting of the armies, and another account of the atrocious proceedings of the Dey of ALGIERS communicated to Sir SYDNEY SMITH. Yes,—there is another specimen of the modesty of the Holy Allies worth recording. It is the flattering manner in which the Emperor ALEXANDER is said to have granted the wish of the Poles to have the body of Kosciusko buried among them. Flattering! And a country is to be flattered by the permission of one of its partitioners to possess the body of a patriot who vainly resisted that iniquitous usurpation, and was covered with lingering wounds! The Holy Allies must think indeed, that they have got the upper hand of all liberty and even remembrance, if they suppose that the smirk of an autocrat can go thus far. The Poles, as well as the rest of the world, must know well what to think of the Emperor ALEXANDER, if it is only from the single fact, that the illustrious being whom they deplore would never have any thing to do with him, and never entered Poland again alive.

The interest of the Parliamentary proceedings has been increased towards the end of the week, first, by a variety of petitions presented from individuals who have suffered under the Suspension, and who demand investigation, as an act of common justice and decency; and, secondly, by another from inhabitants of St. George's, Hanover-square, praying for Reform, and announcing their certain determination to resist paying the taxes, in case the House was not rendered more constitutional. There was an attempt made to hinder the former petitions from being printed, and even Mr. WYNN joined in it; but Lord FOLKSTONE's finer knowledge was too much for his formal one. The petition from St. George's was rejected, as was to be expected; but it cannot fail of leaving a sensation among certain persons, and that not an ordinary one. We believe that an announcement or understood intention of this kind on the part of a considerable body of shopkeepers at the west of Temple-bar once put an end to a measure contemplated by Mr. PITT; and constitutional knowledge, and a sense of unlawful conduct in the higher powers, are much more widely spread than they were then. We expect to hear more of this petition.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

"It is with infinite regret, says the Courier of last night, that we communicate to our readers, the following intelligence of an atrocious attempt, made in Paris, on Wednesday last, to assassinate the Duke of WELLINGTON. The news was brought by express this morning:—

"On the 11th instant (Wednesday last) at one o'clock in the morning, a pistol ball was fired at the carriage of the Duke of WELLINGTON, at the moment when his Grace was entering his Hotel. No person was wounded; the carriage even was not touched. At the noise of the report, the sentinels cried out to arms, and assembled at their post: but the night was so dark, that they could not discover the villain. They looked in vain for the ball. The Duke of WELLINGTON heard the report, but attached no importance to it. His first thought was, that the musket of one of the sentinels had accidentally gone off. They are in search of the criminal; some clue has already been obtained which may lead to his discovery; and no efforts will be left unattempted for that purpose.

"The moment the KING was informed of the circumstance, his MAJESTY sent the Duke de RICHELIEU and M. the Count de CAZES, to express to his Grace his horror at so atrocious an attempt. M. de CAZES had already been two hours at the hotel of his Grace, to collect every information which might lead to a discovery of the offender."

SLAVE TRADE.—By the Treaty with Portugal, "His Britannic Majesty formally engages to pay the 300,000*l.* sterling of indemnification, stipulated by the Convention of January 1815, in favour of the proprietors of Portuguese vessels captured by British cruisers, up to the period of June, 1814, in two payments."

A Requisition has been presented to the LORD MAYOR, to convene an Especial Court, upon an early day, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament respecting the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, praying for a full and impartial enquiry into the conduct of Ministers, and that they will not pass any Bill of Indemnity, and thereby preclude the persons who have been aggrieved from an appeal to the legal tribunals of the country.

There is not, we believe, the least foundation for the report of our Minister having quitted Washington.—Courier.

Seventeen cases were landed on Wednesday, which were understood to contain the whole, or great part, of the personal library of BONAPARTE. These books are chiefly modern; the editions, those in which there is the greatest display of typographical splendour. The bindings are the most superb that can be conceived; some of velvet, others of vellum, or of Russia leather. There are some in satin. The colour of all is green; and the Imperial arms are on each book.

EXTRAORDINARY STORY.—The following report is at this moment current among the higher circles, and, from a recent event, may be expected to excite general attention. It is said that a late Peer was, with his Lady, and another Lady who was under his protection many years ago in Paris, where both were delivered at the same period, the first of a Daughter, and the latter of a son. It is said that a late celebrated Accoucheur attended both, and by the instigation of the Mother of the Son, was induced to exchange the Children, so that this Son became the Heir of the Family Title and Possessions. It is said, that the Mother of the Son has been lately seized with feelings of contrition, and has openly declared the whole truth. If, therefore, her evidence is admitted, the nominal Heir will be deprived of all his honours and possessions. We cannot, of course, vouch for the truth of any part of this extraordinary report, which, indeed, seems to be incredible, but as a Public Journalist, which ought to shew "the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure," we feel it to be our duty to present it to our Readers.—Sun.

Rumour, last night, assigned as another cause for the desperate act of the deceased (Sir R. C.), the shame arising from the discovery of a disgraceful act committed in his professional practice, at any early period of his life, in assisting in the substitution of a child to the injury of the rightful heir. But we notice this rumour solely for the purpose of contradicting it, as totally destitute of foundation, and unworthy of credit.—British Press.

FORGED NOTES.—Alluding to the late case of Mr. Ranson, a writer in the Dublin Journal says of Ireland—"We order these matters better in this country: to the honour of our National Bank, the principle on which they proceed is directly the reverse of that of the Bank of England. Instead of declining to communicate their secret, they take every possible means to inform the public: instead of demanding possession of the forged Notes, and punishing with imprisonment and expense the holders of them, they instantly return the Note when such appears. Instead of the necessity of varying their Notes, to deceive the fabricators, which is in truth deceiving the public, they study to preserve an identity of character, by which the public soon become competent judges on a question of genuineness; and, in place of concealment, they have actually furnished the Postmasters, Magistrates, and other respectable persons throughout the kingdom, with fac-similes or proof impressions of their Notes, as permanent standards for public reference. Thus they have a security to their Notes, beyond even what Guineas could possess; and the fabricators, or utters, are detected on the first attempt to deceive the public."

THE BLOOD CONSPIRATORS.—We are informed, that with the death-warrant for the execution of the four unfortunate young men and women who are to suffer on Tuesday next, was sent a FREE PARDON for Messrs. Brock, Pelham, Power, and Johnston, and they were immediately liberated.—Has not Vaughan a situation at the Milbank Penitentiary?

Mr. CHANTREY, the eminent Sculptor, has at last been elected a Member of the Royal Academy.

THE ARMY.—The Army Estimates for the year 1818 have been printed, by order of the House of Commons. The total number, including officers and non-commissioned officers, is 133,539; from which are to be deducted, the troops in France, and the regiments for service in India, amounting to 42,892. There will then remain, exclusive of corps, &c. intended for reduction, 90,647. To this last number is to be added corps ordered home from India, viz. 4,299, and charges for corps to be reduced in 1818, viz. 4,200, making together 99,146. From these again are to be deducted the corps ordered home from India, 4,299, and there remains to be provided for in 1818, a total of 94,847 men, including officers. The total expense of providing for this army is estimated at 6,494,290*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, of which 5,313,232*l.* 9*s.* is to be defrayed by Great Britain, and 1,181,058*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* by Ireland.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

The PRINCE REGENT on Thursday held his first Levee for the season, at Carlton House, which was extremely crowded. The Prince of Hesse-Hombourg arrived in one of the PRINCE REGENT's carriages, with the servants in their state liveries. His Serene Highness was dressed in his full military uniform, and was presented by Lord STEWART. Mr. RUSH, the Republican Envoy Extraordinary, from the United States, was also introduced, and had a closet audience.

Some progress is daily made in the preliminaries for the union of the Princess ELIZABETH and the Prince of Hesse Hombourg. On Wednesday morning, his Serene Highness had a long interview with the PRINCE REGENT, at Carlton House, and afterwards met the Duke of SUSSEX at the Duke of CUMBERLAND's. He was attended by Lord STEWART. The Duchess of GLOUCESTER, who may reasonably be supposed to act for the QUEEN in many of the arrangements, passed great part of the same morning at Carlton House. It is highly probable, that the Princess ELIZABETH and her consort will reside chiefly in England for several years.—Morning Paper.

We are concerned to learn, that her MAJESTY's indisposition is more serious than had been for some time past apprehended. At the time of life which her MAJESTY has reached (her 74th year) this circumstance is less likely to excite the surprise than the serious regret of all who have the honour and happiness of knowing her.—Morn. Paper.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 311.

COVENT-GARDEN.

THE tragedy of Fazio, which they are performing here, has been some time in print; and in an advertisement to the copy before us, the author informs us that it's representation in London and in Bath (where it seems to have been played also), "is without his concurrence; he has not been consulted on the subject, and totally disclaims the alterations which he understands have been made." This is not the politest or most liberal conduct certainly on the part of the Managers; but it is part of the cold and grasping system that prevails now-a-days in all the upper circles of shopkeeping.

Mr. MILMAN, however, gives us to understand that he has no abstract objection to the performance of his tragedy at a theatre. On the contrary, it was written, he says, "with some view to the stage;" but he was induced to calculate the advantages of it's more private appearance in a very nice and prudent manner, not, as it should seem, without some view to representation still; though he is "aware that there is a prejudice at the theatre against plays which have first appeared in print," but is "at a loss to conceive whence it originates." There are various causes, we apprehend, if not at all good ones; and one of them is this very feeling on the part of an author against trusting his play to the hands of managers or the chances of an audience. They are apt to attribute it either to a fastidiousness which does them no honour, or to a conscious deficiency which argues little for their profit. The best cause however is undoubtedly the question about "mere novelty," which Mr. MILMAN sets aside as being of no value; for the truth is, that audiences and even readers of plays are so little accustomed to any thing else, even if in name only, that they seldom find reason to doubt the propriety of the very humblest wishes on that score.

It is curious enough that Mr. MILMAN himself should have hurt his play by too much attention to mere novelty, and too little to one of a right sort. It is an attempt, he tells us, "at reviving our old national drama with greater simplicity of plot," but the mere novelty of a modern writer talking in ancient phrases has evidently pressed too busily upon him; whereas if he had attempted to revive nothing but the intensity of feeling so remarkable in our old drama, and expressed it in the language of his own times, as they did, he would have both felt and spoken perhaps to better advantage.

The production however is by no means destitute of merit. The plot, which we do not remember in any of the common store-houses of Italian novels, is founded, says the author, "on a story which was quoted in the Annual Register for 1795, from the 'Varieties of Literature;' but great liberties have been taken with it." It is that of a young Florentine, who dividing his time between a wife and the pursuit of the philosopher's stone, suddenly comes into the possession of great riches, by the death of an old miser his neighbour, who calls him to his assistance from robbers, and leaves a quantity of treasure of which Fazio thinks he may reasonably deprive the government. His company is speedily courted by the great, and among others by a rich and haughty beauty, Aldabella, whom he formerly loved in vain. An amour, with pretended feelings on her part, and unwilling desperation on his, is the consequence; and Bianca his wife becomes so exceedingly indignant, resentful, and even furious, that she goes and accuses him to the State of having murdered the old miser, upon which he is apprehended, and sentenced to death. She then repents, and is as vehement on the other side, but in vain: Aldabella herself will not use interest for her degraded lover, but even mocks the wife for coming to ask it; and after a great deal of wretchedness, Fazio goes to his death, and Bianca, declaring his innocence, dies at the Duke's feet, while Aldabella is dismissed to a nunnery.

In the conduct and language of this piece Mr. MILMAN not only shews that he has been no inattentive or inapprehensive reader of our best plays, but affords a curious specimen of the inspiration which they can reflect, as it were, upon an intelligent mind, without its being poetical by nature. We should be loth even to qualify our praise of his talents thus much, if he were younger; for then good imitation may fairly be allowed to stand in the place of experience; and a youth who begins with such borrowed resources as an older person settles in, will generally earn his own fame before he has done. But Mr. MILMAN, it seems, is a Fellow of a College; and therefore not young enough, we conclude, for this. Fazio is the work of a man of taste and acuteness, who is all but a poet himself. He has studied the noble voices of the most Delphic time of our poetry, and his verse is musical and various;—he has studied the wonderful succession of thoughts they uttered,—those "thick-coming fancies," which appear to us subtle almost to painfulness, and as if they would bear down the brain through which they pour, —and he thinks as well as writes; he has apprehensions and images; and not only recollects, but sets the things before him to look at them. He is not therefore without thoughts of his own; for this very mode of looking at those of other men produces them to a certain degree; and no faculty is carried to it's utmost extent without making some little incursions into the neighbouring territory. But still the original thoughts in this piece are very rare and mixed with others, in comparison with the great variety which the student of our great schools of poetry will recognize. Mr. MILMAN has repeated them well; and this is far from mean praise for a modern dramatist.

We shall not quarrel any further with the borrowed cast of his style, and his too great tendency to repeat phrases, which were natural formerly, but are nothing but artificial now. To say that he has done this, is only to repeat that his genius is not original: otherwise it would have led him to write differently, especially in the drama; where the intensity and what may be called the sincerity of our ideas is proved by the only true language which they can utter,—that of our own times and feelings. We do not complain, compliment, or invite our friends, in the Aye mes! the good my lords, and the Will please yes, of the days of ELIZABETH; nor did SHAKESPEARE and FLETCHER in their play of the Two Noble Kinsmen copy the language as well as the story from CHAUCER. What should we think of a man now-a-days, who should call the Grecian poet

That conceited clerke Homère?

We should think he was speaking of some French young gentleman in office; yet this was good panegyric meaning in CHAUCER's time; and really would be scarcely more absurd in a personal point of view, than a modern dramatist's venting his feelings in Aye mes.

But the point to which we object the most strongly in Mr. MILMAN's play, is the moral part of it. We acquit him most sincerely of the slightest ill intention on this head; indeed we dare say he thinks he has written to the benefit of morals and a right conduct. We see in the general impression, however, nothing but a half view of such things, and a sort of melancholy compromise with one kind of selfishness, if not with another; and this we fear, is the usual mistake about virtue in the world. When we speak of selfishness, we mean selfishness in it's bad sense, and not the modified notion of it to which some are so anxious to reduce all human principle. Here is a violent disagreeable woman, for instance, who, perpetually calling her husband hers and her own—my Fazio, mine— all mine,—mistakes this idea of property for love, and gets into a frenzy of revenge against the supposed object of it, because he is involved against his own sense of right in an amour. Now if Mr. MILMAN meant to expose the hollowness of the ground upon which this poor creature makes her pretensions, it is all very well; but we conceive, by the conclusion of the piece and by other symptoms, that it is only the revenge he objects to. The person, to be sure, by whom Fazio is entrapped, is a creature still more obviously and brutally selfish; and a precious pair of females they both are, from which we instinctively bless ourselves as from the thought of two hyenas contending for a body; but this system of insisting upon the right of possession, or even of insinuating it, is not only the worst way to recover a man's affections, if wandering, but a pretty secure way of sending them upon their travels, if not. Even those who fall in with the reverse opinion, instinctively find out that such feelings are not virtuous; and thus it is that a theoretical confusion of right with duty, and an instinctive though obscure and struggling discovery that they are very different things, make up almost all the imaginary virtues and real miseries of society. The world, say the common run of moralists, is a bad thing at best, a vale of tears, &c. &c. And so it is, as they manage it; and quite as much from the selfishness of things established, or of things not. When will they set about making it better? Not certainly while they have the same selfish notions of the best things in it as Bianca has, nor the same horrible and vindictive notions of the Divine Being out of it. This must be done by finding out the best side of the kindly and social impulses, however rendered bad by ill treatment; and the worst side of the resentful and exclusive ones, however rendered imposing by formality.

We have left ourselves no room to say any thing of the performance of this ingenious though not deep production, except that Miss O'NEIL is very excellent in the abrupt and passionate parts of Bianca's speeches, and that Mrs. FAWCETT is the haughty beauty Aldebella to the life. She seems like a fine statue with a soul put into it, but not a human soul.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

3. Bathsheba. D. WILKIE, R. A.—Had this been a work from an obscure hand, we might have passed it over in silence; but as it is an attempt of an eminent Artist, to make an excursion from his own proper territory assigned to him by nature, to share a more dignified sceptre over our tastes and feelings, with the masters of refined sentiment and beauty, we must summon up our critical powers to oppose such an ambitious and truly legitimate attempt upon our judgments. That Mr. WILKIE should so egregiously mistake his talents as to suppose that upon his Bathsheba being exposed to view, we should become so many DAVIDS in love with her, is what we certainly do not wonder at, when we consider what a rare virtue is self-knowledge and diffidence. But then it is not the less our critical duty to warn him of his error, and to tell him that this picture possesses nothing, out of his own familiar class of painting, that in the most distant degree reminds us of the higher class to which it aspires. It has a good general arrangement of colour, though the particular tints are mostly bad, and a dexterity of pencilling;—no more. But as looking at a performance which affects to be what it is not, is like looking at all other kinds of affectation, very disagreeable, we shall save our critical tastes any further nauseousness, by putting into the hands of the compositor the following remarks, written by an admirer of genuine Art:—

“This picture seems to have troubled the Critics (who are not always very profound people, as the reader doubtless knows.) One says that the Artist can be no friend to the character of the amorous Monarch, in thus leaving him without any reasonable excuse for falling so desperately in love with his subjects' wife, by making the lady so little inviting. Another insists that Mr. WILKIE could not possibly have any such distaste, and for this cogent reason, that the illustrious lover was a King, a character deemed sacred by most North Britons. This Gentleman also maintains, that the Painter has inculcated a highly useful moral,—which is, that the operation of the bath, such as the lady is just about to undergo, is necessary both for cleanliness and health; for, as he asks with some shew of truth, had this not been Mr. WILKIE's prime object, would he have given his heroine so dingy a skin, or have made her look as if she had just risen from a long indisposition?—For our parts we decline entering upon such a “delicate investigation;” but this we know, that Mr. WILKIE's Bathsheba is not the Bathsheba described in the 2d book of Samuel,—“a woman very beautiful to look upon.”

The following, too, from the same hand, will save us a dip or two of our pens in what the able painter of animals would perhaps think is gall, even were it written with as pure ink as we judge the subsequent remarks to have been:—

"94. The Pool of Bethesda.—This is altogether a miraculous work. It is miraculous that Mr. WARD should have painted such a picture; and it is miraculous that the Directors should have admitted it after he had so painted it. Then again the Angel is supernatural, the water is supernatural, the poor sick people are supernatural (supernaturally ugly), and the colouring is supernatural;—it has altogether nothing like nature about it; and if this was Mr. WARD's intention, he has indeed succeeded to a miracle! We confess indeed that we had rather see one of Mr. WARD's Jackasses, than all his Angels and Ministers of Grace put together. Yet the work has some merit."—There is great manual dexterity, and an extraordinary lucidness of colour and management of the light and shade, especially as it regards the distinctness and force of all the accessories and secondary objects, which, nevertheless, do not at all detract from the rightful and superior force of the main figure. The middle and remote distances are noble specimens of Asiatic magnificence, of natural and architectural scenery, and of purity of atmosphere.

R. H.

CAPE BRETON—GOVERNOR AINSLIE, &c.

Mr. EXAMINER,—I feel it necessary to submit a few observations on the notice you take of an Address presented to Colonel Fitzherbert, while President of the Council in Cape Breton, and the doubt you express of its amended state under Governor Ainslie. The heads of that address comprehend only some of the most prominent complaints of that Colony; such, for instance, as the assumption of absolute legislation by the Governor and Council, without an Assembly;—the taxes of various descriptions that have been, and are still continued to be, levied under orders of Council;—the dispossession of freeholders and others from their landed property, by the same authority;—fines and forfeitures, arbitrarily levied by chosen Magistrates, for breaches of those orders;—the inability of the oppressed to obtain justice in the Supreme Court;—and, finally, begging that legislature they have a right to demand under the King's Commission and the laws of the land, of which the foregoing acts are directly repugnant.—Why those grievances, and the various particular oppressions arising therefrom, have not been redressed, may partly be answered by your query, How such a man as Governor Ainslie could be sent to such a place? It is to such men, and others equally unacquainted with civil government, that so fine a country has been degraded to its present state, and the true friends of Government ruined in their fortunes, and stigmatised in their characters, by the basest arts of cunning falsehood and frequent perjury; for the Rulers have almost invariably at first fallen into the hands of a faction, headed by a man who has contrived to get himself placed at the head of a profession of which he is even now grossly ignorant. This man has governed with despotic sway for upwards of 20 years, not so much from his own talents, as the Gothic ignorance that pervaded all the departments of that Colony; and when discovered, has contrived to render every Governor odious by the very measures he had previously advised him to adopt. Can it then be wondered at, that oppression and confusion should exist? Where Governor Ainslie rules, or rather reigns, with such a Chief Justice, in fact he feels himself again in Dominica; the name is only altered. The Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council, some years ago, declared that this learned Judge had violated every rule of law, equity, and justice, and even expressed a doubt if his evidence on oath was to be believed. And, that the world may not accuse him of inconsistency, he, in November Term 1816, unblushingly avowed from the Bench his own ignorance of the simplest points of law, and then declared, that by his advice, the country had been deprived, for nearly 15 years, of between 15,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* He refuses to admit any who are not his favourites to bring an action in the Supreme Court, without first begging his permission; and he has, at this moment, without knowing it, by accepting the ministerial office of Escheator, ipso facto divested himself of his judicial office of Chief Justice, which can only be restored to him by a new Commission. This, however, is trifling to what will soon appear before the Public.—With respect to Governor Ainslie, he is practising precisely the same rule of conduct he adopted in the West Indies: but few, even of the Officers of Government, have escaped his capricious violence. In one instance, he offered to quit the Island, to give a meeting to Captain Crawley, of the Royal Navy, the Surveyor-General, whom he had first grossly insulted—availing himself, however, of that Gentleman's previous declaration, that from his age and principles he was no duellist. The Provost-Marshal he has suspended, in conjunction with his Chief Justice, for refusing an illegal order, by which he would have been liable to an action of assault and false imprisonment. To affect this, a partial, false, and malicious statement has been entered on the Council Minutes; but it is well known this office was promised to another person long before any charge existed. The Surrogate, the senior Member of Council, he has deprived of office, and treated with the most barbarous insults. The Secretary, Naval Officers, and others, he has threatened to suspend; and his violence is such, that many of the poor Settlers who have applied to him for redress, have been rudely kicked and thrust out of his doors! Public notice has been given to the inhabitants, that the greater part are to understand they are to hold their lands subject to the will and pleasure of the Governor and Council. With the assistance of his friend the Chief Justice, he has not only issued orders of Council affecting the Crown Revenues and Emoluments of the Officers of the Customs, but directly infringing Acts of Parliament, and stripping the subject of his property. They have already been enforced, and a vessel condemned in a Special Court, where the Chief Justice sat alone.—He pursues with unremitting vengeance all who come under his or that of his favourites displeasure. His Council, like the Grand Juries and Magistrates, are composed of certain select persons, for the sake of form—under pretence of Escheats, he and his Chief Justice as Escheator are depriving the proprietors of large and valuable cultivated tracts of land,—luckily in the most irregular and illegal manner,—without the slightest pretext to justify their proceedings. Admiral Bentinck's and Sawyer's have already been taken, and grants in fee are promised, notwithstanding the King's restraining order to such, who, from folly or ignorance, may be induced to take them; and the ruin of many will be the event hereafter. I have given this slight sketch, as you appear at a loss to know whether the address had produced the desired effect, not as a detail of the deplorable state of Cape Breton, which would almost exceed belief. I however pledge myself to bring it forward in various shapes before the public, unless it is speedily rectified.—In reply to your question, who are the Patrons of Governor Ainslie? he boasts that Lord Bathurst is the principal one, and offered to produce letters to prove that his Lordship has declared him to be a much injured man! and that the Government of Cape Breton was given to him, to shew the unworthy motives by which his enemies and persecutors were actuated, for his conduct in Grenada and Dominica. His other friends, I think, will hardly risk their names in his support, considering the manner in which he conducted himself in the West Indies; and the unblushing scenes of depravity he exhibits in his present situation.

VERITAS.

DEATH OF SIR RICHARD CROFT, BART.

On Friday morning (says the Chronicle) it was made known that Sir Richard Croft, the celebrated Accoucheur, had died suddenly at the house of a lady in Wimpole-street (Mrs. Thackeray), whom he was attending in child-bed. The circumstance produced no ordinary sensation, as it was known that ever since the fatal termination of the accouchement of the amiable Princess Charlotte, Sir Richard has laboured under the most severe mental affliction.—The unfortunate circumstance of not having previously introduced the experienced and able physician Dr. Sim to the Princess, so as to have the advantage of his assistance and counsel in the important duty he had to discharge, preyed upon his mind, and his friends have long observed symptoms of uneasiness that alarmed them, and which, probably, prepared them for the event that has happened. Various rumours were circulated, and among others his name was implicated in a most delicate affair that has occupied the attention of the higher circles for some days past, and to which we cannot give the smallest credit. The utmost industry was also used to suppress all knowledge of the manner of Sir Richard's death; and certainly, if we could have saved the feelings of his afflicted relatives without a dereliction of our duty to the public, we should have yielded to the earnest solicitations that have been made to us. It is one of the most irksome parts of an Editor's task to make known cases, which may appear to belong only to private suffering, and not to concern the public; but surely a little reflection must convince our Readers that it is not true, and that an Editor cannot yield to the applications of friends on such events, without incurring the charge of corruption, even where he indulges only the kindest emotions of the heart.—Our Reporters were prevented from access to the Inquest; a prohibition which the Coroner was not justified in authorising, since the law of the Coroner was intended undoubtedly to operate as a preventive of the dreadful and abhorrent crime of suicide, a crime which is probably rendered more frequent by the concealment too often arranged, and by the lenity of the verdicts.—By this exclusion, we can only state the circumstances, as communicated to us by a witness. The Inquest was taken at the house, No. 86, in Wimpole-street, before Thomas Stirling, Esq. and a Jury of neighbours.

The following circumstances were proved in evidence:—On Monday morning early the deceased was summoned to attend the Lady of the Rev. Dr. Thackeray, of No. 86, Wimpole-street, Cavendish-square. He was in attendance until Tuesday morning at eleven o'clock, when finding his continued presence not necessary, he went out for a time on his other engagements. An apartment in the floor above that occupied by Mrs. Thackeray, was appointed for the residence of Sir Richard. In this chamber there were two pistols belonging to Dr. Thackeray, hanging within the reach of Dr. Croft. Sir Richard retired to bed about half-past twelve o'clock on Thursday morning; about one o'clock Dr. Thackeray heard a noise, apparently proceeding from the room occupied by Dr. Croft, and sent a female servant to ascertain the cause; she returned, saying she found the Doctor in bed, and conceived him to be asleep. A short time after a similar noise was heard, and the servant was again sent. She rapped at the door, but received no answer. This circumstance created alarm, in consequence of which the door of his apartment was broken open. Here a shocking spectacle presented itself:—The body of Sir Richard Croft was lying on the bed, shockingly mangled; his arms extended over his breast, and a pistol in each hand. One of the pistols had been loaded with slugs, the other with ball. Both were discharged, and the head of the unfortunate gentleman was literally blown to pieces.

Drs. Latham and Baillie, and Mr. Finch, proved that the deceased had, since the death of the Princess Charlotte, laboured under mental distress. He had repeatedly been heard to say, that "this lamentable circumstance weighed heavy upon his mind, and he should never get over it."

Mr. Finch said he was well aware that the deceased was labouring under a derangement of intellect for a considerable time past, and he should not have reposed trust in him on any occasion, since the lamented catastrophe alluded to.

The Jury, which was summoned at eight o'clock, having heard the whole of the evidence adduced, retired about ten, after the Coroner (Mr. Stirling) had summed up the evidence with suitable comments. About eleven o'clock the Jury returned the following verdict:—"The deceased destroyed himself while in a fit of temporary derangement."

Mrs. Thackeray, we are happy to state, was safely delivered about eight o'clock on Friday morning by Mr. Herbert, an occasional Assistant of Sir Richard Croft. The Lady was kept ignorant of the fatal event, and is in a fair way of doing well.

About ten o'clock a hearse arrived, to convey the body to the house of the deceased, in old Burlington-street. He was in his 57th year. Lady Croft, who survives him, has been for some time in a very delicate state of health. Her Ladyship is a daughter of the late Dr. Denman, and sister of Mr. Denman, the Barrister, who so greatly distinguished himself on the late State Trials at Derby. He has also left three sons and a daughter. One of the sons is in the army, in which he served with great éclat in the late war on the Continent.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Monday, Feb. 9.

THE KING v. HILBERS AND CLEASBY.

Mr. MARRYAT shewed cause against a rule obtained on a former day, for a criminal information or informations against the defendants, for having entered into a conspiracy to buy up all the oil, and by that monopoly raised the price of oil of that description to 60*l.* a ton.

After Counsel had been heard on the other side, the Court determined against the rule, on the ground that facts had not been shown sufficient to justify the granting an information.—Rule discharged.

Tuesday, Feb. 10.

THE KING v. A. THISTLEWOOD.

The defendant was brought into Court in custody.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—My Lords, an attachment was issued against a person of the name of Arthur Thistlewood, upon articles of the peace, for sending a challenge to my Lord Sidmouth. He is now brought up, and I humbly move your Lordship that he be charged with these articles.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH—Mr. Barlow, ask the defendant whether he has any bail.

MR. BARLOW—Have you any bail, Mr. Thistlewood?

The Defendant—I was only taken last night, and did not know the amount I was to bail in. What is the amount of the bail you want?

MR. BARLOW—You will be told presently.

The Judges here consulted for a moment, after which LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, Mr. Barlow, tell the defendant to find bail to keep the peace, himself in 600*l.* and two sureties in 300*l.* each. Here the Defendant appeared much surprised and irritated, and exclaimed, "that is very excessive bail."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH—What does he say, Mr. Barlow?

The Defendant—That it is very excessive bail.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH—Ask him if he is prepared with any other bail, and in any, or what amount.

MR. BARLOW (to the defendant)—Are you prepared with any bail?

The Defendant, in the same tone and manner, accompanied by a significant shake of his head towards the Court, answered—"I was only taken last night, how could I be prepared with bail when I did not know the amount?"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—My Lords, a Bill of Indictment has been found by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, against the defendant, for sending this challenge. He has been summoned to answer to it, and I now humbly move your Lordships that he be charged with the indictment.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH—Let the indictment be read.

MR. BARLOW now read the indictment, which was the same in all respects as the common indictment for sending a challenge, and contained three counts.

MR. BARLOW—Do you plead guilty or not guilty?

The Defendant—Guilty.

Mr. BARLOW—My Lord, he pleads guilty.

The Judges here consulted again for a short time.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—Let the defendant be committed to the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea, and be brought up to receive the judgment of this Court, on the last day of the present Term.

Thursday, Feb. 12.

THE KING v. ARTHUR THISTLEWOOD.

When Mr. Thistlewood was before the Court on Tuesday, an indictment was preferred against him for having written a challenge to Lord Sidmouth, to which he pleaded Guilty, and was ordered to be brought up for judgment. It is morning, accordingly he was brought up, when the Attorney-General moved for judgment.

The Defendant being called on to say whether he had anything to address to the Court, he proceeded to read a written paper, which stated, that when he last appeared before their Lordships, being ignorant of the usual forms of the Court, and not being aware, that to entitle him to go before a Jury, he should have pleaded Not Guilty, he had pleaded Guilty. Since that time he had seen a copy of the indictment, and found he was there charged with having been actuated by malice in his conduct towards Lord Sidmouth. He begged leave to deny that charge, and now had to request their Lordships would afford him an opportunity of going to trial, by permitting him to withdraw his plea of Guilty, and allowing him to plead anew Not Guilty.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, if it should appear to the Court that the plea of Guilty had been made through inadvertence, he would not oppose the defendant's application.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—(After consulting with the Court)—It is the opinion of the Court, that on the consent which the Attorney-General has given, the defendant ought to be permitted to withdraw his former plea, and plead to the indictment de novo.

Mr. BARLOW—As soon as you are provided with bail, you must give due notice, when you will be brought up to the Judges' Chambers.

The Defendant then withdrew in the custody of the Tipstaff.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Friday, Feb. 13.

FRANCIS v. STEPHEN GEARY WILKES.

The plaintiff is a clerk in the Post-Office, with a salary of 300*l.* a year; the defendant, a medical practitioner, now in prison for debt. The plaintiff was married to his wife, whose maiden name was Hannah Lester, in May, 1812, of which marriage they had issue two children.

Mr. George Caster married a sister of Mrs. Frances. The plaintiff was 25 years of age when they were married, and his wife 20. Witness resided with them a year and a half after their marriage. Their conduct to each other was most affectionate. Saw the defendant at the house of the plaintiff, where he staid for six weeks. Does not know whether Dr. Wilkes resided in the plaintiff's house as a physician or as a lodger, but he attended upon the lady during her illness. Mr. Frances was absent from home every day, attending his duty.

Mr. Henry Banks married another sister of Mrs. Frances. They lived most happily together. Witness perceived the extraordinary conduct of the defendant, endeavouring to warp the affections of the lady at a time she appeared to be hardly sane. Witness communicated his suspicions to the husband. Mr. Frances thereupon requested the defendant would immediately leave his house, which he did. Witness left the house in Charlotte-street, accompanied by Mrs. Frances, who agreed to go to his house at Tunbridge, with a view to promote her recovery. She staid at Tunbridge only four days, and on her return eloped with the defendant.

Several other witnesses were examined as to the criminal intercourse between the defendant and Mrs. Frances; their living together as man and wife, at No. 5, Joiner-street, Westminster-road, and being seen by a female attendant in bed together.

Mr. ANDREWS, for the defendant, drew from the witnesses, on cross-examination, that since the elopement in question, the Doctor being still in prison, the plaintiff had, from motives of tenderness for the disordered state of his wife's mind, caused her to be again taken under his (the husband's) care and protection, and that she now resided at his country house, in confinement, with proper attendants. Mr. Andrews commented upon these circumstances, as shewing the husband had not that sense of injury which could be considered so irreparable, since he was content to take back his wife. He laid great stress on the extreme poverty of the defendant, and the situation in which he was received into the plaintiff's family, the wife and he being daily left alone together.

Mr. Justice DALLAS reprobated the conduct of the defendant, upholding the principle of law, that "he who could not pay in purse must be made to pay in person."

The Jury, without retiring, found for the plaintiff—Damages, 500*l.*

CONSISTORY COURT.

Friday, Feb. 13.

LADY KIRKWALL v. LORD KIRKWALL.

Sir W. SCOTT gave judgment this day in the above, being a suit of divorce instituted by Lady Kirkwall against Lord Kirkwall, on the ground of adultery. The Learned Judge observed, that the facts of the adultery were fully proved; the Court therefore pronounced for the separation.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

DREADFUL MURDERS AT GREENWICH.

Two most barbarous murders were discovered on Sunday, at Greenwich, of Mr. Bird and his housekeeper, who resided near the Mitre. Mr. Bird was 70, and had resided many years at Greenwich, as a tallow-chandler, by which he acquired sufficient to retire and live upon his income. His wife died about two years ago, since which no person has resided with him but his housekeeper. He was a constant attendant at Greenwich Church, accompanied by his housekeeper. Sunday morning it was noticed that they were not in their seats as usual. At the conclusion of the service, the shutters of the house not having been opened, the Beadle and others went there, and receiving no answer, forced the door. On entering the passage, a shocking spectacle presented itself; the body of the housekeeper was found near the street-door, her head drove in and cut open dreadfully. In a parlour adjoining the body of Mr. Bird was found, with his arms stretched and his forehead drove in about an inch deep, and the wound as large as a crown piece. It is supposed that Mr. Bird was passing his evening, as was his constant practice, in reading; and that, on hearing the attack on his housekeeper in the passage, he left his fire-side to proceed to her assistance, as his body was found between the fireplace and the door of the room, with his spectacles close to one hand, and a candle close to the other. The horrid discovery created a very considerable degree of agitation; and Mr. Bicknell, the Solicitor, sent off an express to Bow-street for assistance; and Adkins and Lavender arrived with all possible speed, and proceeded to examine the premises, and to endeavour to find suspicious characters, but without being able to discover any thing to lead to a discovery. In a drawer, which had not been opened, were found Bank-notes to the amount of 31*l.*, which were ascertained to be the amount of a dividend he received at the Bank the 20th ult. The murderers also left four silver salts, several spoons, and a soup-ladle. On the intelligence being communicated to Mr. Bird's son, he hastened to the house, where his grief and distraction, on viewing the body of his deceased father, may be better imagined than described.

Monday morning a Coroner's Inquest was held at the White Hart Tavern, Greenwich. The Jury went to take a view of the bodies. They next took a view of the premises:—A brick wall, about 11 feet high, divides the deceased's garden from another in the rear called Powis's garden. In Powis's garden the marks of many footsteps were traced; the tile of a summer-house lay on the ground, and appeared to be newly broken by some person in climbing the wall, as the marks of footsteps appeared quite plain on the mould in the deceased's garden. In this garden the old gentleman chiefly passed the day, and took much delight in beautifying it. Two bottles, which appeared to have been recently emptied, and a tobacco-pipe, lay on the parlour table, having the marks of blood on them, from whence it is conjectured the murderer or murderers must have regaled themselves. The Jury returned to their room, and adjourned till seven o'clock in the evening. The Jury re-assembled at 7 o'clock on Monday night, and the following evidence was adduced—Mr. F. Finch, surgeon, swore that the wounds in his opinion were inflicted with a bricklayer's hammer.—Mr. D. Thomas sworn—I reside next door to the deceased. On Sunday, about a quarter before one o'clock, the brother of the deceased, Mr. Bird, called at my house, and said he wished to get into his brother's house, which was locked up. He told me that his brother's hair-dresser was ordered to attend upon the deceased on that morning at nine o'clock, and he had found the house closed, and he wished to see if they were gone out as he suspected. The deceased's brother wished to get over my yard, which leads to the deceased's back-door: he did so. Efforts had been previously made to get in at the front-door, by knocking at it and ringing. The parties who endeavoured to get in were, Mr. Buér, Mr. Richard Bird (deceased's brother,) Smith, the Beadle, and many others. I went round to the back of the house with some other persons, and opened the kitchen window by forcing the shutters. I then entered at the window, and went to the back-door, unlatched and unbolted it, and let several persons in. We walked towards the stairs, and there I saw the body of Mary Simmons, lying at the bottom of the stairs, on her back, quite dead, her head beat in a most dreadful manner, and a vast quantity of blood on the floor which had issued from the wounds. It nearly reached to our shoe tops. In the front parlour I saw Mr. Bird lying on the floor; his wig was off; on one side of him lay his spectacles, which were broken. On the table lay a pocket-book, with some papers in it, and a Lottery Ticket lying on the side of it. A candle and stick stood on the ground. A pen-knife lay on the floor by his right hand breeches pocket. There was no watch in his fob-pocket. I remarked the fire which was in the kitchen; the coal on it appeared to have been put on within five hours; it was not burnt at all. The fire would have lasted an hour or two longer. The female, Simmons, lay with her head against the stairs, and her feet towards the front door. The banisters of the stairs were broken. I went up stairs; the beds appeared not to have been lain in. Some of the bed-furnitures were bloody. The drawers were all open, and the articles thrown out on the floor; some of them were also bloody.—Juryman—It appears that the perpetrators of the murders entered the house on Saturday night before ten o'clock, and remained there until the watch was gone off their duty on the next (Sunday) morning.—Witness continued—The face of Simmons was covered with blood, and appeared to have lain face downwards in a gore of blood, and had been turned afterwards face upwards; her pockets had not been rifled.—Mr. William Buér, butcher, sworn—I was with the last witness when he entered the house, and his evidence is perfectly correct and true.—Sarah, wife of William Brodie, sworn—I was passing by the house of the deceased on Saturday night, about a quarter past ten o'clock, and saw the gate before Mr. Bird's house open, and a woman with a boy standing before it. Mr. Bird's street-door was a little open; I discovered it by the lamp which was lighted. I was going to a butcher's to buy some meat. When I returned from the butcher's, the woman was gone. The woman had a black bonnet on. I had no conception she belonged to the house.—*Mr. Bicknell, an Attorney, went to the house of the deceased about half-past one o'clock on Sunday afternoon, and searched to find the weapon which the wounds had been inflicted with. He searched all over the house, but could not find any thing like it. In the attic, he found lying on the floor a Bank of England 12. note. There was a trunk on the floor, which had been rifled. It appeared that some person had sat on a chair which stood near the trunk, and had turned over every article in the trunk. There was also a number of letters lying about in confusion. A Bank Stock receipt was lying on the bed. The bed had not been lain in since it had been made up; but there was an impression which appeared to have been caused by some one sitting on it. At this point of the investigation the Beadle told the Coroner that the watchman of London-street, (the street in which the deceased resided), named Sidney, had found a candle and stick in the cellar of the deceased's house, placed under a wooden utensil, apparently for the purpose of setting fire to the house, and was supposed to be placed there after the murders were committed. The brother of Simmons, who works at the cement-manufactory, Bankside, went down to Greenwich on Monday, and stated, that his sister had in her box, to his knowledge, seven guineas and some silver. It is supposed that gold, silver, and bills, were stolen by the villains, belonging to Mr. Bird, to a great amount. The CORONER said, that no evidence had been adduced to fix the murder on any particular person; and if the Jury thought proper, as it was late (11 o'clock at night), he would adjourn the Inquest to a future day.—The Jury were of opinion such a proceeding would be best, and it was adjourned accordingly. The Jury entered into recognizances of 40*l.* each, to appear at the time appointed to renew the investigation.*

The Magistrate, Mr. Smith, and two others, have used great exertions to discover the diabolical villains. Officers and Constables were dispatched by them to every public-house in the neighbourhood, to inquire if any suspicious characters had been seen about the time the murders are supposed to have been committed. Several persons of bad character were apprehended on Monday, and, after being examined, discharged. On Monday night, Lavender and Vickery arrived with one Turner, whom they had apprehended on suspicion. He was examined, when it appeared that he lives on Blackheath, and is a dealer in contraband goods; and that he was out with his horse and cart about the time of the murders. When the Officers took him they found blood on his clothes. His examination lasted an hour and a half. There was a wound on his eye, which he accounted for in the following manner:—On Sunday night he was going over the heath, and was beat by three men. One witness swore that he saw the prisoner with the blood on his clothes on Sunday morning, and then he had no wound over his eye. The prisoner being a bricklayer, that was one ground of suspicion; a bricklayer's hammer being the instrument used to murder the unfortunate persons. Several witnesses proved the prisoner was at home at nine and eleven o'clock on Saturday night; and the Magistrates not being of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to detain him, ordered him to be set at liberty.—Discharged accordingly.

An adjourned Inquest took place on Wednesday, when Hannah Cooper deposed, that about half-past eight on Saturday night she was passing by the deceased's house, and saw a woman standing at the door, talking to a man of middling stature. Mr. Bird (the deceased) came to the door, and was speaking to the deceased Mary Simmons; the door was then nearly wide open. On passing again on her return home, the door was shut, and all seemed quiet. When she first passed she did not see his face, and could not swear to the man: he appeared to be talking to the deceased's servant, as if asking for some explanation.—R. Pickett, a patrol, said he went on duty about eight that evening; he passed then by the deceased's door; it was shut, and he did not observe any suspicious persons.—R. Durant, carter in the King's Yard, said, between 10 and 11 o'clock on Sunday morning, in going up the road by the house, he saw some drops of blood, and shortly after met a man in a very bloody condition, who had a cut on his right eye. He asked him how he came by it. He made no answer. Witness then went before him, and looked in his face: he was all over mud; and he asked him what had happened to him. He said he was in the mud, and that he was dam'd hungry; and at the same time he was eating a piece of plum-cake. Witness kept up with him for about a mile, and should know him again. He had on a long-coat, gaiters, and an oil-skin on his hat; he had no bundle: he was a broad-cheeked man, with high cheek-bones, and appeared to be about 32 years of age: he should know him again: from his head to foot was all blood; his coat pocket was drenched in blood, and he kept bleeding all along. Witness did not ask him whence the blood proceeded. A number of people passed at the time, who noticed him, but passed without saying any thing. He had full eyebrows and whiskers. He was a rough-spun blade; appeared in liquor, and much exhausted.—[Here the Coroner sent a Constable for a piece of cake that was at the house of the deceased. It was produced to this witness, who said it was similar to what the man was eating.]—He had a black beard; was a stout-made man; but did not give more than three or four answers to witness's questions: he had not the appearance of a butcher. A woman passed him, and said, "You have been after no good." He went on, and made no answer. No person attempted to stop him. Witness had not heard of the murder at the time, but gave information on Monday morning, as soon as he heard of the murder, and did not hear of the reward till last night. The man wore a dark bottle-green coat, which was close buttoned.—[Here a Gentleman handed a card to the Coroner, with the name of Mr. Lynch, residing in Parker's-row, Bermondsey, who informed him of meeting with a man in a singular bloody condition, as described by the last witness.]—Witness continued.—I walked with him from the St. Helena Gate to the Europa, about a mile. I cannot tell what colour his gaiters were, but they were as high as his knees, and completely covered with black mud; he had no buckles in his shoes. The morning was foggy, and a kind of frost; and there was a whitish dust on his hat.—Here the Jury, after consulting about half an hour, again adjourned.

Mr. Smith, Colonel Foreman, and Mr. Collingwood, examined the foot-marks in Mr. B.'s and the adjoining garden, which were satisfactorily accounted for; and it seems to be the prevailing opinion, that the assassins must have entered by the front door. In one of the rooms, in which were signs that the villains had sat down, were left on a table some beef, mutton, and the end of a loaf, on which they appear to have regaled after committing the bloody deed.

On Friday afternoon, the Jury assembled for the third time; when Mr. Westley, of Bermondsey, stated, that on his return from Church, between twelve and one o'clock on Sunday, he met a man near the Swan Turnpike, in Blue Anchor-road, whose hands and face were cut and extremely bloody, as were the skirts of his coat, which was green; the latter appeared to be caused by something with which his pocket was stuffed, and from which the blood appeared to issue. His breeches had also several spots of blood on them.—J. Lynch, of Arthur's-row, Bermondsey, also described the same man, whom he saw about the same time, and added, that he advised him to go home, but he made no reply.—Elizabeth Oldridge also met a man of the same description coming out of a field near the Swan Turnpike-gate: he walked a few paces, and went back again. —Metcalfe, a waterman, of Queen's Head-alley, said, about half-past seven on Sunday morning he ferried a man from Execution Dock, and landed him at Elephant Stairs; he was bloody, and had lost two fingers off his right hand. They did not appear to have been recently amputated; he appeared much in liquor, and no doubt was the person described by the former witnesses.—J. Armstrong, an Officer of Worship-street, said, "I went with my son to the Unicorn, in Shoreditch, when — Mansfield, who was in the tap-room, said, he was the man who was mentioned in the Newspapers, and wished to give himself up, for the purpose of giving an explanation. No Magistrate being in the Office, I took him to Mr. Dyer's house, and he said he lived in Peerless-place, City-road; he had lost his two fingers, and was bruised on the nose. I searched his house, and found nothing suspicious; but his clothes had been washed. He said he was in liquor the preceding night, in St. Catherine's, where he had been very ill-used; but how he crossed the water he could not tell."—Here the CORONER remarked to the Jury, that as this man was in custody of the Police, it was unnecessary to examine the officer further. It was greatly to be lamented that so little light had as yet been thrown on the manner how the unfortunate persons came by their death. If you should be inclined to think it necessary to have the man now in custody brought before you, I shall adjourn the Jury; but I think this unnecessary, as the Police will do their duty.—The Jury then, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of—Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown.

On Saturday week, Mr. Waring James, eldest son of Joseph James, Esq. of Esher, left Kingston about six o'clock in the evening, to return to his father's house. His servant drove him in a gig; at the end of the town he mistook a light in a barge on the river for one in the houses; and, in consequence of this error, the vehicle was precipitated over the wharf into the river. The servant was saved by the people in the barge; but Mr. James being encumbered with a thick box-coat, could not swim, and before assistance could be obtained, sunk to rise no more. This afflicting accident, it is said, would not have occurred, had the Corporation of Kingston taken care to fence the side of a wharf, which has before this been proved to be most dangerous. A short time after the above catastrophe, a gentleman's carriage, with the family in it, was within a yard of being driven down the same precipice. Mr. James's servant was driving a foot-pace, and the gig had lights.

A melancholy circumstance occurred on Saturday week, in the Bank-up Post-coach, on its journey from Liverpool to Birmingham.—A young woman, apparently, about 14 or 15 years of age, and in the last stage of a consumption, had been advised to try the effect of her native air, and was proceeding for that purpose in company with her grandmother. After travelling upwards of 40 miles she became quite exhausted, not having been enabled to take any breakfast at Knutsford. On their arrival at the next stage she took a little milk, and shortly afterwards reclined on the arm of her grandmother to sleep, in which state she expired, without a struggle or a groan! So unconscious was her grandmother of her departure, that she only became acquainted with it on the approach of the coach to Newcastle, when a gentleman who till then had been asleep, perceived the alteration in the young woman: the feelings of her grandmother may be conceived; her distress and anguish it is impossible to describe. On the coach stopping at Newcastle, a medical man was sent for, and though he perceived that life was extinct, he directed the body to be put into a warm bed, as a means of trial whether animation could by possibility be restored, but it is said that, to the astonishment as well as indignation of the passengers and spectators, the landlord of the inn objected to receive the body, and, after consulting with a neighbouring Magistrate, obliged the coachman to drive on, notwithstanding the entreaties of the passengers. As it was, the coach proceeded to Stone, where, on its arrival at the Bell and Bear, Mr. Goddard, the master, immediately directed the body to be removed to his private house.

Mr. Lawrence Dundas, second son of the Member for York, was found dead on Parker's-piece, a field close to the town of Cambridge, on Friday week. It appears that from the darkness of the night he fell into the ditch which separates the field from the public road, and that being unable to extricate himself, he died through the inclemency of the weather.

Mr. Gadd, a grocer, in Union-street, Berkeley-square, after eating a hearty breakfast on Sunday morning, attended Divine Service with his wife at Sloan-street Chapel, and, whilst in the act of joining in singing a hymn, fell down and instantly became a corpse.

At one o'clock on Monday, a man about 60 years of age, passing through Duke's-court, St. Martin's-lane, was seized with a fit of apoplexy, and expired in about a quarter of an hour. It is found, that the person's name is Woodhouse, who resided at Brentford, and who formerly kept a dyer's shop in Maiden-lane.

APPALLING CIRCUMSTANCE.—On Tuesday morning a female was accidentally discovered in a cellar in Harrington, dying from absolute want. On Friday sechnight a distress was made on her for arrears of rent, amounting only to twelve shillings, under which authority the bed and every article of furniture were seized; the little grate torn from its place, and the poor wretch left on the bare flags, without food, fire, or covering! In this desolate situation, in a state of insensibility, she was discovered. Medical aid was sought, and every possible relief administered; but all proved too late. She expired at three o'clock in the afternoon.—Liverpool Advertiser.

THERE is a body of men in the House of Commons, who are sometimes spoken of with great gravity and respect as the solidest part of the representation, and often alluded to with levity as no very profound persons, for whose especial benefit Latin quotations are to be translated. We mean the Members known by the appellation of country-gentlemen. The class however is of a very miscellaneous description, and generally speaking has very doubtful pretensions to this title,—at least in its old acceptation. That they are not remarkable for wisdom, however, is certain; and it is equally true, that the majority of them are alternately corrupted and frightened by the boroughmongers, according as the question they are to vote upon are supposed to be matters of personal indifference or alarm. If they see no immediate danger to their interests, they are heartily willing to say Aye, out of mere ignorance of the subject; and if they fancy they do, they are terrified into compliance by alarms about revolution, out of a credulity equally short-sighted.

Let us not confound however the mongrel breed with the true. The great majority of the real country-gentlemen will be found, upon inspection, not to be on the very worst and most trusting side of corruption; though at the same time this great and real majority will dwindle to a very small number,—exceedingly small certainly to what it ought to be in a House of Representatives.

It is no news to tell the reader that the race of middle country gentlemen, who used to form so useful and indeed noble a link between the upper class and the peasantry, has long been extinct in this country. This was the consequence of the ascendancy of mere money-getting, the union it formed with mere power, and the precious game those two have been playing ever since with their jobs and their wars. As the money-getters rose, and the taxes pressed, the middle gentry disappeared;—they were gradually withered where they grew, or transplanted to the metropolis where they were compelled to change their nature. There was a talk then, as there still is in some obstinate quarters which think to browbeat us with their egotism when their argument or their principle is no longer held worth a rush, of a certain amiable and silvery return of these taxes in “fertilizing showers.” They have certainly not fertilized the domains of the gentry in question, nor indeed any others in this country;—no, not a jot more than the clouds which go over our heads to drop fatness among the Germans. The smoke which reeks out of our chimneys returns to us just as much; and a considerable addition to the town smoke is just what the country has gained by the extinction of this once illustrious body of Englishmen. For every half dozen flimsy houses which the pedestrian passes in the suburbs, he may reckon upon the loss of a solid family house in the country, or at least upon its being occupied by a lawyer, an apothecary, a distiller, a methodist parson, or some other such fattener upon the distresses of the community.

Of this class therefore we are to look for none in the House of Commons, though we may find some of their grandsons and great-grandsons there in other shapes. An investigation into the other class would make a curious treatise, and be worth a good deal as an illustration of the changes of manners and fortunes. It may be divided perhaps into landholders who have merged into the peerage, landholders who remain as they were, and adventurers in trade or office who have been enabled to succeed to the property of those whom their system has ruined. The first are of course in the House of Lords, and form part of the boroughmongers there who kindly take the trouble of representation out of the hands of the people. Of this class is Lord LONSDALE (LOWTHER of Lowther), the greatest boroughmonger in England. Of the second is Mr. COKE of Norfolk, the HEATHCOTE and SHELLEY families, and a few others, who are chiefly on the side of the Whigs. Of the third are the Dutch family of the VANSITTARTS, who give us Ministers; and the late GEORGE ROSE, who acquired a large property in Hampshire by having places and sinecures in London. There are a great number of these spurious country gentlemen in Parliament, many of whom have usurped the places of the others without succeeding to their interest in the soil; that is to say, who make a great show with mansions and a little park or so, but have the chief of their property in the funds and foreign adventures. There is Sir WILLIAM CURTIS, who, if he could have carried on his biscuit-baking a little more surreptitiously, and not manifested himself to us so gloriously as an Alderman, might have passed for as honest and blunt a country gentleman as any of them, especially as he knows so little of Latin, or English either.

On the other hand, there is a celebrated Member of Parliament, whom the Ministerial jobbers and the degenerates of the cause of Reform have delighted, from a conscious knowledge of the reverse, to represent as a mere lawyer and adventurer; but whose talent in reality lies in statistics, and who is of one of those ancient English families, which, like the HAMPTONS, CONGREVES, and MILTONS, share their names with their native places.—BROUGHAM of Brougham. This Gentleman, with a spirit worthy of his descent, as well as abilities, is at this very moment contesting the representation of his native county, Westmoreland, of which Brougham is a town, with the dictatorship of the LOWTHERS, who have so long ruled it with a rod of Treasury gold, and made such a dull as well as corrupt business of the matter in Parliament. They have in fact long ceased to be representatives of the Commons part of the county. They are Peers and Peerlings, very rich and very borough-mongering, with an influence which reduces the whole business at last to a mere personal feeling of the aristocratic and all-ruling, and which would degrade the inhabitants of this one free, happy, and plentiful soil to the condition of subjects of a Venetian oligarchy, to which indeed the State has long had a considerable resemblance.

How far Mr. BROUGHAM will succeed, we know not; that is to say, we know not whether sufficient English spirit has been left in the county of Westmoreland to inspire the inhabitants with energy to resist dictation as well as impatience to feel it. The times must surely have done much to enlighten them; and Mr. BROUGHAM, we trust, will do his part to keep their eyes open. But this we know, and this we must say to all the gentry of England, that unless they really rouse themselves as he has done, and keep up to the mark as we hope he will do,—above all, if they do not get some feelings out of the pale of this and that party, and cultivate some real enthusiasm on its own account for the country and the people, an inevitable convulsion will infallibly reach them as well as every one else, small landholders as well as great fundholders, and tear every species of property out of their hands, like weapons of which they are unworthy.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, FEB. 12.—A pistol-shot was fired at the carriage of Lord Wellington on the 10th, at one o'clock in the morning, as his Grace was returning to his hotel. Neither his Grace nor the carriage was struck by the ball, which has not been found, though search was made for it. At the moment when the shot was fired, the servant behind the carriage saw in the dusk a man who fled, and whom he immediately lost sight of. The two sentries, who were then under the grand entrance of the hotel, immediately set off in pursuit of the man whom the servant had seen; but they could not overtake him. The Police has in consequence made most active exertions, and they have already, it is said, obtained such information as will put them in the way of discovering the author of this horrible attempt.

FEB. 14.—For these two days past there has been a guard of gendarmerie at the hotel of the Duke of Wellington, and under the orders of the Noble Lord; but his Grace rides out, as usual, without any escort. The Duke of Wellington continued to receive, yesterday, visits from the Members of the Diplomatic Body, and from the most distinguished persons in the capital. Their Excellencies the Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Police repaired on Thursday morning to the hotel of the Duke of Wellington. M. the Count de Cazes remained there a long time. The trial of the pretended Dauphin still proceeds at Rouen. Innumerable witnesses prove the plebeian origin of this impostor; and still more is it proved by the gross and vulgar answers of Bruneau himself.

GERMANY.

FRANKFORT, FEB. 9.—The Count de Goltz, the Prussian Minister, has made a declaration to the Germanic Diet of the highest interest, respecting the 13th article of the treaty agreed upon by the Congress of Vienna. He announces in this declaration, that the King of Prussia has promised to give to his people a constitution, and that he is firmly resolved to fulfil his promise. He details, however, the obstacles which have hitherto prevented his Majesty from carrying his determination into effect, and which still operate to cause a delay for some time longer. The Prussian Minister adds, that his Majesty proposes to establish, for the present, Provincial States, and that in about a year he will make a declaration respecting the then state of affairs.

HAMBURG, FEB. 13.—Several letters received to-day from Copenhagen, announce the death of his Majesty the King of Sweden.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, FEB. 3.—Our venerable Monarch, now nearly 70 years old, has been attacked by a disorder which proceeds from weakness of the stomach and indigestion. His Royal Highness the Crown Prince, actuated by his peculiar tender care for his Majesty, has sat up a night by his bed-side. Public prayers, at which the public attend in great numbers, are daily offered up in the chapel of the palace for his Majesty's speedy recovery.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 16.

PETITION OF PHILIP DRUMMOND.

The Earl of CARNARVON presented a Petition from Philip Drummond of Manchester, reed-maker, which was objected to as not being worded "the humble Petition," &c. but was at length allowed to be read. It stated, that he was present at a meeting at Manchester for the purpose of petitioning the Regent against the Suspension Bill. He was speaking, when a troop of horse riotously broke in and dispersed them; that he was seized and sent to the prison at Manchester, where he had only one ounce of cheese and four ounces of bread for the day. He was then hurried off to London, fastened to another prisoner by a chain of 30lbs. weight, when he was taken before Lord Sidmouth, who told him he should have a fair trial. Instead of which, he was sent to Dorchester, then to Exeter, and in December was set at liberty on his recognizance. He had finally solicited an interview with Lord Sidmouth, who declined seeing him; and he concluded by praying the House to take his sufferings into consideration, and not pass a Bill of Indemnity.

The Noble Earl said, he should move on a future day that the Petition be referred to the Secret Committee.—Adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

FINANCE.

On the committal of the thirty millions Exchequer Bills Bill, a conversation arose, in which Lord LIVERPOOL said, that, including the Sinking Fund, the Revenue of the nation was more than sufficient to cover all charges.—Lord LAUDERDALE remarked, that the Sinking Fund was nearly 15 millions, but that Fund was merely nominal, as it did not discharge a shilling of the debt.—To which Lord LIVERPOOL replied, that he differed in opinion with the Noble Lord.

PETITIONS.

Lord HOLLAND presented Petitions from John Knight, of Manchester, and Joseph Mitchell, of Liverpool, both praying for redress for the evils they had suffered under the Suspension Act. Mr. Mitchell, in his Petition, detailed the history of Oliver's conduct towards him, who had visited him in prison as a reformer, on which occasions, he (the Petitioner) was fetched by a turnkey into the Governor's house, where his interviews with Oliver took place.—Lord H. said, that many of the Petitioner's allegations could be proved by creditable persons.—The Petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Lord CARNARVON made various observations, remarking, that the difference between the conduct of Ministers and the Petitioners was this,—the latter demanded trial, and that if guilty, their guilt should openly appear to the country; while Ministers demanded a trial indeed, but it was in their own dark chamber, before judges of their own appointment—(Hear, hear!)—He moved, that the Petitions of Drummond and the others, who had been confined on suspicion of treason, should be referred to the Secret Committee.

Lord SIDMOUTH declared, that Ministers claimed no Bill of Indemnity for their asserted rigorous treatment of the petitioners, but to keep concealed their sources of information. Those who felt aggrieved should complain to the laws, and they would obtain redress, if they merited it. As to that much-injured man, Oliver, the main features of the late disturbances were developed, before Ministers had heard of his name.—There were no grounds for the motion.

Earl GROSVENOR contended, that the Petitions should be examined into, even supposing they contained not a word of truth: but the Indemnity Bill, he believed, would shelter even Magistrates and Jailers from all responsibility.

Lord KING believed, that if the Petitions were referred to the Committee, it would be seen that great injustice had been done; but Ministers would allow of no fair inquiry: they were Judges, party, and witnesses.

Earl BATURST observed, that the Act of Indemnity would not protect persons who had been guilty of cruelty in the detention of prisoners—it would not prevent an action on that ground.

Lord LIVERPOOL maintained that the Secret Committee had not been formed on party views—(Hear)—though he certainly should not chuse to submit his conduct to the judgment of the Noble Lords opposite.—(Hear, and laughter)—The grounds of complaint were, illegal imprisonment,—which was the very power conferred by the Suspension;—and cruel treatment, which, if proved, the Indemnity Bill would not screen those implicated.

Lord HOLLAND said, that if he were allowed the opportunity, he pledged himself to make out a better case against Oliver, than Ministers had last year made out against the Country—(Hear, hear!)—though all the mischiefs might not be traced to his acts. Nothing but a paramount necessity could justify the resorting to such revolting, hazardous, and abominable agency. He would predict, that as Ministers had procured a grant of extraordinary powers, they would now obtain protection for having abused them.

The motion was put and negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 20.

At one o'clock Lord Sidmouth presented additional Papers, on the subject of the late Insurrection, contained in a green bag, which were referred to the Secret Committee.

The 30,000,000*l.* Exchequer Bills Bill, and the Malt Duty Bill were read a third time and passed.

Lord KING moved for a Return of the number of persons executed for forgery, from the year 1792 to the latest period at which the same can be made up.—Ordered.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 16.

A Petition was received from Attornies practising in the Courts of Westminster against the practice of irregular Conveyancers.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord STANLEY presented a Petition from Lancashire, praying for the repeal of the Corn Bill, for a Parliamentary Reform, and for the dismissal of the Ministers.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the Bill for regulating Chimney Sweepers. A clause was introduced by Mr. Bennet, for abolishing, after the 1st of May, 1819, the practice of sweeping chimneys by any person under twenty-one years of age; and another by Sir George Clerk, extending the Bill to Scotland.

PETITION OF JOHN BAGULEY.

Mr. BENNET presented a Petition from John Baguley, complaining of his sufferings under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It alleged that the Petitioner had been heavily ironed for one month after his arrest, and prayed that no Act of Indemnity should be passed.

Mr. BROUGHAM thought it was due to the House that some one of the Right Hon. Gentlemen would state whether or no the allegations in these Petitions were true. The present Petitioner alleged that he was kept in irons for one month. The infliction of such sufferings was never contemplated by the law; the power given by the legislature was to detain in safe custody. The Petition was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRICK presented two Petitions from persons in Nottingham and Lancashire, praying that no Act of Indemnity might pass. After some further business, the House adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

DELAY IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR called the attention of the House to certain grievances endured in the Northern Counties, arising from the mode of holding the Assizes. By the present system, persons might lie in jail, waiting for trial, from eight to eleven months. Some cases might even hang over for two years. A man charged with manslaughter, an offence punishable with a year's imprisonment, might suffer the whole penalty of guilt before he was brought to trial! He himself knew a case, that of an innocent man charged with stealing game, who had lain in prison for nine months: so that persons might be completely ruined before their innocence was declared. Such a system ought to be put an end to.—Mr. Taylor, after suggesting a plan by which the evils might be remedied, moved an address to the Regent on the subject.

The motion was opposed by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Lord CASTLEREAGH. They admitted that some alteration would be advantageous, but contended that the House was not at present prepared to enter on the subject.—After some further discussion, the motion was withdrawn.

PETITIONS FROM JAMES LEACH AND BENJ. SCHOLLES.

Sir F. BURDETT presented a Petition from James Leach, stating that he had been arrested, carried from place to place, and had suffered various hardships, for which he prayed redress.—Laid on the table.

Mr. BROUGHAM presented another from Benj. Scholes, of Wakefield, in Yorkshire, to which he called the serious attention of the House. The Petitioner was a reputable victualler, who had been apprehended and thrown into the jail of Cambridge, where he remained till January, when he was set at liberty, without any more cause for his liberation than there had been for his detention—(Hear, hear!)—This imprisonment however had ruined him in his business and materially injured his health. The sole reason for these proceedings was, that he had been charged by Oliver and Bradley with having been concerned in seditious meetings held in his own house. Oliver got himself introduced to Scholes, and instigated him to join in violent measures. Scholes upon this threatened to expose him to the Magistrates. Oliver then wrote letters, artfully calling a meeting at the house of Scholes, which however was never held at all.—Mr. B. said, he had enquired, and he believed that Scholes was a man of very good character, who had filled various situations with credit, and had received the thanks of the Magistracy. The Petitioner threw himself on the mercy of the House, and Mr. B. trusted they would not turn a deaf ear to complaints so judiciously urged.—Ordered to be printed.

THE CONFINED PERSONS.

Lord FOLKESTONE hoped the House would pause before they passed a Bill of Indemnity, and examine into the cases of the various Petitioners, who had suffered under the Suspension Act. Bills of Indemnity ought not to be passed as matters of course, for the very fact of asking for them proved that Ministers had abused the laws.—(Hear, hear!)—Some of the grievances detailed might possibly be exaggerated; but persons who had been subjected to irons and to solitary imprisonment would naturally express themselves in strong language. They had been imprisoned and liberated without the ordinary process, by a mode equally unjust and illegal. Ministers had wanted victims, and they seized upon persons of a low rank, because it would not have been safe for them to have laid hold of those who could neither have been imprisoned nor turned out of prison without its causing some noise.—(Hear, hear!)—Nothing that Ministers might allege could do away the necessity of investigation: it was their duty to shew that they had not abused the extraordinary powers with which they had been invested. Lord F., after arguing the matter at considerable length, moved that the Petition of Francis Ward should be referred to a Committee, &c.

Lord CASTLEREAGH opposed the motion. He denied that any unnecessary acts of severity had been committed by Ministers, or that one individual had been arrested on the unsupported evidence of Oliver. Parliament, on a deliberate view of the threatened dangers, had armed Government with due powers, and they had only done their duty. A Bill of Indemnity was not a Bill for the protection of Ministers, but for the protection of individuals who had given information of great importance to the safety of the country; and without such protection, none would venture to give such information. There had been much misrepresentation on the subject. Heavy complaints had been made; but when inquiry had been instituted, it had been found that the prisoners had been very well treated. If any body had been improperly dealt with, let them bring their action in the proper place, and justice would be done; but Parliament should not interfere with what belonged to other parts of our system. The statements of Ward were full of misrepresentations. He had been originally arrested in Nottinghamshire, on suspicion of being concerned in various horrible acts. He had not been imprisoned in a damp room, nor had he been put in irons. He had talked of his "fine feelings being put on the rack," though he had been concerned in the most atrocious crimes, according to the confessions of Josiah Mitchell and Thomas Savage, who said that Ward had offered them money to shoot at various persons, and had paid them for several acts of robbery and spoliation of machinery. He offered a large sum for murdering the Judge at the last Assizes; and however incredible it might seem, assassination was a crime bargained for, and set at a regular price (by the Luddites), like a piece of stocking-work! Whether Ward would be now put on his trial for these things, he (Lord C.) could not say; but the House would be aware of his true character. When the Committee made their Report, the House would be satisfied that Ministers had shewn every forbearance and lenity, consistent with their duty. If the House would not allow secret information to be received and acted on, conspirators could not be detected or punished. To accede to the inquiry demanded would be to abandon those who had given evidence on the faith of concealment to the vindictive attacks of those whom they had detected.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. J. SMITH, of Nottingham, vindicated the conduct of the Nottinghamshire Magistrates; but because Ward's statements might be untrue, and he himself be a man of bad character, were they to neglect all the complaints of the other petitioners?—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. GOULDING spoke to the good conduct of the jailor of Reading.

Sir W. LEMON observed, that though the Noble Lord might or might not have sanctioned the severity complained of, yet it was by no means clear that those employed under him had been blameless. It was therefore their bounden duty to inquire.

Mr. GORDON noticed the case of Baguley, who had averred that he had been plunged in cold water, and was in consequence afflicted with a cold and fever. The jailor of Gloucester stated, that Baguley had used warm not cold water, according to the prison rules; that he had declared he had found it extremely comfortable; that he had been well lodged, and had been allowed a guinea a-week for food.—Mr. G. however thought that inquiry should take place.

Sir W. GUISE was of the same opinion. He also confirmed Mr. Gordon's statement.

Sir F. BURDETT wished to show that the statements made by jailors about their own characters were of little consequence. The Hon. Baronet alluded to the villainous practices of Atis, formerly Governor of Cold-Bath-fields Prison, which he could have clearly proved on a former occasion, had he been allowed. It mattered not whether Ward had a bad or a good character; the real question was, whether he had been justly accused, legally committed, and legally treated under that commitment. The Noble Secretary's characteristic mildness had been before urged as a reason for granting extraordinary power, and now for stifling enquiry. So this individual character was to supersede the principles of the Constitution and of law, when the power granted him had been so shamefully, disgracefully, cruelly, and illegally applied. Some of the jailors had expressed their sorrow at being ordered to use unnecessary rigour. Why was not Ogden's case investigated? Why was not the assertion that two men had been chained together, even in bed, contradicted? Was the production of a letter any answer to the general claim? When the Suspension Bill was brought forward, Ministers talked of their responsibility, and appeared almost to lament their so great a burden cast upon them; and when he proposed to lighten it by certain restrictions, he was told, that would be an imputation on Lord Sidmouth's character, and that it was impossible so kind-hearted a man as he could consent to any cruelties! The Noble Lord, (Castlereagh) when he wished to shield his own acts, selected a Committee, of which he himself was a Member. The illegality of letting the unfortunate men out of prison on the mockery of their own recognizance, was as great as the illegality of committing them. Magna Charta had become obsolete, as well as the Petition of Rights, which declared that no arbitrary imprisonments should be allowed without information upon oath and subsequent trial.

Mr. WILBERFORCE thought it a great mistake to suppose that Ward's character was of no consequence, as if he had stated what was untrue, as was evident, he had no right to demand investigation, unless indeed that he might be deservedly punished. If any truth could be sifted out from the Petitions, it could be brought forward at another time, but at present he hoped the House would refuse an inquiry, which would mark men out for slaughter.

Sir S. ROMILLY's principal object in rising was to refute a statement made by the Noble Lord; that the sufferers would not be deprived of their remedy by the Indemnity Bill. The Noble Lord had however proved himself wrong in his very next sentence, where he said, that the Bill would be the same as that of 1801; now that expressly enacted, that all personal actions, brought on account of imprisonment on charges of high treason should be made void. The Learned Gentleman argued on the same grounds as Sir F. Burdett, respecting the Petitions and Ward's character. He would not say that the facts asserted were illegal, if true; but they were unnecessary and wanton abuses of power.

Mr. ASHURST read a report made to the Magistrates of Oxford, which stated, that the accommodations were excellent, and that the only complaint made by any of those confined there, was that of a smoky chimney.

Mr. H. SUMNER said, that Ogden had told falsehoods from the beginning to the end of his Petition. He had the disease when he first went to prison. (Hear, hear!) He had also expressed great gratitude to the jailor for his kind treatment.

Mr. BENNET said, that nothing in the representation of the Hon. Gentleman had contradicted the facts in Ogden's Petition. Mr. Baguley's case was also, he believed, fairly stated.

Mr. PHILLIPS said, that the fact alleged was, that Ogden's distemper had been so much increased by ill treatment, as to render an operation necessary.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL observed, that a Bill of Indemnity would not protect a jailor from a civil action, if he had used any unnecessary rigour, but that would be the question. As to the removal of persons from one place to another, there was no reason for saying it was to excite alarm; the Secretary of State would have been liable to blame, if he had let them remain in an unhealthy situation. He contended that all the allegations of these Petitions, as far as they had been examined, were falsified; and that the Secretary of State had, by his great exertions, broken the link of a confederacy which threatened society with all the evils of universal pillage and disorder.

The Hon. Mr. LAMB said, that he found the allegations of improper treatment bore a very small proportion to those of unjust detention. He could not however agree to any motion on such a subject, till the matter could be considered by an open Committee.

Lord FOLKESTONE replied.—Several Hon. and Right Hon. Members had adduced the goals of their own counties as being well managed, but none of them had shown in what state the prisons were in which the prisoners had been principally confined.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—Ayes, 58—Noes, 167—Majority against inquiry, 109.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

General GASCOYNE obtained leave to bring in a Bill for lighting the streets of Liverpool with Gas.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR moved that a Select Committee should be appointed, to consider what steps should be taken to give to the Northern Counties the advantage of two Assizes a-year.—Ordered.

CITY PRISONS.

Alderman WOOD said, there were doubtless some things that might be amended in the prisons; but he denied that any blame attached to the Magistrates. He moved for a Select Committee to examine into the state of Newgate, and the other City Prisons.

Mr. BENNET would not oppose the motion; but he must say that Newgate was a school of instruction for vice, not of improvement or amendment. He would undertake to prove to the Committee, that the prisoners were suffered to go without clothes, and that the food was scanty. The bread was brown, and as bad as possible, until the other day that this subject was mentioned, when they altered the colour of their bread. The Court of Aldermen had been hard at work, even last Sunday, to repair and clean Newgate, preparatory to the examination of the Committee.

Sir W. CURTIS said, the facts stated by the Hon. Gentleman had been very much exaggerated. The food had been said to be bad; now the prisoners were allowed four pounds of as good meat per week, as any Member has at his table. The bread is also as good as any Gentleman need eat. He would assert that no alteration had been made to his knowledge, nor any hint given to improve the appearance of the prison. He stood firm upon that.—(A laugh)—Was not four pounds of meat enough for men sent to prison for crimes? Were they to be treated with luxuries?

Mrs. Goff was with Eliz. Clark the night she was in labour. Witness went for the midwife, and on the following morning she accompanied the midwife to Mr. Clough's. She represented the destitute state in which the young woman was, and Mr. Clough said he would come in half an hour. He did not come, however; and when again applied to, he said he had nothing to do with it. They then applied to the Officers of West Ham, who immediately relieved her.

Mr. GURNEY contended, that his client thought the woman an impostor in the first instance, and therefore refused to relieve her. She afterwards went into another parish; and when she there applied to him for relief, he was in duty bound to refuse it; the parish in which she then was being liable.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, however, held, that the promise to call on the woman next morning, and his afterwards refusing to do so, was, at least, a neglect of duty. Any circumstances in mitigation might be stated when the defendant came up for judgment, should the Jury find him guilty.

The Jury found the defendant guilty.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday, D. Evans was indicted for the murder of Elizabeth, his wife, on the 11th ult. in Paulconberg-court, Crown-street, Soho, by inflicting wounds upon her with a poker.

I. Davis worked with the prisoner. They were drinking at a house at the corner of the court. Between twelve and one the prisoner went home, in liquor, and next morning witness went to his house, and asked him where his wife was; and he answered, in bed. Witness then went towards the bed, and said it was a strange time to be there. No answer was made, and he saw the deceased with her mouth open. She was covered with a quantity of clothes; and upon putting his hand upon the body, he discovered that she was dead. He immediately exclaimed, "Mrs. Evans is dead!"—"Good God!" replied the prisoner, "don't say so;" and he immediately went to the bed, fell upon the body, and pressed and kissed it. He then cried, and repeatedly said, "I hope, my dearest woman, you are not dead."—Witness asked him at what time he had last spoken to her. He said, at seven o'clock, when her feet being very cold, he applied to them a hot brick. Witness asked what he had done to her, and he answered, "I know not, as I was very much intoxicated." He then enquired if the deceased was drunk; and the prisoner said, he could not say, but that he was himself much aggrivated by some of the lodgers; and added, that one of the women had told him he kept a w—e, and not a wife, as her husband had taken an improper liberty with her in the passage a few nights before. Witness said, "Don't vex yourself, I'm going away." The floor of the room appeared as if it had been just cleaned, but he saw no marks upon it. Requested him to go to a female, and beg she might come and lay out the body. He complied, but the woman refused. He saw one of the hands of the deceased, upon which were marks of blood. There were also marks of crusted blood upon her head. The deceased seemed weakly before her death. The deceased was much given to drink; and he had seen her intoxicated three or four times. He had been intimate with the prisoner and his wife for years; and they lived on terms of affection together.

Anne Desmond lodged in the same house with the prisoner. About twelve the night previous to the death of the woman, the husband of the witness was brought home drunk by two men. She heard the deceased and prisoner wrangling about his coming home so late. Mrs. Evans had herself been out, but came home sober and in good health. After having put her husband to bed, she lighted the men out who saw him home; and on her return up stairs, heard the prisoner challenge the deceased about some money; he called her bad names, and asked her what she had done with it. Witness soon after heard him strike the deceased, as with his hand; after which all appeared quiet. Soon after she heard the noise of the prisoner beating the deceased: she heard the latter cry out, faintly, several times, "Oh! dear me—oh! don't." The beating appeared as if with a weapon. She listened ten minutes, and, after calling out through the wainscot, that he was a blackguard for beating his wife, went up stairs. She then tried to alarm her husband; but having failed, she called her next room neighbour, Mrs. Micklethwaite, so loud that all in the house might hear her, but no one answered. Being afraid to venture down stairs, she went to bed, supposing the prisoner had ceased to beat his wife.

Mrs. Micklethwaite was also a lodger in the same house with the prisoner: she deposed to having heard quarrelling between the deceased and the prisoner for an hour and a half: she said to Mrs. Desmond, why does Mrs. Evans not cry out? Mrs. Desmond answered, it is impossible for her to cry out, as he has murdered her. The prisoner said, "I know I have."

G. White, the undertaker, proved that the prisoner came to him while she was lying dead, and said "she is very well—I left her at home in the bed." He afterwards told the witness that she was dead, and that she killed herself by excessive drinking. The body was lying on a sacking, and upon his removing the head a quantity of blood gushed out.

H. Webb, constable, went to the house of the prisoner, and asked him if he had had any words with his wife. He said he had, and they arose in consequence of a woman having said that his (the prisoner's) wife had had an improper connection with her husband; and that he struck her a blow in the mouth. The prisoner said he could not get medical aid in consequence of the door being locked. Witness found a great many marks of blood upon the walls and wainscot, and also in the bed-room. The fire-irons had marks of blood upon them, particularly the poker.

Mr. Jenner, an apothecary, examined the body of the deceased, and found three cuts on the head, one of them two inches long. The whole of the forehead was discoloured, and there was the mark of a blow upon each wrist. The wounds were of such a nature as might have been occasioned by the poker produced. Witness was of opinion that the blow on the temple was sufficient to have caused her death.—On opening the body, the stomach was empty, and the intestines were inflamed; but the inflammation was not such as would occasion sudden death. The brain was entire, notwithstanding the blows.

Mr. Carpus, the surgeon, examined the deceased; he saw wounds on the head, but has patients now living, who have had as severe wounds. There was no extravasation of blood, nor any division of the dura mater from the skull. A blow upon the temple is no more than one inflicted on any other part of the frame, unless internal violence follows. He found the intestines in a high state of inflammation. He examined no further, conscious that the deceased came to her death, either by the blows on the head, or by the inflammation, which latter he thought most likely.

The Prisoner declined addressing the Court; but several witnesses gave him a most excellent character for humanity and good temper. Among these persons was the sister of the deceased, who described the parties as living for many years in a state of much comfort and happiness.

Mr. Baron GRAHAM summed up the evidence; after which he connected the various leading points, and shewed where they bore on the prisoner, and where they operated in his favour. It would be for them to decide whether, after what they had heard, her death was occasioned by the inflammation of the intestines, especially after the discrepancy between the two medical individuals. The Jury were to consider what the situation of this poor woman was, who was allowed to remain so many hours, after such horrid wounds, without medical aid. Had such aid been procured, and she had died, a different consideration was presented; but she had no such advantage. In a most feeling manner he pointed out the awful effects of intoxication on the peace of families, and the morals of the public.

The Jury having retired for nearly an hour, returned, pronouncing a verdict of Guilty.

The Prisoner, who had throughout the day laboured under the greatest agitation, upon hearing the verdict nearly sunk.

The Recorder immediately pronounced upon him the dreadful sentence of the law, which was, that he be hanged, and that his body be anatomised, on Monday next.—The trial lasted nine hours.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

On Tuesday, Gilbert Kerr was indicted for assaulting Clarissa Acton, one of the charity children of the parish of St. John, Wapping, with intent to ravish her. There was also a count in the indictment, charging him with having committed a common assault.

Mr. ADOLPHUS observed, that no doubt the Jury would feel surprised that the females had not been desired to retire, on account of the nature of the trial; but, however, as they chose to remain in Court, they were at liberty so to do, as nothing would be detailed of an offensive description. The prosecution was instituted against the person at the bar, who had formerly been master of the Charity School of St. John's, Wapping; and in saying thus much, it would scarcely be necessary for him to remind the Jury, that a person, so circumstanced, had a trust reposed in him of the most sacred kind. The school in question contained 60 boys and 40 girls, and the care of these poor children were entrusted to those whose duty it was particularly to watch over their morals, and to see that the corruption of the females was not one of the consequences of their neglect. Mr. A. then stated the particulars, and proceeded to call his witnesses.

Clarissa Acton stated, that at Christmas last, she was in the school of St. John's. On the 26th of December her mistress was absent from home, and she slept with Ann Thomas, the servant maid. On that morning, about five minutes after Ann Thomas had gone down stairs, her master came into the room, and stood by the side of the bed, and called out "Acton!" a great many times; and said, "Acton, may I come into bed to you?" To which the witness said, "No!" He, however, came into the bed, put his hand round her neck and waist, and asked her to turn. She screamed out and said, "I will tell my mistress if you do not go." He then got out of the bed and left the room. The witness then rose and locked the door; while she was dressing, he again came towards the door, knocked at it, and the witness called out, "I will not open it till I am dressed." Having finished dressing, she opened it, and was going down stairs, when her master met her, and said to her, "Don't say any thing; it will be the ruin of me." The witness promised she would not; but told Ann Thomas directly she got down stairs. She did not tell her mother, until Hamilton had gone before the Justice. She had remained three weeks in the house afterwards, and had never told her mistress, nor did her master use any unkindness towards her. Her age was thirteen last August.

Ann Thomas was servant to the defendant at the time the assault complained of took place. Clarissa Acton told her what had happened the same morning, soon after she came down stairs, which was about five minutes after she had left the room. The witness saw her master as she was going into the parlour for the sugar; he took hold of her fingers, which she pulled away. He then said, "has Acton said any thing to you?" The witness replied, "No, Sir." The defendant said, "I only came in to kiss you both, as it was Christmas time." The witness said her door was always locked, and her master knew it; he could hear her going down stairs.

Mr. ALLEY, on the part of the defendant, observed, the indictment stated, that the defendant had made an assault on Clarissa Acton; that he did beat, wound, and ill-treat her, and that against her will he did carnally attempt to know her. There was also a second count, charging a common assault. In fact, the indictment imputed to him, that he intended to commit a crime against her will. He agreed with Mr. Adolphus, that a person standing in the situation of the defendant, ought not to take liberties; but the utmost that could be fastened on the defendant was, that he had toyed with the girl; his conduct proceeded apparently more from kindness and good nature towards her; than any real intention to do her injury—there was no malice or personal violence proved. If they found him guilty, no man was safe. Before they could convict, they must be satisfied that he used violence. To shew the moral and excellent character of the defendant, he would produce a host of witnesses, witnesses too; composed not only of the most respectable inhabitants of the parish, but of the very Committee who governed the schools. The Rector of the parish was willing to come forward, but was indisposed; but he would produce the Curate. No human being, he apprehended, had ever been convicted upon testimony similar to that which was this day produced; and he trusted that the Jury would send back the defendant to his home, and to the restoration of that good name and situation of which he had been deprived. The Learned Counsel then proceeded to call the following witnesses:

Mr. Rob. Goodburn knew the defendant 23 years. He always considered him to be a man of humanity, and never heard the slightest impeachment of his character.

Nearly 20 other witnesses in his favour were examined. The Curate, several Ladies, and some young females, who had been placed under his care, were likewise produced, and they pronounced the defendant to be a man of the most humane and moral disposition.

The Foreman of the Jury begged to enquire of the child, whether the defendant had gone to bed undressed, or, as was said by his Counsel, in his morning habiliments? The child answered, he had nothing on but his shirt, and when he got into bed, he covered himself with the clothes.

The Jury having retired for nearly an hour, returned with a verdict, finding the defendant—Guilty of a common assault, upon the second count of the indictment.

POLICE.

ANOTHER MURDER AND SUICIDE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Saturday night information was received of another most atrocious murder, on the body of a young woman, aged 18, named Mary Minton, residing with her father, Union-street, Middlesex Hospital, by W. Haitch. Officers immediately repaired to the place, and saw the young woman, whose head was nearly severed from her body. It appears that on the 10th of November last he married her, having another wife, which being found out by the deceased and her friends, he was forbid the house. A letter from him was found in the pocket of the deceased, requiring pecuniary aid, in order to enable him to quit the country: a postscript was attached, wishing to meet her on Saturday evening, and finding that she did not attend the appointment, he went to her father's, and spoke to a lodger, who gained him an interview with the deceased, and they were left talking in the passage in the dark, when he took the opportunity of perpetrating the horrid deed with a razor, and escaped. Sunday evening information was received that he was attending Divine Service at the Jerusalem Chapel in Lisle-street, the very place where he first became acquainted with the deceased. H. Adkins, of Bow-street, waited at the Chapel door until service was over. He was pointed out on quitting the Chapel by some persons who had been within, and also by the sister of the deceased, and his hands were secured, and he was taken to Bow-street, where he was searched and handcuffed. Mr. Stafford, in the absence of the Magistrates, conceiving that was sufficient to prevent his doing mischief to himself, he replied, "I have too much resolution to do that." On his way to the Office, a person remarked he resembled Bellingham, when he replied, "I wish I may possess his fortitude." He is a good-looking man of 35. He was sent to St. Martin's watch-house, and two men were ordered to sit up with him.

BOW-STREET.

W. Haitch, charged with the murder of Mary Minton, was on Monday put to the bar; when Rebecca Clarke deposed, that she lodged at No. 24, Union-street, Middlesex Hospital. The deceased and her father lived in the same house. On Saturday evening witness saw the prisoner near the door; he said he wanted to speak to Mary. Witness fetched the deceased. The prisoner spoke to her in a low tone. Witness heard the deceased say, "It is of no use; I directed the letter for Mr. Haitch, and not for Mrs. Haitch." She then returned into the house, and went up stairs a little way, but came down immediately with her sister and witness, and again went to the door. The prisoner was still there; and on seeing them all together, he said, "What do you all do here?" Witness said nothing, but went up stairs; and the sister of the deceased crossed the street on an errand, leaving the deceased and the prisoner alone in the passage. Witness had just got up to the garret door, when she heard the noise of stamping, and some one falling. Witness did not go down again, she was prevented by her mother.—Elizabeth Minton, sister of the deceased, deposed, that she heard the last witness tell her sister that the prisoner wanted her. Witness went down shortly afterwards, and saw the prisoner in the passage with the deceased. She left them together, and went out. On her return she saw her sister weltering in her blood; the prisoner was gone. The head of the deceased was nearly severed from her body, and the passage swam with blood.—J. Wiltshire was in his house, in King-street, Drury-lane, on Saturday night. The prisoner, whom he had known before, came in about seven o'clock, and asked them, as usual, how they were. Witness's wife spoke to prisoner about his two wives, and said, there was a warrant out against him from St. Giles's Parish (the first wife had applied there for relief); upon which he said, he had that about him that should be the death of the first man that laid hold of him, and he offered to bet witness's wife a shilling that he would produce it, but she would not bet. Witness's wife talked to him about his wives, and he said, "—the wives; I'll soon get rid of both the old and the new." The last words he said on going out were, "Don't you be surprised if you hear of my sharing the same fate as the unhappy wretches on Tuesday morning;" (meaning the persons who were executed.)—The last witness's wife corroborated the testimony of her husband.—H. Adkins, the Officer, deposed, that he received information that Mr. WARRE said, a number of workmen were employed in repairing and whitewashing the Borough Compter, before the Visiting Committee could arrive; but that they were found at work by that Committee. He read the Coroner's Inquest on the body of J. Burdett, who died from want of proper nourishment, and medical aid, in Tothill-fields Prison. Yorke, the turnkey, upon that Inquest prevaricated so much that the Coroner threatened to commit him. He hoped that man had been removed from his situation.

The motion was agreed to.

CLIMBING BOYS.

Lord MILTON presented a Petition from the City of York against the employment of climbing boys. He wished well to the Bill; but he was afraid it would not effect all the good intended; for some chimnies could not be swept without boys.

Mr. BENNET said, that nine out of ten of the chimnies and flues that could only be swept by boys belonged to rich people, who could afford to alter them. They were also the sort of chimnies most dangerous to the poor boys. Yet it was said they proceeded in this case precipitately. Precipitately to do what?—to save life.

Mr. LITTLETON hoped the Chimney-Sweepers' Bill would be made so effectual that it could not be evaded; and that not a single child should in future become a victim.

The Petition was then laid on the table.

Mr. G. BANKS obtained leave to bring in a Bill for the farther prevention of the illicit destruction and sale of Game.

The Report of the Election Laws Amendment Bill was then taken into further consideration, in which it received some verbal Amendments.—Adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

Mr. CURWEN obtained leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the present Tythe System, after some discussion.

Mr. BENNET alluded to a Petition he had presented last Session respecting Judge Day: he was now anxious to state, that he was convinced the allegations contained in that Petition were totally without foundation.

Sir F. BURDETT presented a Petition from Liverpool praying for Reform and Retrenchment, and 13, of the like kind, from the city of Bath; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Sir R. PEEL (leave having been previously obtained) brought up the Manufacturers Labourers' Bill, which was read and ordered to be printed.

The Gambling Suppression Bill was withdrawn, with an understanding that Mr. Ogle would bring forward another on the subject.—Adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 20.

The Election Laws Amendment Bill, after some discussion, was ordered to be read a third time on Monday evening.

Mr. BENNET moved the third reading of the Chimney Sweepers' Regulation Bill.

The SPEAKER ordered it to be enquired, whether any Counsel was in attendance to oppose the Bill; but none appearing, the Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned till Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 22.

News has arrived of the death of the old King of SWEDEN; and the ministerial papers, in their promised gratitude for assistance in time of need, are already beginning to wonder that a man of low origin like BERNADOTTE should be quietly suffered to succeed.—We always said what he would come to with these gentlemen in his time of need.

The only other piece of news of any importance is the alledged attempt to assassinate the Duke of WELLINGTON. "A fact has been discovered (says a private letter from Paris, in the Courier) which tends to throw some light upon the obscurity of an event, so important as to engage the attention of every one. Lord KINNAIRD wrote to General MURRAY, from Brussels, that he had received confidential information respecting a plot which was concerting against the Duke of WELLINGTON. It appeared that it came from a Frenchman who had voluntarily retired to Belgium; but previous to furnishing complete evidence of the conspiracy, this individual proposed, that he should procure for three of his friends the liberty of returning to France, from whence they had been banished by the political events of 1815. At the same time, he offered to go himself to Paris, and prove the truth of his allegation, confiding his personal security to the Duke of WELLINGTON and M. DE CAZES. It was on the day following that on which General MURRAY received this letter, that the attempt was made. The English Ambassador, seconded by the French Government, has written to Brussels to obtain all the information possible, through the means of Lord KINNAIRD. Other suspicions have however fallen upon an Hanoverian or Belgian Officer, who, on the evening preceding the attempt, had retired from the presence of the Duke, who received him coldly, uttering menaces which his Lordship's Aides-de-Camp distinctly heard. Thus rests this important affair at present. The Government has enforced every measure which prudence and the urgency of the event required."

Of this matter it is impossible to decide any thing till something further be known. Yet it naturally gives rise to some important reflections. If it was the attempt of some vindictive individual, personally offended, the man must be either a ruffian or a madman. But the causes of such an action may be various. It may be public or private, personal or general; and finally, it remains to be ascertained whether the shot was malicious or not. We have already expressed our opinion on the subject of assassination. Nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, or in a much greater proportion than that, the act is merely villanous or insane; and where it is neither, and in the extremest circumstances imaginable, we hesitate even at insinuating that it ought to be imitated. Wherever the cause is personal, it is clearly nothing but execrable; and where it is general, nay even universal, the danger of contradicting a generous principle, and of setting up a private judgment in such a case, is exceedingly great, especially as fanaticism is so quick to use violent remedies. Yet the difference between CHARLOTTE CORDE and RAVAILLAC is as great as between TIMOLEON and a common fratricide among the Eastern Sultans; nor can posterity ever confound two such far-distant characters, however attempted to be identified by the politics of a time, as a creature naturally gentle who kills a tyrant, and another who will kill the best man in the world for the sake of a tyrannical superstition.

But we do not see how any of the usual cases, right or wrong, can apply to an assassin of the Duke of WELLINGTON. Some will suppose, we dare say, that the cause was entirely private, and connected with civil matters; some that it was private, connected with military matters; some that it was a trick to serve a political purpose; and some that it was done by an angry Frenchman out of impatience at late events. If an investigation be made public, we shall see; if not, the suspicion will certainly be, that it was a trick of some party or other.

Should it turn out, however, that the attempt was made by a native from a national cause, the people of Europe, whatever may be said of the man, will have two very serious reflections to make on the thing itself; and these are, first, respecting the well-known Infernal Machines, which were more than once put in motion against BONAPARTE; and second, respecting that equally well-known proceeding on the part of the Congress in proclaiming a kind of civil excommunication against him, which unquestionably tended to assassination. It will yet remain to be considered too, how far the circumstances relative to MAUBREUIL, who lately made such a noise in the Courts of Justice, with insisting that he had been hired to kill NAPOLEON, and of whom we now hear no more except that he is at large, may have had an additional influence on the minds of particular classes of men in France, accustomed to blood on their own parts, and to the sight of violence and injustice in others.

An actual catastrophe was mentioned in our last, on which we say, a word or two here, inasmuch as it is naturally supposed to have been connected with a melancholy public event. We allude to the death of Sir RICHARD CROFT. Some of the papers congratulate themselves on having had no hand in this gentleman's death, because they abstained from agitating the question respecting the Princess CHARLOTTE's delivery. We can easily conceive that some of them abstained out of very good feelings; others did so out of merely political ones; but though we do not happen ourselves to have said any thing on that particular matter, we can as readily conceive that those who acted otherwise had motives equally just. The matter was a public one certainly; though how far the agitation of it could do good, was questionable. We always thought, we confess, that Sir RICHARD should have had another physician with him, as the parties were so young and trusting, and none of their relations were near them,—which strikes us as much more extraordinary than all. We think so still more, now that we hear he was a very nervous man, and grown somewhat too old for his practice. But what he has suffered must do away all resentment against his memory; and the responsibility of these things should lie upon higher persons, who have power to order and oversee what they please. When MARIA LOUISA was to be delivered, BONAPARTE himself chose M. DUBOIS for her man-midwife out of a long list of practitioners; and the chief reason he assigned was, that DUBOIS had firmness as well as skill. He also said a thing to him, which all royal families should recollect—"Treat my wife, M. DUBOIS, precisely as you would treat a common citizen's wife; and I, who am most interested in the succession, will stand by you, and bear you out, in all you may think proper to do." He did so;—the birth, which really happened to be a difficult one, was quite successful; and young NAPOLEON is one of the finest boys to be seen. We suspect that the KING, who with all his infirmities had a good deal of common sense, acted upon the same principles in these cases as a man of genius did; and we suspect furthermore, that had he been sensible of what was going forward, or able rather to supply what was not going forward, an unfortunate young Prince and foreigner would not now have been left to an untimely and heart-wasting widowhood.

The following letter (says the Courier) was received this morning (Saturday) from Vienna:—

Vienna, Feb. 8.

"The conjectures formed by the public some time since, have lately acquired such a degree of moral certainty, that I can no longer refrain from communicating to you what is entitled to full confidence. No doubt is entertained that our august Sovereign, yielding to the reiterated offers and representations of the Germanic Body, has consented to resume the Imperial Crown of Germany. One of our enlightened publicists has prepared the Acte Capitulaire, which, since the 2d of this month, has been accepted and ratified in all its points. Though the details circulated at Court are not stamped with sufficient authenticity to justify my transcribing them, yet I will add, that it is universally believed the ancient Council of the Empire is to be re-established (Reichshofrath) at Vienna; that besides the Imperial dignity, the Hereditary Prince is to be created King of Germany, and that the functions of Field-Marshal of the German Empire has been given with common accord to the Archduke Charles, who quits his post of Captain-General of Bohemia. These innovations, or rather this return to our ancient usages, inspire the best grounded hopes for the future."

The Executions last Tuesday occasioned no slight sensation. It was not only that four fellow-creatures were suddenly cut off from society, for crimes not of the deepest hue—nor that the Executioner failed in the performance of his horrid task, and subjected them to increased torture,—though this was sufficient to give an additional shock to all who possessed common sensibility,—but it was chiefly that three of the poor creatures were sufferers for the offence of forgery, and that two of these were females!—A Gentleman in the City has very properly noticed the Executioner's inability or negligence, and the Court of Common Council has ordered an inquiry on the subject: but we ask those who have the power to agitate such topics, whether the question for investigation should not rather be, "Is not the punishment of Death, for forgery, barbarous, impolitic, and unjust?"—We know well the answer which some would make, that it is indispensable in this mercantile country, which depends so much upon credit. But we reply, that setting aside the claims of justice and humanity, even the policy of the system is highly questionable; for it is manifest that the punishment of death has not prevented the crime of forgery becoming a very common crime; and until another mode be tried, it is quite in vain to contend that the present is a proper one, or the best that can be adopted. In Pennsylvania,—a mercantile State too, where paper money abounds,—forgery is not punished with death, nor is any crime indeed so punished, but that of murder; yet we do not find that forgerers multiply in that country. The cant about "the mercantile interest" is altogether disgusting: we are sick of its calculating, cold, and savage doctrines; it is sufficiently bloated with gains, and ought no longer to be encouraged in its craving for human victims. How the REGENT felt when he signed the death warrant of these poor females, we know not, nor can we imagine how those felt who advised him to the act, while they procured from him a free pardon for the Blood Conspirators. We envy none such their feelings.

By the Kangaroo, which has arrived in the Downs, from Batavia and St. Helena, we understand that the report of the serious indisposition of NAPOLEON, which was said to be brought from the Cape, is without foundation.

LORD SIMMOUTH speaks of Oliver the spy as a much-injured person. How has he been injured, except by himself? Has he been wrongfully accused, when charged with being a seducer to crime, a gross hypocrite, and a liar of the first magnitude? Why, his being a hired spy implies all this. Did not the miscreant endeavour to persuade a wife to induce her husband to join in acts, which would have brought him to the scaffold, and left her a desolate widow, without means to support her little ones, whom the scoundrel was then dandling on his knee?—A much-injured person truly!—LORD SIMMOUTH says Governments cannot go on without such instruments: Mr. WILBERFORCE (who won't however vote for inquiry) says their employment is both impolitic and wicked.—His Lordship, at any rate, acts with some consistency; but alas for the pious Mr. WILBERFORCE!

Notwithstanding the efforts of Alderman Wood, during his Mayoralty, to do away with the impositions practised at the Old Bailey, and in direct violation of an order written up in the Court, 5s. each were demanded for admission to the Gallery during the trial of Evans.

A passage in the 15th chapter of Job reminds a Correspondent of a certain ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONAGE,—“Because he covereth his face with his fatness, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks.”

No discovery has yet been made of the wretch or wretches who committed the foul murders at Greenwich.

HAMPDEN'S SWORD.—Among the interesting objects of curiosity in Carlton-house is the Armoury, which contains a magnificent collection of ancient arms, disposed with much taste. Among other valuable weapons is the identical sword of the celebrated patriot, JOHN HAMPDEN, in the highest preservation; the hilt and scabbard are ornamented with small bronze figures in relief, representing the history of DAVID and GOLIATH; and from the admirable spirit and skill displayed in their execution, they are supposed by the most intelligent connoisseurs to be the work of the celebrated Italian artist, CELLINI.

RECORDER'S REPORT.—On Thursday the RECORDER made a Report to the REGENT of the prisoners, capitally convicted at the last Sessions, when William Kelly and Thomas Spicer, for uttering forged bank notes, and Wm. Henry Rawlinson and John Rawlinson the younger, for stealing goods on the Thames, were ordered for execution on Wednesday next. The others were respited.

ANOTHER DREADFUL CATASTROPHE.—About one o'clock on Friday, Mr. Nighton, a carpenter, and his wife, residing opposite Bruce Grove, Tottenham, were found murdered in their own house, lying on the floor, by some neighbours, who, not having seen them since Friday week, were led to break in. It is supposed, in consequence of a razor being found lying close to Mr. Nighton, that the horrid deed was perpetrated by himself. They had only been married a month, and he was about to commence business on his own account.

INQUEST ON HAITCH, THE MURDERER.

This was held yesterday in Newgate, by Mr. SHELTON, who gave orders that the Reporters from the Newspapers should all be freely admitted, as it was, he said, an open Court, though in a prison. Mr. Brown, the keeper, also afforded the Reporters every accommodation. This, we trust, will be an example to Mr. STRILING.

James Manning, Wardsman of the Prison, said, that about half-past eight on Friday morning, when Haitch was brought out of his cell preparatory to his trial, he saw him take his hat off a nail without speaking to any one, and go into the privy. As he remained a long while, witness called to him; but getting no reply, they attempted to push the door open, but could not, as the door was against the heels of the deceased. Witness heard a blubbing, from which he conjectured that Haitch had cut his throat. The door was at last forced, when the deceased was found on his knees, his head lying on his arm, and the place covered with blood. He was taken into the yard, when it was discovered that his throat was cut. He never spoke. A razor was found on the floor of the privy. Witness spoke to the deceased in the morning, asking him why he got up so soon? Deceased replied, he was tired of his bed. Witness saw nothing at all incoherent in his manner: he appeared in his right mind. Witness, on the previous evening, asked the deceased why he did not go and get shaved?—He answered, he would go to trial as he was, like a ruffian, for then no person would have mercy on him. Witness had received strict orders not to let him have a knife or a razor: he was searched when he was brought into the prison.

[The razor was produced. It had the name of “Gatty” upon it. “Haitch” was scratched upon the handle, which appeared to have been done some time.]

Mr. Bar, Surgeon of Newgate, had examined the deceased twice before his death. He answered rationally, but with much levity. On Witness's feeling his pulse and asking him how he felt? Haitch, turning round on his heel and smiling, answered, he was very well! He did not appear at all insane.—Mr. Box described the condition in which he found the deceased.

Samuel Davies, the Chief Turnkey, corroborated the foregoing statements.

Mr. Brown, the Governor, addressed the Coroner and Jury, observing that there was a heavy responsibility attached to him for the act of the deceased; that when he was brought into the prison he asked the Bow-street Officers if they had examined him, and they assured him they had examined him most scrupulously, and that he had no instrument of destruction about him. Mr. Brown himself being doubtful, made a slight search by rubbing him down, and found nothing: he, Mr. Brown, then gave proper orders to Bishop to be careful that no instrument of self-destruction should be left in his way; he had also been informed, that a man of the name of Hatch, a fruit-salesman, in Covent-garden market, for whom the prisoner had worked, called on him on Thursday, and had lent him a razor. I have summoned this Hatch as a witness, and he is now in attendance.

John Roquyn, smith, said, I belong to Bow-street office. I had the prisoner in charge the night before, and took him to this prison, in company with Henry Adkins, one of the Bow-street officers, and when we had him first in custody we searched every part of him, to try if he had any instrument of destruction about him, but we found no such thing. He was carefully guarded from that hour until he was removed to Newgate. I have told Mr. Brown, the governor, that he was carefully searched. When he was first apprehended he said, this is the place I first became acquainted with her (meaning Mary Minton), and here I am taken. I am guilty, and deserve to be hanged. Blood for blood!

Jonathan Hatch, said—Yesterday morning about half-past eight o'clock, as I was going to Billingsgate to buy fruit, I called into a gin-shop in Clare-market to have a glass of liquor, and there I heard that the deceased had cut his throat. I had not seen the deceased these six months. I frequently employed him. I never shaved myself, and I never gave the deceased a razor. The people in the wine-vaults told me, that Mr. Tilkman had given the deceased a razor the preceding day, in order to commit suicide.

Thomas Tilkman gave an account of his going to Newgate to see the prisoner, to exhort him to repentance. Mr. Tilkman was accompanied at the time by Mr. Taylor, cheesemonger, Rose-street, Covent-garden.

John Bishop, principal Turnkey, was present last Monday, when the deceased was brought, and by Mr. Brown's orders he carefully searched him. He found nothing on him. After the deceased's death he searched him, and found a letter between his shirt and skin, directed to the mother of the unfortunate young woman, confessing his crime, and expressing his hopes of meeting with the dear object of his affections in the next life; that he would not live to be brought to trial, as he had the means of taking away his own life, which was to be performed with the same instrument with which he murdered her, which was never out of his mind; that his intentions were to commit the act by pistols, but that he had not the means to purchase them.

The CORONER summed up the evidence. He observed, that there was no doubt the act was committed by the deceased, as the letter found in his possession fully justified such a supposition, and which letter appeared to be the production of a strong mind. If the Jury had any doubt how the razor came into his possession, the letter would remove that doubt.

The Jury, which consisted of twenty-four respectable housekeepers, with only one dissenting voice, returned a verdict of "felo-de-se," and the Coroner directed his warrant in order that the deceased might be interred in the cross-roads, and a stake driven through his body. This it was supposed took place at a late hour last night, or early this morning, near the Old Bailey.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

The Prince of Hesse Hombourg visited her MAJESTY and the Princesses AUGUSTA and ELIZABETH, on Sunday afternoon. The introduction of the Prince of Hesse Hombourg to the QUEEN and the Princess ELIZABETH, on Friday week, was considered as a private one, and took place in order to enable his Serene Highness to meet the QUEEN and PRINCESSES, at dinner, at Carlton House that evening. It was also preparatory to the public presentation of the PRINCE, as the suitor of the Princess ELIZABETH, the illustrious couple not having seen each other before. On Saturday week his Serene Highness was formally presented, at Buckingham House, by the PRINCE REGENT, as the suitor of the Princess ELIZABETH. For this purpose, his Serene Highness went to Carlton House in his full uniform, and at three o'clock he accompanied the REGENT to the Queen's Palace. The Duchess of Gloucester was present at the introduction.

The marriage of the Princess ELIZABETH and the Prince of Hesse-Hombourg is expected to take place in Easter-week. The illustrious couple will reside for some time at the PRINCE REGENT's cottage, in Windsor Park. In the summer they go to Germany, but will return here in the beginning of winter, when a permanent residence will be assigned them—perhaps in Kensington Palace.—Morning Paper.

On Monday the Prince of Hesse-Hombourg removed from GRILLON'S Hotel to apartments in St. James's Palace. Some of the REGENT's Pages and livery servants are to attend his Serene Highness.

The marriage of the Duke of CAMBRIDGE with the Princess of Hesse will take place the latter end of next month. Their Royal Highnesses will arrive in England early in April, and on the 23d (St. George's Day), the Bride will be presented to the PRINCE REGENT. She will be 21 years of age in July next, and is considered by every one acquainted with her as a most highly bred, accomplished, and amiable young lady.—Courier.

We can now state with confidence, that the destination of the line-of-battle ships, which we mentioned some days ago, is Copenhagen; and the object is to bring to England her Serene Highness the Princess of DENMARK, the affianced bride of the Duke of CLARENCE. The Duke recommends his friend, Admiral Sir HEN. BLACKWOOD, to the agreeable duty of conducting the expedition; but we understand that since the order for the equipment of the ships was given, a demur to the union has occurred—not owing to the indisposition of the Royal Duke.—Morning Chronicle.

On Thursday the PRINCE REGENT held a Court. After which a Chapter of the Garter was held, to which the Marquis of ANGLESEA was introduced with the customary ceremonies, and invested with the ensigns of that order.

Whatever might have been the intention of the Princess of WALES, respecting her return to England, previous to the lamented death of Princess CHARLOTTE, it is now certain that her Royal Highness has given up all thoughts of again visiting the British shore.—Morning Herald.

Prince LEOPOLD, we are informed by letters from Weymouth, became agitated, almost to a state of distraction, on hearing of the death of Dr. CROFT.—His Serene Highness certainly will visit the Continent soon; but before he goes he will pay another melancholy visit to Claremont and its solitary domains.—Morning Post.

We have not thought it necessary to animadvert further than we did some days ago, on the absurd rumour respecting an Illustrious Family. It has already sunk into discredit—and certainly nothing but an insatiate appetite for calumny could have made the story current even for a day.—Morning Chronicle.

One of the daughters of Earl GREY had lately a narrow escape for her life. While fording the Wear, near Lambton Hall, her horse made a sudden plunge, and threw his fair rider over his head into the river; from which she was with difficulty extricated by Mr. LAMBTON.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion. T. C. HORTLAND.—We have particularly remarked that this Artist has for several years not only contributed his due share to the Royal Academy and British Institution Exhibitions, but has each year been progressively rising in ability; has each year given us better than what was before good. This work now before us is better still, and is not merely very good, but in the majestic mass of its edifice, its solemnity of colour and shade, has touched upon the sublime. It touches on the strings of our hearts with a fixed pensiveness. It occasions a cessation in the ordinary current of our thoughts; for the scene is at that time of Christ's Crucifixion, when "darkness" is represented to have been "over all the land, when the veil of the temple and the rocks were rent, the earth quaked, the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose."

"—Tis as the general pulse
Of life stood still, and nature made a pause,
A mournful pause, prophetic of her end,"— except where it is interrupted by the momentary concussion which is seen in the opening sepulchres, and in the glare of lightning among the clouds which envelope the centre of the temple, the only mode by which the Painter could indicate that the "veil of the temple was rent in twain."—There is a celebrated picture, in which Correggio, with a truly original and poetical fancy, has irradiated the objects in it from the illuminated face of the sacred infant. Mr. HORTLAND has well applied this invention to his own particular purpose, and as "darkness was over the land," has shown his subject through the medium of an ethereal light issuing from Christ; and "has thrown a ray of it upon Bethlehem, his birth-place." This is perfectly consistent with a supernatural subject, and indeed is the only way which, under the appalling darkness, could justify the visible extent of the scene. The reflexion from this ethereal light is just sufficient to shew the earth as suddenly widowed of her great copartner the sun, and as covered with the funereal widow's weeds of night. Thus grandly shrouded is seen the stately structures of Jerusalem at a time when it bore its noblest appearance, for Herod, a splendid, though in other respects, a base prince, had recently made great improvements and additions to the city, and these most probably would assume, in a province which had long been Roman, a Roman and Grecian aspect, such as the Painter has properly mixed with the Asiatic. Thus too is seen the surrounding mountains and sea, the long retiring valley, the silver-dropping cascade, the visionary inhabitant of the tomb "bursting his garments,"—that religious aristocrat the proud Pharisee, and the saddened and adoring believer. These are all grand, natural, and artificial objects; and with the due effect with which they are coloured, the contrast to this of the supernatural stream of light above, and the able style in which the whole is composed, a sedate gratification is produced, that is highly congenial to the sensibilities which nature has implanted in the best bosoms, and which culture has refined and perfected.

248, Christ raising the Widow's Son. W. BROCKEDON.—An Artist who paints pictures 14 feet high, and 27 feet 9 inches wide, seems determined on one thing at least,—that his works shall not escape notice. There may indeed be valour in this, but not much of what has been described as the better part of valour,—discretion; for if there be defects in the piece, they are discernible to all without the aid of a magnifier.—The works of Mr. BROCKEDON abound with them, and the Directors of the Institution seem actuated by a spice of malice, in thus annually exposing them, in so conspicuous a manner, to the public eye. This Artist must be reminded of the admonition—"He that would be the greatest among you, let him be the least." He appears to have but one idea of expression, and that is a wrong one: for though "fear came upon all of them," yet the effects of fear would not surely be confined to a wild glare of the eyes in persons of different sexes, ages, and complexions.—Mr. BROCKEDON has made the Saviour a very insipid personage, and the rest of his figures look like so many "unwashed artificers" acting the story of Raising the Widow's Son.—In a word, Mr. B., if he would become a real Artist, must study more, and paint less; and above all, let him look steadily at Nature,—a lady who always takes ample revenge on those who turn their backs on her.

But what is to be said of Mr. AGLIO's Moses breaking the Tables? Not only is the Hebrew Legislator overflowing with rage, but the Artist has ingeniously represented him as having been suddenly seized with a sharp attack of the cholera, thus mingling the pathetic with the sublime. In this difficult attempt, the graceful has been rather a sufferer, as might naturally have been expected; for to express the inward pangs of the great Lawgiver, the Painter has been obliged to bend his body forward in a very seemly attitude.

LITERARY NOTICES.

No. 40.

We have given the story of this extraordinary book, and some extracts by which the reader can easily judge of its general merits. We have some remarks however to make on the particular qualities of its poetry, and on the deep social interests upon which it speculates; but as we are much pressed for room now the Parliament are sitting, and yet do not wish to pass over the work lightly, we had better occupy our present article at once with some extracts we intended to make from the author's preface. He explains in them the general object of his poem, and touches in a masterly manner upon the great political point of it, and indeed of the age in which we live.

"The poem," says he, "which I now present to the world is an attempt from which I scarcely dare to expect success, and in which a writer of established fame might fail without disgrace. It is an experiment on the temper of the public mind, as to how far a thirst for a happier condition of moral and political society survives, among the enlightened and refined, the tempests which have shaken the age in which we live. I have sought to enlist the harmony of metrical language, the ethereal combinations of the fancy, the rapid and subtle transitions of human passion, all those elements which essentially compose a Poem, in the cause of a liberal and comprehensive morality, and in the view of kindling within the bosoms of my readers, a virtuous enthusiasm for those doctrines of liberty and justice, that faith and hope in something good, which neither violence, nor misrepresentation, nor prejudice, can ever totally extinguish among mankind."

After dilating a little more on the subjects of his poem, Mr. Shelley, with the feeling that ever seems to be at the bottom of his warmth, gives the following placid and easy solution of a difficulty, which the world, we believe, is also instinctively solving, but which, as he says, has been the "moral ruin" of some eminent spirits among us. If the Lake School, as they are called, were not as dogmatic in their despair as they used to be in their hope, we should earnestly recommend the passage to their attention. They might see in it, at any rate, how it becomes an antagonist to talk; and how charitable and consistent the mind can be, that really inquires into the philosophical causes of things. Mr. Shelley does not say that Mr. Southey is "no better than a house-breaker;" nor does he exclaim with Mr. Wordsworth, in the ill-concealed melancholy of a strange piety, which would be still stranger if it were really cheerful, that "Carnage is God's daughter." He is not in the habit, evidently, of begging the question against the low and uneducated; nor has he the least respect for that very sweeping lady, Miss Theodosia Carnage;—but stop; we must not be violating the charity of his philosophy.

"The panic," says our author, "which, like an epidemic transport, seized upon all classes of men during the excesses consequent upon the French Revolution, is gradually giving place to sanity. It has ceased to be believed, that whole generations of mankind ought to consign themselves to a hopeless inheritance of ignorance and misery, because a nation of men who had been dupes and slaves for centuries were incapable of conducting themselves with the wisdom and tranquillity of freemen, as soon as some of their fetters were partially loosened. That their conduct could not have been marked by any other characters than ferocity and thoughtlessness, is the historical fact from which liberty derives all its recommendations, and falsehood the worst features of its deformity. There is a reflux in the tide of human things, which bears the shipwrecked hopes of men into a secure haven after the storms are past. Methinks, those who now live have survived an age of despair."

"The French Revolution may be considered as one of those manifestations of a general state of feeling among civilized mankind, produced by a defect of correspondence between the knowledge existing in society and the improvement, or gradual abolition of political institutions. The year 1788 may be assumed as the epoch of one of the most important crisis produced by this feeling. The sympathies connected with that event extended to every bosom. The most generous and amiable natures were those which participated the most extensively in these sympathies. But such a degree of unmingled good was expected, as it was impossible to realize. If the Revolution had been in every respect prosperous, then misrule and superstition would lose half their claims to our abhorrence, as fetters which the captive can unlock with the slightest motion of his fingers, and which do not eat with poisonous rust into the soul. The revulsion occasioned by the atrocities of the demagogues, and the re-establishment of successive tyrannies in France, was terrible, and felt in the remotest corner of the civilized world. Could they listen to the plea of reason, who had groaned under the calamities of a social state, according to the provisions of which, one man riots in luxury, while another famishes for want of bread? Can he who the day before was a trampled slave, suddenly become liberal-minded, forbearing, and independent? This is the consequence of the habits of a state of society to be produced by resolute perseverance and indefatigable hope, and long suffering and long believing courage, and the systematic efforts of generations of men of intellect and virtue. Such is the lesson which experience teaches now. But on the first reverses of hope in the progress of French liberty, the sanguine eagerness for good overleaped the solution of those questions, and for a time extinguished itself in the unexpectedness of their result. Thus many of the most ardent and tender-hearted of the worshippers of public good have been morally ruined, by what a partial glimpse of the events they deplored appeared to shew as the melancholy desolation of all their cherished hopes. Hence, gloom and misanthropy have become the characteristics of the age in which we live, the solace of a disappointment that unconsciously finds relief only in the wilful exaggeration of its own despair. This influence has tainted the literature of the age with the hopelessness of the minds from which it flows. Metaphysics*, and inquiries into moral and political science, have become little else than vain attempts to revive exploded superstitions, or sophisms like those† of Mr. Malthus, calculated to lull the oppressors of mankind into a security of everlasting triumph. Our works of fiction and poetry have been overshadowed by the same infectious gloom. But mankind appear to me to be emerging from their trance. I am aware, methinks, of a slow, gradual, silent change. In that belief I have composed the following Poem."

[To be concluded in our next.]

* I ought to except Sir Wm. Drummond's "Academical Questions;" a volume of very acute and powerful metaphysical criticism.

† It is remarkable, as a symptom of the revival of public hope, that Mr. Malthus has assigned, in the later editions of his work, an indefinite dominion to moral restraint over the principle of population. This concession answers all the inferences from his doctrine unfavourable to human improvement, and reduces the "Essay on Population" to a commentary illustrative of the unanswerableness of "Political Justice."

MISS M'AVOY.—POWERS OF THE BLIND.

A letter has appeared in the Liverpool Saturday's Advertiser, addressed to the Editor by Mr. Dale, a Surgeon of Liverpool, on behalf of this young lady, in whose extraordinary powers he is a firm believer. He says his first visit to "the interesting young sufferer," in company with her surgeon, Mr. Thomas, convinced him that she had completely lost all power of vision. The goggles were applied in such a manner as satisfied him of the impossibility of her seeing, even if she was not blind. Several experiments were tried, sufficient, he says, to show that she possessed "exquisite touch;" but one circumstance proved to him that this was not all; by feeling with her fingers on the glass of his watch, she accurately told the hour; this, he observes, and similar experiments, often repeated, "have confirmed in the clearest manner the truth of so singular a fact, mocking theory and rendering our philosophy vain." This conclusion, we think, is not even correct, granting the truth of what he asserts respecting her not being able to see; for there is still room to suppose she might have been instructed by some person, as he does not tell us the situation of the parties, or how such communication might be prevented. The whole, besides, of what he relates as fact, rests solely upon assertion: it therefore amounts to little, and does not seem at all to invalidate the statements of Mr. Sanders, who supported what he advanced by appealing to others, and related some things, which appear not at all creditable to the subject of them, and might so easily have been disproved if false.—Mr. Dale thus describes Miss M'Avoy's present state:—

"Since the 15th of November she has scarcely ever been free from one species of convulsion or another: the attack which commenced that night lasted nearly eleven days and nights, during which she was almost constantly insensible, with inability to take any food, except a little coffee; and after she recovered so far as to be capable of speaking, the whole of the right side (except the hand and arm), remained totally useless, continuing equally so until this hour, even rendering her incapable of moving from the bed or chair in which her afflicted parents place her. Dr. Renwick has this month directed her to be bled frequently, which produced a slight improvement in her condition:

alas! it soon disappeared, leaving us almost no hope of a better state of health; but except this does take place, although her highly-excited touch, hearing, taste, and smell, may remain, no power of cuticular perception can, I think, be reasonably expected."

This is certainly somewhat suspicious: it looks as if, fearing any further attempt would not succeed, they were willing to leave the case in its present state of doubt (at least with many), and thus prevent all unpleasant disclosures. Diderot, in the additions to his Letter on the Blind (see Grimm's Memoirs), says, he has heard of a person who could distinguish colours by the touch, which, if true, although very surprising, is within the bounds of possibility, and does not shock all our reason and experience, like the pretensions of Miss M'Avoy. The same author gives also a very curious account of Mademoiselle Melanie de Salignac, a young lady, who had been blind almost from her birth. Her feeling, hearing, and smell, were exquisite. She could distinguish by the impression of the air whether it was fine or cloudy, whether she was in an open place or a street, and whether the street was open at the end; also whether she was in a room or not, and of what size it was. Having once gone over a house, she became so well acquainted with the different parts, as to be able to warn others of any danger they were exposed to by the existence of a step or the lowness of a door. She could thread the smallest needle with the greatest dexterity, and could execute every sort of needle-work. She played very well at many games at cards; which she distinguished by some little mark, known to herself by the touch, but imperceptible to the sight of any other person. She had learnt, and understood very well, music, geography, geometry, and dancing. She was indeed extremely clever; what made her more interesting, she was modest, mild, cheerful, and affectionate. She wrote with a pin, by pricking a sheet of paper stretched on a frame, and read what she had written by feeling the pin-marks on the other side of the paper. She could read a book printed on one side only; some were printed expressly for her in this manner. In a piece of 12 or 15 lines, if the number of letters in each word, together with the letter which it began with, was given her, she could tell every word, however oddly composed. This fact, says Diderot, "was attested by every one of her family, by myself, and twenty other persons still alive." She died at the age of twenty-two. She was the daughter of Madame de Blacy, "a woman distinguished for the eminence of her moral qualities," and moving in a respectable sphere of life.

THE LATE EXECUTIONS.

To Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Bennet, and the rest of the Members of the House of Commons, who have contributed to the amelioration of our Criminal Laws.

GENTLEMEN;—Sir R. Peel recently stated, that "the emaciated appearance and pathetic statements of the labouring cotton manufacturers had excited him to tears." It is with such afflictive feelings that every considerate mind in the kingdom have been wounded, whenever they read accounts of the Execution of Public Offenders; and they instinctively ask themselves, Are these Executions necessary?—This is, indeed, one of those fire-side subjects that are very often discussed, and the invariable conclusion of the argument is, that it is not only not necessary, but a disgrace to our criminal code. My Lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth would no doubt smile disdainfully at these domestic Legislators, and regret that the subservient votes of a Liberty-suspending Legislature elsewhere, could not suppressively reach these snug assemblies, as they so readily have done the out-of-door ones. It is, say my countrymen, a standing disgrace—1st, Because it is evidence of great neglect of the comfort and instruction of the lower classes, or crimes would not be so common—2d, Of inadequacy as a preventative punishment, or the Executions would not be so frequent—3d, Of encouraging crime and cruelty, or such constant crowds would not find satisfaction in attending them—4th, Of immense disproportion between the offences and the punishment, or nature would not have constituted us so tenacious, and, indeed, infinitely regardful of life, in comparison with the most valuable property, and of almost all those things, for depriving us of which our fellow creatures are precipitated from this "pleasing anxious being," on which, at the dreadful parting, they

"Cast a longing, lingering, look behind."

I am more immediately prompted, Gentleman, to invite your Parliamentary interference on this momentous subject, by the last horrid scene at the Old Bailey, where the executioner most incompetently performing his task, the pulse of life was kept painfully quivering on the threshold of eternity, and the fevered mind underwent a thousand deaths in one*. This latter circumstance is justly undergoing a scrutiny from the local legislature of the metropolis, though it is but an occasional atom of the evil of Executions for crimes short of Murder, the continuance or discontinuance of which, is a subject well deserving the solemn investigation of the national legislature, and especially that highly respected and humane part of it which I shall have the honour of further addressing on this deeply interesting national subject. AN ENGLISH CITIZEN.

CITY.

On Wednesday the Lord Mayor held a Court of Common Council.

CITY PRISONS.

Mr. DAVIES presented a Report from the Committee of Improvements, respecting the New Debtors' Prison, in which the Committee recommended, that the Bill now pending in Parliament, for raising money on the credit of the Orphans' Fund, be withdrawn. He stated, that the Committee had had an interview with Lords Liverpool, Sidmouth, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the subject, and that it was their opinion, that they could not support the Bill, unless the City Accounts were produced, on which account the Committee thought it better to abandon the Bill.

After some discussion, the motion for agreeing to the Report was negatived, and the Report referred back to the Committee, with instructions to them to prosecute the Bill in Parliament.

THE LATE EXECUTIONS.

Mr. CROOK said, he held in his hand a paper upon the subject of the executions which took place on Tuesday at the Old Bailey. It was his misfortune to have witnessed the scene, and never was any thing more revolting to human nature; as, independently of the feelings which must be excited in ordinary cases, the sufferings of the unhappy culprits were protracted and augmented—(Hear, hear!)—A considerable delay had taken place in the time and manner of the execution, and the person who was employed as executioner seemed wholly incompetent to the dreadful task. The ropes that suspended the malefactors were wholly misplaced, and instead of the knot being made fast under the ear, in two cases out of the four it had actually got under the chin and over the face. Two persons were then kept in a protracted agony and convulsion of frame. A third suffered nearly as much, and one only of the four seemed to have expiated his life in that way which the law intended. What added considerably to the horror of this transaction was, that two of the sufferers were females, one of whom (Mary Ann James) exhibited symptoms of suffering which were almost too shocking to describe, and which drew from the surrounding multitude the most bitter execrations. W. Hatchman, another of the sufferers, was, if possible, more dreadfully treated, and did not expire until human nature was shocked at his agonies and struggles. In one of the cases, he should have stated that the rope had slipped completely to the back of the neck. He had inspected the bodies, and from the marks he was enabled to assert that the four victims were most infamously executed.—(Hear, hear!)

Some discussion arose; and the question was referred to the Committee of the City Lands, to inquire into the conduct of the Executioner, &c.

This subject was resumed on Thursday, when a Special Court of Common Council was held. A Report from the Committee of City Lands was read, which stated that the Sheriffs had declined attending the Committee.

Mr. Sheriff ALDERSON said, he had declined attending the Committee, as he wished to make a statement publicly. He had provided necessaries for the culprits, and had ordered that their bodies should be delivered to their friends. With respect to the delay in the execution, when the females were to have been brought out, they were in hysterics, and had they been brought out then, they would have died without knowing that they were going into eternity! He felt justified in the delay, as the Sheriffs had a discretionary power as to the exact time. One of the women had turned round to request a fellow sufferer to salute her, and the Ordinary gave the signal rather suddenly: this might have occasioned some derangement as to the adjustment of the ropes.

Mr. CROOK could not but still be of opinion, that the persons had been executed in an abominable manner.

Mr. BIRCH thought the Sheriff had acted very properly.

Mr. WILLIAMS stated, that on the execution of a female some time ago, the dead body had been carried on the back of the executioner, just as butchers carry sheep that had been slaughtered!

Subsequently to the above explanation, Mr. Sheriff DESANGES came in. He said, the culprits were singing their last hymn, and it was not deemed merciful to drag them away until this was concluded. He added, that if Gentlemen were so angry with them, for giving an extension of half an hour to such wretched beings, why, in the name of goodness, they shall be hanged upon the next occasion half an hour before their time!—(Hear, hear! and cries of shame!)

Mr. DAVIES said, the other Sheriff described those unhappy persons as being in hysterics, and not engaged in singing hymns!—(Hear, hear!)—He then moved, "That the Court did not deem it inconsistent with the dignity of the office of Sheriff, that such Officer should attend upon any Committee of the Corporation which might require his aid or information."

The motion was carried, after some further conversation.

BILL OF INDEMNITY.

The Court, after some judicious observations by Mr. WATMAN, came to the following Resolution, with only four or five dissenting voices:—

"That Petitions be presented to both Houses of Parliament, representing the feelings of this Court at the arbitrary and oppressive conduct of Ministers under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—expressing their abhorrence at the employment of infamous and abandoned wretches as Spies and Informers, the hired Agents of Government, who have been exciting weak and deluded men, labouring under the pressure of distress and misery, and consequent irritation, to acts of outrage and Treason.—Representing that they can look with no confidence to the Report of Secret Committees, composed chiefly of Ministers and Placemen, founded upon ex-parte evidence, and where those very Ministers are to sit in judgment upon their own conduct.—Praying them to institute an immediate, impartial, and rigid inquiry into the conduct of Ministers under the said Suspension Act; and that all the proceedings be referred to such an examination as can alone satisfy the justice and expectations of the country, by a Committee to be composed of such Members only as hold neither places nor pensions under the Crown; and that they will not pass any Bill of Indemnity, and preclude those who have been the victims of oppression, from an appeal to the Laws of the Country."

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

FORD (ATTORNEY) v. MATHEWS (COMEDIAN.)

Mr. SCARLETT stated, that his client was a respectable Attorney, and the defendant was well known as a celebrated Comedian. The present action was brought to recover a compensation in damages for slanderous words, reflecting on the character of the plaintiff, and tending to injure him in his profession. It appeared that some time since a person named Simpson, a coal-merchant, had granted an annuity to a Mr. Theede, which annuity had since been purchased by Mr. Ford. Upon the an-nuit-deed, Mr. Mathews's name appeared as security. The annuity had been paid with great irregularity; and not infrequently Mr. Ford had been obliged to receive the amount of his annuity in coals—no very convenient sort of payment. Repeated remonstrances had been made on the subject but in vain; and, at length, Mr. Ford gave notice, that if the payments were not made regularly in future he should proceed to levy for them when due. The irregularity still continuing, the principal not paying, Mr. Ford in December last found it necessary to levy on the goods of Mr. Mathews, the security; and in doing this he did no more than by law he was entitled to do. On the 6th of January last, to his great surprise, Mr. Mathews, accompanied by three Gentlemen, came to his house, and forcing themselves violently into the Office, Mr. Mathews addressed the following words to him:—"You are a scoundrel, and a d—d shabby blackguard; a disgrace to your profession, and not fit to live. You put an execution into my house during my absence, and brought my wife to town from the country 20 miles in an ill-state of health. I am sorry I had not time to bring more persons with me to hear me insult you. I will repeat this, let me meet you where I will."—These were the words the plaintiff had to complain of, and to prevent a repetition of which the present action was brought. The object which the plaintiff had in view was not damages, but a justification of his character; whatever damages the Jury might think fit to give, would, in all probability, go in aid of the Theatrical Fund.

Mr. Ewington, managing clerk to the plaintiff, proved the words spoken, and that the annuity was paid very irregularly, &c.

Mr. ADOLPHUS, for the defendant, addressed the Jury, and contended that his client had the greatest cause for complaint on the occasion. Under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff would have conducted himself much like an honourable attorney if he had waited Mr. Mathews's return to this country, before he proceeded against him. He trusted, therefore, the Jury would confine their damages, if they should feel themselves absolutely called on to give damages, to a coin of the lowest denomination.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, the words were certainly actionable. The Jury would decide what damages the plaintiff was entitled to.

The Jury enquired what damages would carry costs: they were informed nothing less than 40s.; they gave a verdict for the plaintiff, damages one shilling.

Friday, Feb. 20.

THE KING v. CLOUGH.

This was an indictment against the defendant, in his character of Parish-officer of St. Mary, Bow, charging him with gross misconduct in the discharge of his duties.

Elizabeth Clark stated, that on the 24th of September, she being at that time pregnant, and in great distress, went to St. Mary, Bow, her parish. She was at that time in the pains of labour, and applied to the mistress of the workhouse. The mistress of the workhouse referred the witness to the defendant, who was Overseer. Witness proceeded as far as Mr. Paxton's, a butcher, at whose door, not being able to get any further, she sat down. Clough came to her, and asked why she came there? Witness replied, that it was her parish. Defendant then asked her where she lodged the night before. She replied, in the Borough. Defendant asked why she did not fall troublesome there. She replied she was not ill at the time she left the Borough. Clough said, it was all deception. She begged he would send for a surgeon, who would convince him that she was in labour. Clough said, she must go back from whence she came, as he would have nothing to do with her. Witness then got to Mr. Fairhead's, a surgeon, who said he was not the Parish Doctor, and directed her to go to Mr. Wallis, who was the Parish Doctor. Witness went, but was told by the young man that he could not be spoken to. A person was sent to Clough, to know why he would not receive her as a parishioner. He said, he would have nothing to do with her, and desired her to go about her business. Witness then endeavoured to get to Mrs. Cooper's, but was not able. She sat on the grass for two hours; the pains of labour were then upon her. She afterwards again got back to Paxton's; but could get no relief. She proceeded to Mr. Clough's; but was told he was not at home, and it was uncertain when he would return. She then endeavoured to get to her brother's, who lived over the bridge: she was in great pain and agony, and feared she would be delivered in the street. She at length got to her brother's. She first applied to Mr. Clough about ten o'clock in the morning, and was delivered before twelve o'clock at night.

the prisoner was at Jerusalem Chapel, in Lisle-street, Leicester-fields, on Sunday evening. He went and apprehended him after the service; in taking him to the watch-house, he said to him, "How could you do such a deed?" The prisoner then said, "What deed?" Witness said, "That's best known to yourself." The prisoner then said, "I went to do a deed, but whether I did it or not, I cannot tell." Witness asked him what instrument he had used, and whether it was a knife? He said, "No?" and on being asked if it was a razor, he made no answer, but, after some hesitation, said he had thrown the instrument into the Thames. He asked witness if he had been to Union-street, and had seen Minton, adding, "Poor thing, I dare say she must be dreadfully mangled."—Sir NATHANIEL CONANT then directed the prisoner to attend while the evidence was read. The prisoner stood erect, and was very attentive while the evidence was reading. He asked Mrs. Streeling (a witness) whether she could swear to his person; but she answered that she could not. He put no other questions.—A Surgeon was then called, who proved that he had seen the deceased. The main artery was separated, as well as the windpipe.—This was the cause of her death.—Adkins, who had been to the prisoner's lodgings, and had brought from thence some clothes, now asked him if he would have them delivered to himself, or taken back to the place where they were found. He said, he wished to put them on, and they were handed to him. On being searched, one half of a Newspaper was found next his skin, in which was an account of the murder, and a description of his person.—He was fully committed.—The prisoner was dressed in a green jacket, drab breeches, and leather gaiters, and had the appearance of a game-keeper. He is about 34 years of age, and has rather a prepossessing countenance. He said he was born in Berkshire, and is a stocking-weaver. He appeared perfectly collected, and leaned, with apparent indifference, against the rail, while the examination was proceeding.

The prisoner, it appears, was married to his first wife, who is now living, when she was about 45 years of age, and he was but 19. He is now 34, and married the deceased when she was but 19. He separated from his first wife about two years ago, and since that time he has passed as a single man. The deceased had been a constant attendant at the New Jerusalem Chapel, in Lisle-street, where the doctrines propagated by the late Baron Swedenbourg are observed, for about the last twelve months, and where her father and family occasionally went, in consequence of the deceased having espoused the sentiments of that sect. The prisoner has been a constant attendant at the Chapel during the last six months, where he became acquainted with the deceased, and they were married at Mary-la-bonne Church on the 10th of November last: they only lived together five days, in consequence of the deceased and her family discovering that he was a married man, and that his wife was living. About three or four weeks ago he was apprehended on a charge of bigamy, and taken to Hatton-garden Office, from which he was discharged, owing to there being no witness present at the weddings, the only evidence produced being the two wives, and the certificates of their marriages. On its being known on Sunday morning that the prisoner was suspected of having committed murder, Mr. Churchill, the Minister of the New Jerusalem Chapel, gave every possible assistance to lead to his discovery. At the commencement of the service the prisoner entered the Chapel, and took his seat in the most composed manner. Mr. Churchill directed his Sermon against heinous crimes; but it did not appear to have the least effect upon the murderer. The prisoner was about the sixth person who came out of the Chapel, when Adkins seized him. He had in his pocket a silk purse, but no money. He had two Prayer Books with Forms of Prayer, and the Ceremonies of the New Jerusalem Church. He said he was sorry his time was so long to live, as he deserved to be hanged. He confessed that he had been a very bad man. He observed, that he supposed poor Mary's body was in a sad mangled state. It appears, that the prisoner had been writing to the deceased to procure him money; to which application the following answer was sent by the deceased:—

"DEAR WILLIAM,—I have just time to inform you, that Mrs. Phillips is from home; and I am sorry to say, was she not, I am confident it is not in her power, any more than mine, to assist you in any degree whatever. Indeed, William, I am surprised you can expect we can; for to tell you the truth, we want assistance ourselves, more is the pity. I am happy to hear you have got a situation; and I wish you all the success in the world.—From your ever well-wisher, "M. M."

To Mr. Haitch, No. 19, Tottenham-place, Feb. 10, 1848."

The prisoner was chained at both legs and handcuffed. At three o'clock he was removed from the Office, and put into a hackney-coach, accompanied by a number of Officers in the coach, on the box, and behind. Had it not been for this strong guard, the crowd which then filled the street, and were waiting to see him come out, would probably have vented their rage by a violent attack upon his person. They assailed him with hisses, groans, howlings, and various noises of disgust, and great numbers ran after the coach.

At seven o'clock on Tuesday evening an Inquest was held on the body of Mary Minton. The Jury returned a verdict of Wilful Murder.—We cannot but express our surprise that the Inquest was so long delayed, the corpse having been suffered to lay in its mangled and horrific state, unwashed and uncleansed, from Saturday evening, till the poor distracted father waited on the Magistrates, when their Worships said, they conceived the body had waited long enough for the Coroner. But Mr. Stirling is Clerk of the Peace for the County, and, the Sessions being on, he has no time but in the intervals of the Court's sitting. We shall only add, that if Mr. S. finds the two offices incompatible, he should resign one of them. The public business should not be delayed to suit the interest or convenience of any individual.

SUICIDE OF HAITCH, THE MURDERER.—At an early hour on Friday morning the crowd assembled in the Old Bailey, to hear the trial of Haitch, was immense. At half-past eight o'clock, however, it was made known that Haitch had just put a period to his own existence, by cutting his throat. It appeared, that about the hour mentioned all the prisoners who were about to be put upon their trials were called from their respective cells. At this moment Haitch was seen running towards the privy, of which, however, nothing serious was then apprehended. In a few minutes the keepers, passing the yard where the wretched man had gone into, found him extended lifeless on the ground, with his head nearly severed from his body. Near to him was found a crooked razor, and not far from it a document, written by himself, in which it was stated that the razor, with which he perpetrated the horrid deed, was the same with which he murdered Mary Minton, and that he had it secreted about him ever since, although it may be recollected that he told Adkins, upon his apprehension, that he had thrown the instrument with which he committed it into the Thames. The paper also stated, that he intended to have murdered Mary Minton with a pistol—that it was his intention first to have shot her, and next himself. The Officers who searched him say, it was impossible that he could have had a razor about him. The body was removed into the yard. On the arrival of the Judges, at ten o'clock, the father of Mary Minton ascended the witness's box, and addressed their Lordships as follows:—"My Lord, Wm. Haitch has cut his throat in the prison, and, as I am a very poor man, I hope your Lordship will allow me my expences."—Mr. Baron Graham, and the other Judges, seemed evidently confused and affected at this extraordinary application. The former, however, after a moment's consideration, desired the unhappy man to stand down, and make his application another time.

BOW-STREET.

It has been recently discovered that letters, containing notes, &c. to a considerable amount, have been stolen in the General Post Office, and W. Johnson, a carrier in the fifth division, being suspected, was apprehended, and underwent examination. His brother, G. Johnson, was suspected of having disposed of some of the notes. On Monday night Taunton apprehended him; when the following cases were entered into:—Mr. Woods, Inspector of Letter Carriers, found in W. Johnson's house 145*l.* in Bank-notes. Mr. Durnford, of Newpori-street, stated, that on the 22d of October last a person, whom he believed to be G. Johnson, purchased two prints, in payment for which he tendered a 10*l.* note, which witness wrote on the back of, and which Mr. Parkin, Solicitor to the Post Office, said he should be able to prove was transmitted to town in a letter from Sheffield.—The prisoner was remanded.

WORSHIP-STREET.

Saturday week, J. Mansfield, the man who was met on the Greenwich-road, under circumstances which led to a suspicion that he was the perpetrator of the foul murders at that place, and who surrendered himself, underwent an examination, when he produced such testimonies of his innocence as satisfied the Magistrate, and he was discharged.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A few evenings back, an Inquest was held in the Edgeware-road, on the body of Admiral Paier, aged 56, lately residing at No. 64, Edgeware-road. The servant-maid stated, that on the night of his death the deceased went to bed between 10 and 11 o'clock, apparently in good health; and in about two hours afterwards she was surprised to hear his bed-room bell ringing very violently. Witness went to his room to know what he wanted, and found him in a very weak state, apparently dying; on her approaching him, he threw himself into her arms, and soon afterwards expired.—Mr. Lightfoot, Surgeon, attended the deceased, whom he found labouring under an attack of spasms; he administered every remedy; but the vital spark fled soon after his attendance.—Verdict—Died by the Visitation of God.

An Inquest was held on Saturday week, in Newcastle-court, Strand, on the body of Mr. Cotterill, shoemaker, of Three-Crown-place, Pickett-street.—G. Batchelor, apprentice to the deceased, stated, that in the morning his master finding himself indisposed, took up a paper, and asked his wife if it contained Epsom salts? she replied in the affirmative; when he took the contents, but soon after appeared strongly convulsed; and it was shortly discovered, that what he had taken was acid of sugar, the resemblance of which is similar to that of Epsom salts. His wife and he always lived on the best terms, and he had no doubt the catastrophe arose from mistake.—There were other witnesses examined, whose testimony confirmed the above, and the Jury returned a verdict accordingly.

An Inquest was held upon the body of Mrs. Simmons, at the Old Mansion-house, Kennington-road. The deceased died suddenly; and in consequence of it being known that violent quarrels frequently took place between her and her husband, a report became prevalent that she died in consequence of violent means. The Coroner said, that there was no evidence to warrant such a report; and the Jury gave in a verdict of—Died in a fit.

Friday week, the large cotton-mill of Mr. T. Atkinson, at Colne-bridge, near Huddersfield, was discovered to be on fire, and though every exertion was used to extinguish the flames, it was burnt to the ground. But the most dreadful part is yet to relate; for, in consequence of the fire beginning near the staircase, the retreat of a number of the children was cut off, and 17 of them perished, the eldest of whom was 19. The manner in which this awful disaster took place is related as follows by a boy 10 years of age:—He says, that about five o'clock he was sent into the card-room (which is on the ground-floor) with a lighted candle to fetch some rovings, and in taking them, some loose cotton caught fire. He ran up stairs to inform those at work, and then to the top of the mill; but finding such intense heat and smoke, he again descended, and when he came to the stairs, under which the fire was, he laid himself down, and rolled to the bottom. The two overlookers succeeded in getting all the children to the top of the stairs, and some of them were dragged down: the remainder, it is supposed, were so terrified, that they ran back into the mill, and were instantly suffocated: as a ladder was placed to a window at the opposite end of the mill, to which it was thought they would flee for safety (and near which place 14 were afterwards found), but the smoke and flames issued out with such violence, as precluded all possibility of assistance; nor could any thing be heard of them, although every exertion was made to stimulate them to approach the window. After this the floors gave way, and all in an instant was one volume of fire. Fifteen bodies have been found.

EXECUTIONS.—On Tuesday morning, Charlotte Newman, about 30 years of age; Mary Ann James, about 45; John Attell, about the same age; and Wm. Hatchman, about 25 (the three former for forgery, and the latter for a daring burglary and robbery), were executed at the front of Newgate. The two females were respectfully dressed in black, with white caps and frills. About eight o'clock the awful procession moved along the dreary passage to the scaffold. Mary Ann James was the first who ascended the fatal drop; she was so faint, that she was obliged to be supported whilst the executioner placed the rope round her neck. Charlotte Newman next ascended, and was equally faint, and obliged to be supported whilst the executioner performed a like office for her. The first, previous to ascending the scaffold, kissed Davis, the Turnkey, who was long known to her and her family. Hatchman came next, and Attell last. After the unfortunate culprits were all tied up, they joined in prayer, and expressed much confidence in the mercy of God. After being ready, they shook hands, their caps were pulled over their eyes, the signal given, and they were, at half-past eight, launched into eternity.—The crowd to witness the awful ceremony was immense. Most of the eyes were badly adjusted by the executioner; and the popular tumult rewarded his inattention by loud groans and hisses: that of Hatchman was so badly contrived, as to manifest the extreme torture under which he suffered. A few minutes later they were launched off. Charlotte Newman requested Hatchman to assist her, which he did. Hatchman expired in great agony. The unhappy malefactors, after the receipt of the Prince Regent's warrant, conducted themselves with becoming fortitude and resignation. During Monday night Hatchman and Attell slept nearly five hours, and at an early hour on Tuesday morning, ate a tolerably hearty breakfast. The female culprits were restless, and had very little sleep. Mary Ann James said she was led into the commission of the offence. Charlotte Newman also confessed her guilt, but stated, that she was induced to do it, in order that she might be enabled to go to Botany Bay to her husband, who was some time since transported for a similar offence.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—On Friday a Gentleman of fortune in Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square, attempted to put a period to his existence, by hanging himself in his library, but fortunately he was discovered through the window by one of the domestics, who gave the alarm, and he was cut down sufficiently soon to preserve life.

MARRIAGES.

Feb. 16, Capt. Charles Jones, R.N. to Anne, daughter of the late Rev. Henry Newcombe, Vicar of Gresford.

On the 16th inst. at Caldwell, Ayrshire, R. B. Lieut-General the Hon. Sir C. Colville, to Jane, eldest daughter of W. Mure, Esq. of Caldwell.

On the 17th inst. John Roberts, Esq. surgeon, Cirencester, to Frances Rebecca Haviland, eldest daughter of R. Haviland, Esq.

DEATHS.

On Thursday, the 12th inst., after a lingering illness of six years, occasioned originally by a severe fracture of the head, from the effects of which he had nearly recovered, when he fell a victim to a consumption, Philip James, aged 18 years and nine months, sixth son of Mr. John Murphy, of Howland-street, Fitzroy-square.

Lately, in the 74th year of his age, Charles Higden, Esq. of Maryland Point, near Stratford, Essex, and of Carriers' Hall, London; he was (says our Correspondent) an affectionate husband, a kind friend, and an indulgent master.

Sir W. Prazor, on Friday week, in Bedford-square. At the moment of his decease, he was inquiring of his servant the cause of a smoke in the house, when he fell down in a fit, and instantly expired. The previous day he had been at the Prince Regent's Levee, in good health. Sir William was between 80 and 90 years of age, and married his Lady when fifty-six, by whom he had twenty-eight children, seventeen of whom are living, three sons and fourteen daughters.

Sunday morning, Mr. Raylton, Attorney, of Clifford's-inn. He was apparently in good health and spirits, and had sent for a barber, who was proceeding to dress his hair, when, without uttering a word, he fell down, and before medical aid could be called, was a corpse.

On Wednesday, Mrs. Thackeray (who was a patient of the late Sir R. Croft, at the time of his shocking death), at the house of her sister, Miss Cotton, in Wimpole-street.

Feb. 5, at Paris, the Lady of Lieut. Gen. Knollys, leaving a husband and eight children to lament her loss.

Feb. 8, in Belmont-row, Birmingham, in her 21st year, Miss Harriet Lefanu.

Feb. 10, of an apoplectic fit, in his 44th year, Joseph Halsey, Esq. He was M.P. for St. Alban's.

Feb. 13, at Melville-house, Fife, Jane, Countess of Leven and Melville.

Feb. 14, at Brighton, the Rev. John Wheler, brother of Sir Charles Wheler, Bart.

CAUSE OF THE INFERIORITY OF PARLIAMENT TO THE DEMANDS OF THE PRESENT AGE.

WHAT renders the Parliament so inferior to the growing intellect out of doors, is what has been hurting the national character and happiness, ever since we deserved the title of a nation of shopkeepers;—we mean, a want of enthusiasm. We have had none of the right sort ever since the BRUNSWICK Succession. Our literature, till the French revolution excited it, was cold and common place. Our national music is so still. A painter, who should try to rouse a real feeling for his art, was and is still thought to be a kind of rebel against academies; and Sir JOSEPH REYNOLDS was frightened, and subsided in a courier. Our war with France, as to any thing generous, was a pretence and an affectation. We had just fought America, because she struggled for real liberty; and now, out of the same fear, a junta of courtiers and money-getters fought the French. The people acquiesced, because the passion for war is always cultivated as much as possible among them by the interested, and because they were always to be roused against the French, as little boys are against one another at school—"What! Won't you fight Jenkins?" But the truth is, they neither loved the legitimate, nor were in any pain for liberties to which they were growing unaccustomed. They had no enthusiasm, bad or good, except for money-getting. Any turncoat made tools of them, provided he was on the jobbing side; and PITT and BURKE made them fight and even advance money, in the hope of it's being repaid with interest. But they fought to no purpose except to get jobs from Government, and drain the blood and resources of the middle gentry and the lower orders; nor would they have fought to more purpose at last, had it not been for the rashness of BONAPARTE himself, whom they first encouraged to resemble their masters and then taught to despise both. The battle of Waterloo, setting aside other causes, which are yet to be explained on the French side, was gained partly by passive force, and partly by some remainder of that better national spirit which our ancestors obtained for us, and which we had been losing every day. So precious are the very dregs of freedom.

This victory however contained within it some seeds of a wholesome re-action. It was obtained by popular strength,—the same weapon which has rendered the German people so sensible of their own consequence, whether against foreign or home despots. A new generation too, in the mean while was growing up; and the immediate events of the world, a new and a better school of letters, and particularly the outrageous faithlessness of the Allies to their promises, fell in as excitements to that spirit of enthusiasm, which is in some degree natural to youth. See how the youth of Germany have been venting their feelings. A similar intelligence is rapidly increasing among the younger part of the people of England. They have been taught in a less dull school than their Anti-Galican predecessors, and in a less extreme one than the Jacobin; and are therefore neither witless nor hopeless. They need not the love of money to put an idea in their heads; nor retreat into the most selfish prejudices for comfort. Above all, they have seen what poor figures their predecessors cut as sordid traffickers, tools, and empty heads; and as is generally the case with the intelligent children of the foolish or gross, they are inclined to the very opposite tastes and opinions of their fathers.

Now the House of Commons is behind hand in this respect. Some of the leaders of it are as old or older than Mr. PITT himself would have been; and most of them, who are middle aged, were young men, spoiled by him when he was in the height of his hopes and power. The rest, generally speaking, are pretty nearly of the same age and bad habits, old hangers-on of the club-rooms, place-men and expecters of places, persons implicated with every part of a corrupt system; men with a great many wants and bad tastes, and not the spirits or strength of mind to lessen them; servants of the aristocracy and the other House; yea and nay voters with war-makers, who are ignorant of the next island in the Channel; making full Houses when the Peer and other Boroughmongers are to be maintained, more than half empty ones when the best interests of the people of England are to be brought before them, and fairly running away from the very mention of Ireland;—in short, wretched talkers when they do speak, dumb voters away of property and liberties in general, sharers of the artificial and poverty-making wealth of the paper system, and maintaining that all is well, in spite of starvation and secret imprisonment, as long as they have their horses and boots of a morning, their white waistcoat and bottle of an evening, and as few ideas in their heads as can give them trouble.

There are exceptions of course; but this description is only the sum and substance of what the persons excepted have told them over and over again to their faces, when despairing of seeing the most decent or urgent measure carried. A correspondent wonders that the men of ability and integrity in the House do not fairly get up and walk out in a body, when common sense and decency is about to be contradicted as it so often is by the votes of the majority. The idea has a good appearance; and in truth has often been before us; but there must be a much greater number of really independent men in the House, before a body of them could be either numerous or spirited enough to act in this manner, and to give it any effect. It is the people that must do the work themselves;—it is the people that must refuse to hear the daily dictatorial shallowness of the Ministers, and the hopeless and feeble opposition of a few men;—it is the people that must again render the House constitutional, intelligent, and free.

Let them perpetually then keep these memorandums before their thoughts:—

First, That it is hopeless to expect a Reform from within the House, as now constituted:—

Second, That it is their great duty as well as interest to avert if possible that alternative of which a celebrated statesman forewarned them—A Reform “with a vengeance from without.”

Third, That the upper classes of the democracy and their traffickers are, for the most and elder part, men whose minds have been long stagnant from sordid and unenquiring habits; that they have no enthusiasm for any thing great, good, and unselfish;—none for natural and rural habits as in ELIZABETH’S time; none for popular liberty as in that of the CHARLESSES; none for elegant taste and sociability as in Queen ANNE’S; nothing to remind them of real pleasure for themselves, or justice towards others.

Fourth and last,—That the younger as well as other more intelligent parts of the community have felt and seen better; that circumstances have given them minds and hopes superior to those of their predecessors; that corruption and worldliness are never so corrupt, and worldly, and foolish, as when they are old; that they never atone for their sins to this world, even if they become aware of them, but only endeavour to make the best for themselves in the next; that they are too old to be taught, and too human and owing to previous circumstances to be treated vindictively;—in short, that the hopes of Reform and of all our influence upon mankind are in the hands of the younger part of the community; that you will do well to encourage them as much as you can, to get as many as possible into Parliament; and in a word, assist by every means in your power, the new growth of taste, liberality, popular feeling, and a love of nature and justice, as at once the only weapons, and the very best rewards, of your approaching victories over the dull and the sordid.

NEW CHURCHES,

CONSIDERED WITH REFERENCE TO THE OPPORTUNITY THEY OFFER FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF PAINTING.

FENELON.

THERE has hitherto been an erroneous tendency in all reformers, in religious matters at least, to root out not only what was evil in every thing they reformed, but what was often good also; not that they never acknowledged the good, but that they so much detested the evil and dreaded its influence, that every thing connected with it was shrunk from with disgust, as if the retention of any part of what they wished to abolish might, by exciting former associations, have tended again to the same results as those which had led to the necessity of reformation. Thus what would have been beneficial under other circumstances, was either altogether undistinguished from what was evil, in the sweeping fury of passion; and it was not till generations had passed away, that men recovered the calmness of self-possession, and found that though there is no good without its proportion of evil, so there is no evil so purely pernicious but contains something, which, if refined or separated, might not, under proper direction, tend to virtue, when time and knowledge have rendered men more capable of making the distinction, and less liable to sink themselves into the passiveness to which the excess of a good principle had previously led them, when in a state of early ignorance or uneducated superstition.

In our separation from the Catholic Church, every thing connected with it, however tasteful or sublime, was equally abhorred, and eradicated with the same keen eager detestation, as what was bigotted, superstitious, or arbitrary. Pictures were thus considered as too much tending to pleasure, Music to voluptuousness, and Sculpture to idolatry; and all three Arts were at first banished from the Churches with a fierce hatred, that has been scarcely yet ameliorated by time. At a period when education was confined to a few ideal representations of the great Author of Christianity might naturally have led to a superstitious adoration of him; but now, when knowledge is so universally diffused, Pictures could only excite pious and sympathetic remembrances, instead of absurd and idolatrous worship.—These thoughts naturally occur to one, at a time when new Churches are about to be built, when Government is beginning to exert itself for that purpose, and the measure has been strenuously recommended from the Throne. It is a fact which cannot be denied, that Historical Painting has never yet been sanctioned by public encouragement; that consequently it has never taken its rank in the opinions of the nobility or the people; and its intellectual value and power have of course never been sufficiently impressed. Had all the Arts been equally neglected, Painting could not with any justice complain of what she had only shared in common with the others; but as Architecture, Sculpture, and Portrait-painting, have ever been pampered and fostered by public support, it is only asked, whether under such circumstances an attempt to interest Parliament and the Nation for the Painting of the Country can with any justice be considered intruding or premature? It is evident that there is and has been a disposition to assist the Art for some years, because all the leading men of the empire, refined by education or elevated by birth, have been long assembled at the British Institution for that purpose; but it is evident also, that we cannot be, by their individual efforts alone, as great in Painting as we are in other arts and sciences, unless opportunities are given by Government for works as great as the works are in those arts and sciences in which we already excel. It is evident that the Public Halls, Churches, and Cathedrals, are the only places fit for such works; and that the expulsion of Painting from our Churches, and the admission of Sculpture, is partial and unjust; that no reason can be given why Sculpture should be admitted to illustrate the actions of heroes in war, and why Painting should be excluded, when it can so ably exemplify the miracles of the Divine Founder of Christianity, and develop the moral obligations of his sublime religion; that by the admission of painted windows, and almost universal allowance of altar pieces it is proved that the Dignitaries of the Church have relaxed from the severity of their ancient prejudices, and that consequently no just reason can be given, why, if Painting is admitted at all, as it is, it should not be admitted in its highest state of intellectual perfection, in preference to a state which is both disgraceful and inefficient;—that the propensity to consider the Art as a mere decoration, thereby ranking the efforts of the great Painter with those of the White-washer, the Gilder, or the Cabinet-maker, is weak, thoughtless, and absurd;—that the periods of the world in which Art has been most brilliantly patronized, and has most gloriously displayed itself, are ever referred to in the history of mankind as the most enlightened and intellectual, thereby proving the value of the Art, as tending to raise those nations, who have the most encouraged it, the highest in the scale of intellectual grandeur;—that though it is evident employment will not create genius if it do not exist, employment is necessary to foster it if it does, as there is no example of great Painters without great Patrons in other countries.

for there the Governments of the period assisted the genius of the period, and it was by this gradual progression of things that Art was enabled to shine forth with its full vigour in Greece and Italy*, each previous period affording a foundation for the subsequent one to build on, as excellence has ever been and ever will be the result of accumulated experience.

If the distresses of the country were such that nothing could be set aside for the encouragement of genius, of course Painting would, without remonstrance, acquiesce in the general neglect; but as thousands have been and are yearly devoted by Parliament for the protection of Sculpture and Architecture, it is only asked if Painting has not as strong a claim on the support of Parliament and the Nation, as well from the great power of the Art, as from the insignificance of the sum required to assist it;—that for this half century every assistance has been given to Sculpture, while during that whole period there is no instance of any public money having been voted to the aid of Painting;—and such protection is now only asked for this Art, as has ever been afforded to the other Arts, viz. to admit it into Churches and Cathedrals and Public Buildings, where Sculpture has been ever admitted, and to honour the country where the country by Painting has never yet been honoured, so that gigantic individual efforts may not be yearly made which are of no effect, and are forgotten as soon as the season is over, for want of a place of public reception; for all the works already produced, by which the country has been rescued from the stigma of incapacity and unjust doubts of its genius, have ever been the result of the enthusiasm of individuals, who have devoted themselves with the spirit of the Decii; and though the Historical Painters are and ever will be ready so still to devote themselves, no blame ought surely to be attached to them for seizing every opportunity of a public nature, to interest the nation in favour of that Art, whose excellence is essential to its greatness, thus endeavouring to remove the needless obstructions from the path of the younger men who are rising, which all those who are established in the Art have but too fatally experienced.

There are two ways in which the powers of the country could be called forth, viz. by commemorating the glories of this Regency in our Public Halls, or by illustrating the duties of Christianity in our Cathedrals and Churches; that if out of every sum of money voted for a new Church, three per cent. were set aside for the purchase of one Altar Picture, as an opportunity now occurs in the erection of new Churches, such a plan would ultimately tend to the establishment of the Art in its higher departments, and be an encouraging prospect to those who are rising to qualify themselves, that they might be worthy of partaking its advantages. This reservation would detract very little from the solid demands of the building, and would add greatly to the internal beauty when completed.

Taking this plan as merely a matter of Art, it would produce in a few years the most beneficial effects. Considering it as connected with religion, it would greatly tend to extend the influence of the Established Church; for one great reason why the Methodists have gained such extensive sway, is from their never having suffered the feelings of their congregations to flag; whereas in our Churches there is nothing to excite pious associations in the short interval of prayer; the buildings are generally dark, dingy, and cold. Surely there is no impropriety in saying, that the regular Church might now use all the means of intellectual power and refinement in its reach, under proper direction, and do its utmost to counteract by its associations the feverous excitement of the other sects. As a matter of Art, it would correct the great, fundamental, and pernicious effects of exhibitions, where a Picture is bought or sold, as it happens, and then hurried into obscurity: no opportunity is ever given for candid examination; nothing is left to time; its errors or its beauties are pressed on the people, according to the interests or enmities of those who conduct, or of those who oppose the society where it is exhibited. Parties puff or censure, ridicule or praise, just as it suits; the whole town is in a whirl of feeling, and before any one has time to estimate with perspicuity, the Exhibition closes, and the Picture and the Painter are remembered or forgotten, till a new season and a new subject obliterate the recollection of both; while the public vote of Parliament for a Picture, as for a Statue, would be sound, fair, public encouragement, and collect by degrees the accumulated talent of the country: the work would be far ever before the eye of the world: time would establish its reputation if it deserved it, or destroy it if it deserved it not; every man could always judge for himself by a walk to the building where it might be hung; and England would have something to shew the foreigner, when he asks, with a sneer, where are her historical productions?—As this plan of Art would be connected and grow out of a measure of absolute public utility, it could not have the effect of being pressed on the nation at an improper time, or of demanding money for itself alone.

The objections urged are, first let us build Churches, and then think of decorating them; which is to say, first let us build Churches, without suffering the Architect to have any reference to Pictures, and then think of hanging Pictures up when there is no light or situation fit to see them in! whereas, the very time for such consideration is of course previous to the building being erected, so that the Architect, being aware of all the intentions of his employers, might, as to light and warmth, adapt the altar for their reception. The Bishop of London has given leave for one altar piece within his jurisdiction, this recommendation therefore can have no appearance of trespassing on Protestant feelings. The other things urged are, one that the climate is damp, and that Pictures are not so durable as marble. As to the dampness of the climate, this is a futile objection: remedies could be easily obtained by artificial contrivances: small stoves, scarcely perceptible, might be placed at the bottom of each Picture, and the wall on which it is hung be varnished: men might be got, whose sole business it should be, for a small remuneration, to keep off the damp in the winter and the dust in the summer. These are the timid objections of timid minds, and would be dissipated by a decided effort of those in whom lies the power to dissipate them. With regard to the durability of Pictures, comparatively, nothing is durable: but it is our duty to make use of the fallible materials of life to obtain an infallible firm, and to be an everlasting example. All efforts which raise us in the scale of intellect and virtue, and increase the range of our faculties, must be pleasing to God. It is our duty to make the most of our fleeting existence, that when we are passed like morning exhalations, we may take our rank in the remembrance of those who come after us, and animate future generations to advance the dignity of our nature. There are some men, too, with icy hearts, who ask what is the use of Poetry and Painting? If the Great Being had deprived the world of all that was not absolutely use-

* "Your Committee cannot dismiss this interesting subject without submitting to the attentive consideration of the House, how highly the cultivation of the Fine Arts has contributed to the reputation, character, and dignity of every Government by which they have been encouraged; and how intimately they are connected with the advancement of every thing valuable in science, literature, and philosophy. In contemplating the importance and splendour to which so small a republic as Athens rose by the genius and energy of her citizens, excited in the path of such studies, it is impossible to overlook how transient the memory and fame of extended empires and of mighty conquerors are in comparison of those who have rendered considerable states eminent, and immortalized their own names by these pursuits.—Report of the Committee on the Elgin Marbles, 1816 ful, or barely requisite to animal life, how few would have been the pleasures of creation! Mere existence seems all which the lowest animal is capable of enjoying; but the higher nature rises till she ends in man; the more refined and the more numerous appear our sources of gratification; and if the scale of existence go gradually on, sensations of which we are now incapable, and objects of delight which now we can never know, are perhaps provided by the great and beneficent Creator.—It appears, as far as we can dare enter into the thoughts of God, to be the intention of his goodness to clothe utility and things necessary with associations of delight and beauty; that is, to instruct by attraction. Are not Poetry and Painting imitations of this divine principle? Do they not encircle morality and virtue, illustrious acts and illustrious actors, in all the variety of verse and language, form and colour, magnificence and splendour? Do they not instruct by pleasing? Certainly, all our efforts seem useless and insignificant, when, in moments of painful musing, one reflects on the inherent decay of nature, and the silent vastness of eternity! But because the works of creation are more sublime, we are not to consider our own efforts as insignificant. It is our duty to better the condition of our species by a sound and sensible exercise of our faculties, however insignificant such efforts may seem to creatures of vaster being. If the little ant, who labours to drag his ear of corn to his winter board, felt his insignificance as much as we do, he would laugh at his own weakness, muse on our superior power, relapse into indolence, and be starved before the winter is over.—Such objections proceed from morbidity or dulness, which have no feeling beyond touch, no notion of good beyond per centage, and no apprehension of any refinement beyond the durability of matter. We must be great in Painting, or we shall be ever an inferior nation. All that can be done has been done by individuals, both Patrons and Painters; the impulse is now to be given by Government. If once it could be induced to expand its facilities to the moral value of this glorious Art, if once it could be induced to take it up as it took up the Elgin Marbles, and form a Committee for the consideration of its wants, a shock would be given, and its example followed throughout the country, as it has already been followed regarding Sculpture. Most earnestly and sincerely and eagerly do I entreat the Committee, who have the arrangement of the building of Churches, not to be indifferent to the religious value of the thing recommended—not to yield to the vulgar prejudice of considering Painting as a mere decoration—but to be aware, that it is a high and a deep effort of intellect, the result of a combination of various powers, the gift of the Deity; and in its exercise as capable of exciting pious sympathy, as the roar of the organ, the melodious harmony of human voices, and the solemn intonations of prayer; to consider whether the thing be practicable, and if it be found so, not to relax from a just ardour till it be accomplished.—I anxiously beg the Government to remember, that the present Regency has been the most glorious in great deeds of any during the annals of England, and that they will not suffer it to pass off without adding the public encouragement of Painting to the number. This has never yet been done by any Government here; and it may be depended on, that the first British Ministry who have taste enough to begin it, will ever be remembered in the history of the country among its greatest benefactors. Let us do all we can do, and leave future ages only the honour of completion.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, FEB. 9.—On the 5th his Majesty, King Charles John, issued the annexed Proclamation, and, on the 6th, he was proclaimed King, by the Herald of the kingdom, in the usual form:—

“We, CHARLES JOHN, by the Grace of God, King of Sweden and Norway, &c. to all our faithful subjects living and dwelling in Sweden, greeting:—

“As we, in consequence of the proposal of our late beloved Father, our august King and Sovereign, Charles XIII. to the estates of the Kingdom of Sweden, were unanimously chosen on the 21st of August, 1810, his successor on the Swedish throne; and at the same time invited by the unanimous voice of the King and the people, accepted this honourable call, though attended with great responsibility, we felt a particular impulse thereto, in the events, wholly foreign to us, which decided your choice, and which, without our having had any share in them, solely directed your free and independent resolutions; we were thereby taken from that repose which had been our sole aim, and immediately on our arrival here your deceased King received us with the dearest proofs of confidence and friendship; and, adopting us as his son, and impressing on your work a more holy seal, which could but increase our obligation and our devotedness to our new country. During the years that have elapsed since that event, so interesting to our heart, we have exerted ourself to fulfil towards that never to be forgotten and ever beloved Prince, all the duties of a faithful subject and an affectionate son; and have daily received, in his paternal never changing tenderness, the noblest recompence of our endeavours. This happiness we are no longer to enjoy. Death has deprived us of him who, in this world, was attached to us with the most faithful love. From our filial bosom, from the arms of an inconsolable consort, from the circle of surrounding relations, from a people of whom he has been twice the deliverer, he departed with the calmness of a sage, with the peace of a good conscience, attended by the consolations of religion, and the tears of gratitude, to receive his eternal reward in a better world. We have received his last blessing upon you, which he pronounced on the verge of life with the same energy as in his most vigorous days, and on his dying bed. We took the sacred oath to inherit, together with his Crown, his tender cares for the country, his ardent wishes for your welfare. As we now, in consequence of this afflicting event, ascend the united thrones of Sweden and Norway, to govern both kingdoms according to the fundamental laws of each, which were approved by the estates of the Swedish Diet on the 6th of August, and by the Storting of the kingdom of Norway on the 31st of July, 1815, we have given the Royal Declarations, fixed by the King and the States of the kingdom, in the decision of the Diet of 2d May, 1810.

“Since we first trod on Swedish ground, it has been our highest care to defend your liberty, your privileges, and the independence of the kingdom. Providence crowned our endeavours with success. In the present melancholy hour, it was therefore our first duty, as well as our first thoughts, to implore its powerful support in our future actions. From your unanimity and patriotism, we expect the most powerful assistance. In faithful union with your King, who is bound to you by the laws, you will continue to be free and independent. In this manner you will most worthily honour the memory of the Prince whom we lament; and may his blessed spirit for ever protect a happy people, who can say upon his grave, with pure heartfelt gratitude, “Through him we possessed the laws which we ourselves made; the free soil which covers the bones of our fathers, and the brightened prospect of our future lot, which his virtues and his self-denial have prepared for us.”—We remain affected to you all and each, with our Royal favour, and recommend you to God the Almighty.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 23.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.

The Duke of MONTROSE brought up the Report of the Secret Committee, which was read by the clerk.

The Report began by recapitulating the statements made by the Secret Committee of last Session, and then gave a sketch of the disturbances in Derbyshire and Yorkshire, which are already well-known to our readers. It then proceeded as follows:—The arrests and trials, the discovery of the schemes of the disaffected leaders, and the continued activity of the Magistrates and the Government, must have checked the progress of disaffection; while the improved state of the country, and the consequent employment of the labouring classes, must have rendered even those who were most open to seduction less inclined to those desperate measures which urgent distress might have driven them to. It is the opinion of the Committee, that some of the disaffected, particularly in London, are still active and determined to persevere, though with diminished numbers; and that, therefore, continued vigilance will be necessary. The Committee next proceeded to examine those papers, referred to them, which relate to the arrest and detention of persons under the warrant of the Secretary of State, in consequence of the two Acts passed last Session, for the purpose of detaining persons suspected of conspiracy against the Government. The Committee did not think it necessary to enter into any particular statement concerning those persons against whom bills of indictment had been found, or who had been tried, or had fled from justice. Warrants were issued against ten, who have never been taken. Forty-four were arrested on suspicion of High Treason, who have not been brought to trial; of these, seven were discharged after examination, without any subsequent warrant of detention; thirty-seven were detained; but one who was finally committed, was soon afterwards discharged; another was soon discharged on account of illness; and a third died in prison. The Committee, after severally examining the grounds of these warrants, think that the arrests and detentions were fully justified; and they find, that in no one case was any warrant of detention issued except in consequence of information upon oath. The Committee also found that all the persons so arrested and detained, and not tried, were discharged from time to time, as the state of the country and circumstances were thought to permit. The Committee understood, likewise, that, up to a certain time, expectations were formed of bringing a large proportion of the prisoners to trial, but that these expectations were unavoidably relinquished. In conclusion, the Committee were of opinion that the Government had exercised the powers vested in it, by the two Acts of last Session, with due discretion and moderation; and also that the Magistrates in the several disturbed districts, by their activity and vigilance, materially contributed to preserve the public peace.

The Report was ordered to be printed.

The Earl of CAERNARVON presented a Petition from the Merchants, Manufacturers, and other Inhabitants of Manchester and Salford, the same as that presented by Mr. Phillips in the House of Commons on the 10th. The Petitioners, among other things, complained of the frequency of nocturnal domiciliary visits, made by subordinate agents of the Police, in which the greatest abuse and inhumanity were displayed. The Noble Earl also presented Petitions from Ogden and Sellers, similar to those in the other House, and from Guy Bray and John Acres to the same effect.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 24.

Mr. Bennet from the Commons brought up the Chimney-sweepers' Regulation Bill, which was read a first time; and Lord Holland presented a Petition from the City of Bath in favour of the Bill.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

BILL OF INDEMNITY.

Earl GROSVENOR presented a Petition from Mr. Evans, who had so properly resisted entering on a recognizance to obtain his discharge, against the granting a Bill of Indemnity, &c.—Laid on the table.

The Duke of MONTROSE presented a Bill for indemnifying his Majesty's Ministers and persons employed in apprehending Prisoners under the late Suspension Act. He should merely propose that the Bill be now read a first time, and on Friday he should submit some observations on the object of the measure.

Lord LAUDERDALE contended that some delay should take place, as it was possible the Commons Report on the same subject might be of a very different nature; so that if that House should think fit to impeach Ministers for their conduct under the Suspension Act, their Lordships would then have to sit as Judges on a question which they had previously determined. It was therefore a question of importance, and delay should certainly take place.

Lord LIVERPOOL observed, that if the Commons Committee came to a different opinion, that House would throw out the Indemnity Bill. Their Lordships were not at all bound to regulate their proceedings by those of the other House, of which indeed they were not supposed to know any thing, except through the votes of that Assembly.

Lord HOLLAND made some remarks in support of Lord Lauderdale's opinion.

A conversation took place, and a motion was made to delay the 2^d reading, which was negatived, and the reading was fixed for Friday.—Adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 27.

Petitions from the City of London against the Bill of Indemnity, and from Samuel Baguley and Elijah Dickson, complaining of the Suspension Act, &c. were presented and laid on the table.

INDEMNITY BILL.

The Duke of MONTROSE moved the second reading of this Bill. He took a view of the proceedings which led to the Suspension Act, which, he said, Ministers had obtained in order to save not to destroy the Constitution; and argued, that it was merely justice to them and to the Magistrates, who had done their duty under it, to protect them for having so performed it with humanity and moderation. He even doubted whether all the persons who ought to have been apprehended, had been arrested under the Suspension Act.—(Hear, hear!)

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE characterized the Bill as an invasion of the laws of the land, and contended, that whatever might have been the disaffection, those laws were sufficient to correct the mischief. The Bill not only went to protect Ministers, &c. but even all their informers and spies, whatever might have been their conduct.—(Hear, hear!)—Would their Lordships at once deprive the sufferers of all hope of redress for their grievances? Delay, at least, should take place, which would afford time for hearing the parties at the bar of that House; and for this end he should move that the word "now" be omitted, and "this day fortnight" inserted in its place.

Lord LIVERPOOL argued, that the Report of the Committee had justified the conduct of Ministers, and shewed that they had not abused the power with which they had been entrusted; the Bill of Indemnity, therefore, was founded on this ground. Parliament had reposed a trust in Ministers, and this was the standard by which they should be judged. The Suspension Act had afforded the means of securing the peace of the country, by the sacrifice of few or no victims.—(Hear, hear!)—Great danger had existed; and the commotions both in France and Ireland proved, that it was not necessary that men of rank should be concerned in conspiracies. All the measures taken had been well warranted by the necessity of the case.

Lord ERSKINE solemnly protested against precluding men who had been aggrieved from laying their complaints before that House. He denied that the danger had been such as to require the suspension of the laws; and he implored the House to stop this rage for indemnification on the part of men who were charged with wanton enormities, into which they refused to inquire. The measure militated against every principle of freedom and justice.—(Hear, hear!)

The LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that the great bulwark of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus Act, would have caused the greatest danger to the Constitution, but for the power of Parliament to suspend it occasionally, in moments of difficulty. Language had been used, in the House and out, respecting the Secret Committee, which was extremely improper; but their Lordships should act on their Report. Did they deem the Committee such rogues and vagabonds as not to have reported fairly on the facts before them? He was satisfied with the Constitution as it was; and he was astonished that the Whigs did not see into the designs of the Reformers. Were the rebels in Derbyshire for reform? No, that was downright nonsense. The necessity of the case precluded those who had been taken up from seeking redress, and they should submit for the general safety, for the evidence could not be disclosed: so that the Indemnity Bill was most reasonable, and it was supported by precedents. The country could never have been great and free, if Parliament had not had the sense to suspend its liberties.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord HOLLAND, among other things, said, that the object of Ministers was to protect themselves, their agents, and informers, to shield the horrible miscreant Oliver from the victims of his atrocious arts and frightful iniquities, and to trample all law and justice under foot, by denying redress to the injured.—(Hear, hear!)—It was time for them to look about, when a Noble Secretary had spoken of such a man as Oliver with respect. Would not the Magistrates imitate such conduct, and employ their informers and spies, to the destruction of all quiet and confidence? They should take warning by the example of France, where such evils had long prevailed. People had been ruined by arbitrary imprisonments, and they had just as much right to redress as their Lordships had to their estates. Suppose disclosures did take place—what had the interests of the State to do with the welfare of a set of wretched informers? A wretch of this sort in Ireland had been indemnified, and had honours conferred upon him! He called on the House, in the name of Honour and of Justice, to throw out the present Bill.

Lord STAMFORD said, he must tell the Noble Lord, that the person on whom he had heaped his abuse (Oliver) did not merit it, nor did the Indemnity Bill concern him, as he had done nothing at all to make such a measure necessary to his security. As to the system of Espionage, he abhorred it as much as any man; but when an opportunity of serving the country was presented to him by means of an informer, could he, as an upright Minister, as an honest man, refuse such information? He only wished it was consistent with his duty to disclose the information he had received, and particularly all which had passed between him and Oliver; all which however had been fully disclosed to the Secret Committee. But the public were mistaken in regard to Oliver's motives and conduct. He could say, with respect to those imprisoned, not one single case produced in him (Lord S.) the slightest feeling of self-reproach.—(Hear, hear!)—Under similar circumstances he should act just as he had acted. Their treatment had been most grossly misrepresented.

Lord GROSVENOR said, that he had heard nothing to justify the measure in question.

Lord CAERNARVON opposed the Bill, and spoke of doing justice to the character of "the injured Oliver." (Much laughter.)

The question being loudly called for, the House divided—For the 2d reading of the Indemnity Bill, 100—Against it, 33—Majority, 67.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 23.

In answer to a question respecting the finance of last year, the Chancellor of the EXCHEQUER stated, that the income being compared with the expenditure, there remained a surplus, including the sinking Fund, of three millions.

COTTON FACTORIES.

Sir ROBERT PEEL moved the second reading of the Bill to regulate the employment of children in Cotton Mills, &c. The Bill would prevent them from being admitted before nine years of age, and from that time until they reached sixteen, would place them under the protection of Parliament. After that age they would be considered free agents. They would work eleven hours, exclusive of their meals. The Bill would also prevent the iniquitous practice of working children after their parents were in bed.

Mr. PHILIPS objected to the Bill, both as founded on erroneous statements with regard to the unhealthiness of the employment, which was not so great as was imagined, and also as likely to injure our foreign trade, by restricting the hours of work in this country, while in others they were unlimited.

After a few more observations, the Bill was read a second time, committed, and the report ordered to be considered that day six weeks.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 24.

CITY REVENUE.

Mr. H. SUMNER made some observations on the application of the City of London for permission to raise 34,000*l.* on the credit of the Orphan's Fund, for completing Whitecross-street Prison. They had before obtained 95,000*l.* for that purpose, and the House should not grant any more until it was shown how that sum had been expended. The Corporation had been charged in their own Court as wasteful and improvident. They had expended in dinners to the Liberators of Europe, improvement of the public streets, gold boxes and swords, statues, colours, donations to charities, &c. 126,000*l.* The sum required for the goal was 134,000*l.*, so that if the Corporation had been just before they were generous, they would have had sufficient to complete their prison. This was not the only misapplication. The Bridge House Estate was vested in them for the building and repairing London Bridge; but 53,000*l.* had been applied to other purposes: so that in case one or two arches of London Bridge were swept away, they must come again to the Orphan's Fund. This was not misapplication only, it was embezzlement. By an ancient charter, the City of London had a jurisdiction in the Borough of Southwark, which had four Latin dormans, but had been lately converted into a place for a London and Antwerp. This was gross and nefarious job. As to the New Prison, nothing could be worse planned. He therefore moved for an account of the City Revenue, ending 31st December, 1817.

Sir WILLIAM CURTIS said, that the reason their funds were not adequate to the completion of the Prison was, because they had to maintain on an average 250 prisoners a year from other counties. They were ready to show how the former sum of 95,000*l.* had been used. The Hon. Baronet defended the plan of the New Prison. It was a poor man's prison, and the accommodation quite good enough. He moved, as an amendment, for an account of the duties constituting the Orphan's Fund and the charges on it, together with an account of the application of the 95,000*l.* obtained for the New Prison.

Mr. Serjeant OXSLOW said, that it was an abuse of terms to call squandering money on dinners, drinking, presents, &c. generosity, while they were obliged to ask for fresh taxes for useful purposes. The Hon. Baronet had not answered the statements of the Mover.

Mr. Alderman WOOD contended, that the City of London had embezzled no part of the Bridge House Estate. Surrey had also borrowed of the Estate to make a sewer in St. George's Fields. Though the City were not alarmed at a scrutiny, he did not think such a request as this warranted the House in calling for their accounts. The Prison to which this was to be applied was principally for Middlesex Debtors. There were now 400 prisoners in it who did not belong to the City of London; and 3,000*l.* a year additional expence was incurred by removing them from Newgate.

Mr. BARCLAY contended that if it should appear that the City had fairly expended its money—that it had been just as well as generous—it would be proper to relieve them; but if the money had been squandered, he did not think he should do his duty if he supported them in such a course.

Sir J. SHAW said the City had acted liberally in making necessary improvements in their new gaol without any pledge from Parliament; and he hoped the House would not desert them.

Mr. N. CALVERT thought that Middlesex should be rated for the support of the prisoners in London; but that the Orphans' Fund should not be applied to that purpose.

Mr. BENNET said, that the New Prison in Whitecross-street was one of the worst contrived and most discreditable he had ever seen. The questions asked about the disposal of the Funds of the City had been answered by an eulogium on their prisons!

Mr. H. SUMNER allowed that a rate on Middlesex, for the maintenance of the City Prisons, might be justifiable.

The House divided—For the original motion, 24—Against it, 11—Majority 13, for the production of the City Accounts.

PROSECUTIONS FOR FORGERY, &c.

Sir J. MACKINTOSH rose to move for an account of the prosecutions for forgery for the 14 years before and the 14 years after the Restriction Act. He said, that that Act should have increased the prosecutions: was not to be wondered at, but the amount of the increase was incredible. Before 1797, there were only four; and in the 14 years after there were four hundred and thirty-eight!—It was necessary to ascertain the consequences of this system, the diffusion of depravity, the multiplication of crimes, and the effusion of human blood which had resulted from its existence. When this knowledge was before the House, it would be felt that something should be done to put an end to such an enormous evil.—He moved also for an account of the number of persons convicted for coining gold and silver for 14 years previous to the Restriction. Sir James subsequently moved for an account of the persons committed on prosecutions between Jan. 1, 1816, and Feb. 1, 1819.

Mr. GRENFELL suggested that a distinct account should be laid before the House of the persons prosecuted for forging or uttering notes of 1*l.*, 2*l.*, and 5*l.*; as that would make it evident that the number of convictions and executions for forgery were owing to the Restriction, and the consequent vast issue of small notes.

Mr. LOCKHART deprecated any attempt to excite an improper commiseration for crime, observing, that it was the duty of the Bank to hold out encouragement to artists and chemists, with a view to the invention of some paper and colour which could not possibly be imitated.

Sir JAMES MACKINTOSH declared, that he never had any wish to excite improper commiseration for crime, or to take any proceeding likely to weaken the authority of the laws. But he would maintain, that any Legislature which held out a temptation to crime was a participator in the guilt of its commission.

The motion was agreed to, as were some others on the same subject.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY presented a Petition from Mr. Edmund Townsend, praying a consideration of the Bankrupt Laws.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On the third reading of the Prison Chaplains' Bill, Mr. CURWEN remarked that his object had only been to prevent the lavish expenditure of the money of the counties. He did not desire improperly to abridge the power of the Magistrates.—The Bill was passed.

Lord FOLKESTONE presented a Petition for Annual Parliaments, &c. from a part of Glasgow.—Ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL PUNISHMENTS.

Sir S. ROMILLY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to remove from the Acts of the 10th and 11th of William the Third, such parts as took away the benefit of clergy from persons tried for stealing in dwelling-houses, &c. This Bill, he said, had passed the House twice in the last Parliament, and twice in the present. On the last occasion the Bill passed without opposition, he might therefore say, unanimously; yet in each instance it was rejected by the other House. On that subject it would not be proper for him to say much; yet he could not refrain from saying something on the recent state of the administration of justice in the country.—Up to 1816, in ten years 1097 persons had been tried under the Act for stealing in houses to the amount of 40s.; of these 293 had been capitally convicted, but not one had been executed. Crimes however multiplied under the recent practice, which was not to carry these laws into execution generally, but only on extraordinary cases.—Very different was the practice in regard to cases of fraudulent bankruptcies and forgeries. The system here was just the reverse, and yet the crimes intended to be checked by severity had enormously multiplied. During the last 40 years, fraudulent bankrupt cases had prodigiously increased, yet for the last 85 years only four convictions had been carried into effect; for the defrauded creditors, rather than shed the blood of the offenders, suffered them to escape with impunity.—(Hear, hear!)—By the great increase of paper money and paper securities, the offence of forgery had also greatly increased, and few pardons were granted. Still the desired effect of great severity had been lost, for the evil remained. There was a strong feeling among the British people against the punishment of death for the crime of forgery. Some recent examples had been truly shocking. The other day two females were executed for the offence, and but for the timely interference of a worthy Magistrate and an Hon. Friend of his*, two boys would have been executed this very morning for the same crime, that of uttering forged notes; but a suspension of the sentence had been obtained. Such spectacles excited compassion for the sufferers, not obedience to the laws. Burke, in speaking of executions for political crimes, said that they only increased the ferocity of men, and taught them to regard life as of little value. Sir Samuel here noticed the proceedings at the interment of Haitch, as described in the Newspapers. He disapproved of such a horrid exhibition, satisfied as he was that it was calculated to produce the worst effects on the minds of the spectators. There was no authority for such proceedings, as, by the verdict of the Coroner's Jury on Self-Murder, the body was merely to be buried without the rites of the Church. Neither the Sheriff nor any other person had any right to order such a spectacle, which was disgraceful to the character of the country, and injurious to the public morals.

Mr. J. SMITH agreed in all that had fallen from the Learned Gentleman: there were numerous cases of forgery hushed up, as the parties would not prosecute.

Leave was given to Sir Samuel to bring in his Bill.

THE BLOOD CONSPIRATORS.

Dr. PHILLIMORE noticed the case of Brock, Pelham, and Power, who had received a free pardon, after having been found guilty of seducing three unfortunate Irishmen to counterfeit the coin, for the purpose of procuring the reward on their conviction. This was a matter which required explanation, for he could conceive nothing more horrible than that such blood-hounds should escape punishment.

Mr. BATHURST said, that a free pardon had been granted those men; for the Judges had decided that there was no law for the punishment of their crime. The opinion of the Judges, however, did not exist in such a shape, as would enable it to be laid before the House. The Law Officers had been desired to take into consideration the amendment of the law on this head.

* The names of such men should be known in every corner of the Empire: they were the Honourable Mr. Bennett and Alderman Wood.—Examiner.

Sir F. BURDETT deemed it scarcely possible that there was no law which could reach such villainous practices. He hoped that the Hon. Member would insist on the production of the opinion of the Judges.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that one Vaughan had been found guilty of being an accessory before the fact, the point being reserved for the opinion of the Judges, whether, as the law stood, a person could be so convicted. Brock, Pelham, and Power, had been found guilty of the same crime; and the 12 Judges having decided that the offence of which Vaughan had been found guilty did not amount to the crime imputed to him, it was deemed advisable that a pardon should also be extended to them.—The Law Officers of the Crown, he could assure the House, had the most anxious desire to bring those persons to justice;—(Hear, hear!)—but when the law came to be discussed, some very nice points arose, and the Judges were of opinion that judgment could not be executed. The offence was enormous, but the law was defective.

Lord STANLEY was proceeding to make some remarks, when Lord CASTLEREAGH observed, that there was no motion before the House, and that no benefit could arise from the discussion.

After some other business had taken place, Mr. BROUGHAM revived the conversation, by asking whether any steps had been taken to prosecute Brock and the others for a conspiracy?

Mr. BATHURST said he could give no information on the subject.

Lord MITON observed, that as the point had not been reserved for the opinion of the Judges, in the case of Brock, Pelham, and Power, he thought the conduct of Ministers in advising a free pardon was rather precipitate.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that as their cases were the same as Vaughan's, it was the duty of Ministers to see that they were not executed illegally.—(Hear, hear!)

Sir F. BURDETT remarked, that even if the law were as it was described, it was no reason why those men should not be prosecuted for conspiring to take men's lives for money.—(No answer in reply.)

A Committee was appointed to inquire into the laws respecting Clock and Watch-makers.

Mr. BROUGHAM gave notice of a motion respecting the destruction of the Income Tax Papers.

The Coroner's increased Allowance Bill was thrown out, on a division, there being 13 for it, and 30 against it.—Adjourned till Friday, on account of the Queen's Drawing-room, held on Thursday.

Friday, Feb. 27.

Mr. Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery, in Common Hall assembled, of the City of London, against the Indemnity Bill. On the Petition being read, Sir W. CURTIS said, I can only say that I was present at this Meeting, and I entirely disapprove of every word in the Petition. (A laugh.) It was ordered to be printed.

The Sheriffs of London presented a Petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. in Common Council, complaining of the gross frauds practised at mock Auctions.

Mr. LUSHINGTON said, the subject of the Petition was not unknown to Government, and would be attended to.—Laid on the Table.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.

Mr. BATHURST appeared at the Bar, with the Report of the Secret Committee, to whom the papers contained in the Green Bag were referred.

The Clerk read the Report, which stated that the Committee had examined the several Papers of a secret nature referred to them for their consideration. The first object being to form a just estimate of the internal state of the country, in which they were guided by the Second Report of the last Committee.—[Here the Report entered on the well-known proceedings in Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, &c.]—The Committee hoped, however, that the hour of delusion was passed, and that the leaders had repented of their error. Still, the Committee were of opinion, that it would require all the vigilance of the Government and the Magistracy, to preserve public tranquillity; and it was necessary they should continue to lend their aid to repress inflammatory publications, which had been pouring forth in all directions throughout the country; and were still in some respects in circulation. In the Metropolis, a small number of active and designing individuals had been uninterruptedly engaged in plans, with the ultimate view of subverting the Constitution; but they had made few proselytes. The Committee are fully sensible of the improvement in the situation of the labouring parts of the country; and that though the insurrection had extended to a considerable distance, yet it had not reached above a certain rank in life, whose condition was now bettered by the changes in the means of subsistence. They saw no reason to apprehend other than that the exertions of the Police would be amply sufficient to prevent any serious disturbance to the public peace. With respect to the persons apprehended and imprisoned, and since discharged, the Committee had examined into the charges upon which they had been apprehended and committed to prison; and they had found that those charges were substantiated by depositions on oath, and that the discretion vested in the Government to apprehend such persons had been temperately and judiciously exercised. Of the 37 persons arrested, 36 had been subsequently discharged at various periods without trial, and one had died in prison; they saw no reason to doubt that in the detention of these prisoners the Government had exercised a sound discretion, and much moderation.

Lord CASTLEREAGH having moved that the Report be printed, and observed, that it was not his intention to name any day for its consideration,—

Mr. TIERNEY remarked, that he was not surprised at the Noble Lord's opinion, that the Report was not worth the consideration of the House, for in fact it was nothing but a jumble of nonsense—(Hear, and much confusion.)—All the absurdities had been brought together in this precious Document for the amusement of the nation. The only material point was, that it was a complete white-washing of the Administration.—(Hear, hear!)—Ministers, it seems, had exercised their powers with the utmost moderation and the utmost humanity! All this was to be expected, when the accused appointed their own judges. Did the Noble Lord imagine he could impose on the House, or at any rate juggle men of sense and judgment out of doors? The Report was indeed unworthy of notice—it arose from nothing, was in itself nothing, and could lead to nothing. Nothing could come out of nothing,—though this had been nearly accomplished, when the Noble Lord was made a Minister,—and he himself was manifestly ashamed that a Bill of Indemnity was to be founded on such a thing as that now laid on the table.—(Great confusion.)—Where were the vouchers for this ridiculous production? He would not believe a word of assertions unsupported by evidence;—but it was a waste of time to comment on a document at once so absurd, so contemptible, and so ludicrous.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that the Hon. Gentleman's attempt to excite a feeling that the Report was unworthy of notice, would wholly fail. (Hear, and confusion.) He was not the profoundest oracle that had ever sat on that side of the House. Occasions would arise for discussion, though no particular day was named. There would be opportunities enough for the Hon. Gentleman and his friends to attempt to excite discontent and alarm.—(Hear, hear!) The danger had been great, and was now happily diminished. Those that remained would be met with due firmness.

Mr. BROUGHAM contended that the Secret Committee had been selected in a way which was a perfect mockery of impartiality, and the natural consequence was, a Report justifying all the proceedings of Ministers. He wished the Report printed, that the country, who was watching their proceedings, might see how Ministers had done their duty.

Mr. B. BATHURST said something in defence of the Report; but the departure of some Members and the private talking of others, rendered it difficult to hear what he said.

Sir W. BURROUGHS and Lord FOLKESTONE put each a question—to which Lord CASTLEREAGH returned no reply; but on Mr. BROUGHAM's remarking, that as the Report talked of plans of revolution still going on in London (alluding perhaps, he said, to the Spenceans) some information should certainly be given to the House,—Lord CASTLEREAGH observed, that he could not understand how the Learned Gentleman thought himself entitled to put questions to this or that Member of the Committee.

The Report was then ordered to be printed, and the House adjourned till Monday, after some conversation on minor topics.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MARCH 1.

Nothing further is said to be in the Paris papers respecting the alleged attack on the Duke of WELLINGTON. Indeed their complete silence is remarkable; and that of the ministerial papers on this side the water still more so. The suspicion is certainly materially increased, either that the thing was a trick, or was entirely of a private origin. And yet, if the latter, why not attempt to discover the man

His Grace did not even despise a common political paragraph in a Flemish journal; and as he is fond of reading "great moral lessons" besides, why not take the opportunity?

MATHURIN BRUNEAU, the Pretender, has been sentenced to a fine of 3000 francs, to three-fourths also of the costs of the prosecution, to five years imprisonment, to two years more at the end of that time, for insulting the Court,—and then, after all, to be at the disposal of Government. This is pretty well for an impostor, who was "too ridiculous to impose on any one;" but your legitimate dynasties have a special antipathy even to be imitated. It is worth while observing what a sensation of some sort or other these kind of Pretenders are sure to create. If a man were to pretend to be of the other and illegitimate species of aristocracy, to be a Prince of Poets or Philosophers,—SHAKESPEARE or BACON,—he would indeed get detected in a trice.

There is a quantity of painful subjects of notice this week connected with the disgusting defects in our Criminal Justice, and the still worse, because more immediately wilful conduct, which is to be recommended to Indemnity by that "jumble of nonsense," the Committee Report. All discussion on the latter topics is now almost entirely supererogatory, the gross corruption, and consequently the nothingness of the House of Commons in all debateable points of view, being so well understood. Yet it will be proper to notice, for other wholesome purposes, some newly transpired and shocking circumstances connected with the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and we shall enter upon these and similar matters next week, particularly the cases of Brock, Pelham, and Power, the pardoned blood-conspirators, and of the boys Spicer and Kelly, two fresh victims, who are now waiting with halters round their necks till it is further inquired into. We trust that a serious inquiry indeed will be made in the mean time. It is the very least the Home Secretary, who has got unfortunately implicated with these awful times, owes to the cause of public justice, and we may add, without meaning an ill compliment to him, to his own peace of mind.

Yesterday morning arrived the four days' Paris Papers which were due, from Sunday to Wednesday last inclusive. They contain no intelligence of importance. The same silence continues to be preserved with respect to the alleged attempt upon the Duke of WELLINGTON.

Calcutta Papers have arrived to the 18th of September. The Marquis of HASTINGS had reached Allahabad on the 1st of that month, and was expected to arrive at Cawnpore about the 15th. The Madras troops were advancing to the Nerbudda, and a large force was proceeding to take a position to the northward of that river. It was supposed Sir T. HISLOP would march direct for Elliephore. Sir D. OCHTERLONY had issued orders to the third division of the Field Army to be prepared for moving about the middle of September. The Pindarees, under the protection of SCINDEAH, were estimated at 70,000. Those who followed the standard of MEER KHAN consisted of but a few hundreds. RUNJEET SING continued to make professions of a friendly disposition towards the British Government. The Russian General Yermoloff, during his recent mission to Persia, is said to have been on the most friendly footing with the British Officers in that country, and is reported to have spoken in the highest terms of our nation, particularly to the Persians. Nothing, however, had transpired as to the real object of the Russian Embassy.

Friday was settling day at the Stock Exchange for the immense speculative Consol Account: two defaulters were declared on Saturday on the opening of the Market—one a Jobber of long standing, the other a large Speculator. The Account settled at something above 79.

A Norwich Paper says:—"The Rev. Archdeacon BATHURST having pledged himself to lay the improper conduct of the late High Sheriff of this county (H. N. BURROUGHS, Esq.) at the Meeting held on the 13th ult. before Parliament, wrote to consult two Members of the House of Lords, and one of the House of Commons, upon the subject. The latter Gentleman, in his reply, intimated, that "the present Ministers of the Crown have such an Augean Stable for him to cleanse, that he literally has not time to sweep the Norfolk Shire-house."

OLIVER THE SPY.—This infamous character was in Cardigan, the place of his birth, a few days ago, where he was soon recognised; and the whole neighbourhood assembled to inflict on him exemplary punishment; but he effected his escape, and travelled to Cardiff, a distance of 45 miles, where he was likewise recognised and seized by the enraged populace, who pelted him with rotten eggs and every offensive offal they could procure, and after rolling him in the different kennels, they tied a rope round his middle, and flung him into the Myrtha Canal, along which they towed him for a considerable distance, until some persons, fearful of the consequences, advised the multitude to desist. He was then hauled on the bank, where he remained for some time apparently lifeless, and when sufficiently recovered, he was permitted to escape.—Public Ledger.

When Mr. OLIVER, a short time after his return from Derbyshire, happened to be arrested on a charge of debt, and found himself destitute of assistance, my Lord SIRMOUTH very graciously sent a couple of his clerks to release him, and he was released accordingly. The newspapers are either ignorant of this, or from motives of delicacy to the pious Secretary, have declined publishing it. It is, however, a fact that can be attested by several persons of the first respectability.—Stanford News.

The ships for the northern regions are nearly completed. The bed-places in the cabins, &c. are so constructed, as to be removed, and every requisite for the construction of barracks will be conveyed in the ships, should it be necessary for the officers and crew to remain on those inhospitable shores. An astronomer also proceeds with them, with proper mathematical instruments, a dipping needle, &c. Provisions for two years' consumption, and an unlimited quantity of coals, are also embarked.

The Duchess of NORTHUMBERLAND was on Friday night delivered of a still-born male child, at her house in St. James's-square. Her Grace is as well as can be expected.

A post-chaise was stopped a few days since by the Custom-house Officers, just as it was entering Deal. On inspecting the carriage, it was found to contain 10,000*l.* in sovereigns and bullion, which they took to the Custom-house, but it was afterwards restored to the owners.

Mock Auctions.—We understand, that the most summary proceedings are about to be taken by the Solicitors of the Excise against a set of bad characters, who call themselves Auctioneers, who infest the different parts of the metropolis. A Gentleman was recently invited into one of these auctions to purchase household furniture, stated to be the property of a great mercantile house which had failed; he paid a deposit of nearly 40*l.* but has never been able to recover the property. Upon enquiry at the Excise Office, he learned that the Auctioneer under whose name the auction was advertised was not licensed; and the duties advanced according to the conditions had never been entered. The penalty is very serious; and we hope that the delinquents will be brought to justice.

Admiral Sir GEORGE BENKELEY died on Wednesday in South Audley-street.

That miserable wretch Haitch, in the letter he wrote to his murdered wife's mother, spoke of the deed he had committed, and the one he was just going to commit, with great coolness. He thus concludes:—"I am anxious to die and be with that dear object of my soul; for I am still persuaded that I shall have that unbounded pleasure of enjoying her company in a far superior way than ever it could be done in this transitory world; and as for what man does with this body, a mere lump of vile clay, it is of no consequence to me; therefore men may do with it as they please. So God Almighty bless you, and the remainder of your unfortunate family, is the last prayer of a satisfied man."—This ruffian, it seems, attended the New Jerusalem Chapel: and his talk about "this transitory world," and his "vile clay," shows how deeply he had imbibed the gloomy notions of certain sectarians, who daily libel their CREATOR by false and disgusting pictures of the works of his hand.—This man, who had just perpetrated one of the foulest acts that a human being can commit, upon a female too, whom he had already sufficiently injured, writes as if he was quite certain of possessing the joys of heaven! Is it not likely, that the notions inculcated, at such chapels, about the "rotteness of works" and the importance of "a saving faith," may have had some effect in confounding this man's ideas of right and wrong?—It is a pity that those who take upon themselves to instruct the ignorant will not talk to them about things they could comprehend; but it is much easier to prate darkly about mysterious and spiritual matters, and of another world, than to dilate sensibly on our social duties, and show people the right way to be useful and happy in this.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

Thursday was the day appointed by the QUEEN for the celebration of her birth-day, which occurred last May; in consequence a Drawing-room was held at her Palace, and the spacious suite of rooms on the first-floor was prepared for the occasion; and that her MAJESTY might experience as little fatigue as possible, in receiving the company, a velvet cushion, about five inches high, was placed close to the state chair, for the QUEEN to stand upon, and another for her to lean against. The company continued to arrive till past three. The PRINCE REGENT came in state with his suite in three carriages, escorted by a party of Life Guards, and was received with the bands playing "God save the King," the sound of trumpets, &c. The Duke and Duchess of YORK, their Highnesses of GLOUCESTER, the Princess SOPHIA of GLOUCESTER, and Prince of HESSE HOMBURG, went in state. The Prince of HESSE HOMBURG was presented to the QUEEN by Lord STEWART. It was remarked, that the proportion of Ladies at her MAJESTY's Drawing-room was unusually small, and there were but few new equipages. Besides the whole regiment of Life-guards, there was an extraordinary number of peace-officers posted in the Stable-yard and at the gate leading to the Park, whose orders were to prevent the assembling of any crowd: every person on foot was compelled to walk on. The consequence of this new regulation was, that there was no cheering, or any other display of loyalty usual on such occasions; and the PRINCE REGENT passed from Carlton-house to the Drawing-room with the most respectful silence of the spectators.—Morning Chronicle.

We stated on Thursday that a degree of irresolution had been manifested as to the holding of the Drawing-room. Report says, that the Minister of a great Northern Power had presented an Official Note on the marked objection which had been made to the presentation of an illustrious Lady at Court—and remonstrating in strong terms on the subject. The objection, however, was persisted in, and the consequence was, that the Minister of the Sovereign alluded to, did not attend her MAJESTY's Drawing-room.—Morning Chronicle.

The marriage of the Princess ELIZABETH with the Prince of HESSE HOMBURG is said to be at length finally determined upon; and it is also said to be definitively fixed, that, instead of leaving this country immediately, as was originally proposed, her Royal Highness will remain in England for some time. This arrangement has been brought about for the satisfaction of her MAJESTY, to whom her illustrious daughter has, in a peculiar degree, endeared herself, by a long series of the most refined filial attentions, and from whom the QUEEN, in her declining years, felt it impossible to endure the pang of separation.—Daily papers.

The refusal of the PRINCESS ROYAL of Denmark arrived on Monday or Tuesday week. On Wednesday it was communicated to the Duke of CLARENCE; and on Thursday he set off to Brighton, offered his hand to Miss WYKEHAM, "and was a thriving wooer."—The Duke has, it is said, given the legal notice to the Privy Council of his intention to espouse Miss WYKEHAM.—Miss WYKEHAM is 28 years of age, and is in possession of between seventeen and eighteen thousand pounds a year, landed property, with a very large sum of money accumulated during her minority.

By the Royal Marriage Act two modes are provided by which the Princes of the Blood may marry:—1. By the King's previous approbation, by and with the consent of his Privy Council, and consequently, by the same authority, in the name and on behalf of his MAJESTY, by the PRINCE REGENT. 2. By the Prince intending to marry, if he shall have attained the full age of 26 years, entering on the books of the Privy Council such his intention; specifying the person, which notice shall authorise the union, unless both Houses of Parliament shall, before the expiration of twelve months from the date of such entry, expressly declare their disapprobation of such intended marriage.

THE SALAMANDER.

MR. EXAMINER,—I went last evening with many others, by polite invitation from Monsieur Chabert, to see him perform his fiery experiments. From the number of Artists who were seated around me, I have little doubt but that this foreign Salamander invited the Royal Academy of Arts, supposing it to be the Royal Society, or some other Academy of Science.—What a mistake!

It may be sufficiently incredible, if I add, that he actually went through the following warm work with the utmost coolness.—He put his naked fist into melted lead; he swallowed two table spoonsful of boiling oil, and bathed his hands and face in the same; he melted sealing wax, letting it drop flaming on his tongue, whence two gentlemen took impressions of their seals; and after various other experiments, he finished by eating five fair mouthfuls of lighted torch, wax, tow, and all, as if it were salad.

OPERA.

THEY have had two very pleasing new ballets here, Acis and Galatea, and the Return of Spring. It is curious that the French, who are not at all so imaginative a people as the English and other neighbours, at least as the poetical individuals of those nations, should yet be the only persons to keep alive a public taste for the beauties of Greek poetry and mythology. It shows the natural grace and cheerfulness of the ancient imagination; for the French are, at any rate, a graceful and a cheerful people, — so cheerful indeed, that the only apparent reason, why they at once keep these things alive and yet go no further with them, is, that although they have taste enough to seek for elegant pleasure, they are somewhat too easily satisfied both with it and themselves, to search into its depths and sentiment. They go dancing over the surface, and are contented.

It is on this account, that the ballet of Acis and Galatea is not so good a thing as the Return of Spring; and did not so well succeed. There was some beautiful scenery and dancing in it; and it is impossible not to pity Polyphemus, when his love and his hopeless deformity ever came before one; but the charm of this story is in the depth and simplicity of the sentiment; even Orion has spoilt it compared with Threocritus; and what was to be expected from the still greater and irrelevant conceits, the twists and twirls, and pretty ostentations of a French ballet? Polyphemus, who promises well at first, goes off into a mere desperado, and then repents and joins the lover's hands, like a conscience-smitten old guardian in a play.

The Return of Spring is another matter. Here even the defects of the French school of dancing might be turned to account, by the license of the renovated spirits of Nature, and the fluttering and whisking of Zephyr. And so they are. The twirls are not overdone; and the gracefulness as well as coquettishness of the volatile Deity is preserved. We do not know which performs better, — M. BAPTISTE as Zephyr, or Mademoiselle MILANIE as Chloris: nor are we anxious to find out, for it is much better to be delighted with both. The only defect in M. BAPTISTE, besides a little too much French twirling, which however he scarcely practices too much in the present piece, is one which he has in common with most if not all other male dancers, — a too great laxity of air when he is not immediately dancing. But when he is, nothing can be more elegant, alert, powerful, and full of meaning. The scene in which he endeavours to carry off, or to whisk the rose out of Chloris's hand was truly enchanting, and as complete an embodying of the idea of a spring air as possible. He went close round her at times, stooping, and fawning with his head; then glanced hither and thither; then floated in a circle; then stopped and threw his limbs about, like little shoots of a breeze; then darted at her hand again, and missed the rose, which in the meanwhile she carried about in all sorts of graceful attitudes, sometimes with hands downwards, sometimes holding it up on each side of her in the air and gazing at it. We never saw a lovelier scene on the stage. The masques of BEN JONSON could not suggest any thing more beautiful and aerial. — Such entertainments revive the finest associations of our youth, keep the beauty of the external world before us, and remind us of the elements of grace and enjoyment we have in our natures. It is instructive as well as curious to see how the utmost refinement in the more polished part of society comes round for its entertainment to the pastoral pleasures, — to music, dancing, and poetry.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

5, Tartar Robbers dividing the Spoil. W. M. ALLAN. The few pictures of an historical and fanciful kind, which this Artist has given to the public, are worth so much more than the common-place of most of even our professed Historical Painters, that we earnestly wish he would assume a more decidedly historical character, and paint some subject, whose dimensions of mind and of canvass are large. We could hardly be disappointed in our expectations of such a work, observing, as we do, in Mr. ALLAN's pictures, especially that before us, so much preparatory requisite of thinking and of science. In our critical reminiscence, we scarcely recollect this SALVATOR ROSA class of subject more energetically rendered, if we except a want of purity in the flesh. No place and money-hunting member of subservient ministerial majorities, those licensed robbers, could be more eager to divide the spoils of the people, than are the Tartar robbers here dividing the spoil taken by a not less justifiable law of established usage of Asiatic power.

177, Bacchanalians; a Sketch. W. ETTY. — Had this been at all of original invention, we should have been much pleased with it as an oil sketch of a classical composition, and especially with its playful action in the figures, and rich spread of colour; but it is so express a copy of the style of the Old Masters, that, as far as it goes, we can only give it the small praise of an imitative memorandum of those fascinating geniuses.

22, A Cardinal. G. H. HARLOWE. — A head worthy of the Painter of the Queen Catherine in the last Royal Academy Exhibition. Not only are the anatomical and executive parts firmly and neatly detailed, but the character also. It has the true divine-right, supercilious character, of ecclesiastical domination over the superstitious conscience.

25, The Infant Moses. J. JACKSON, R. A. — This picture, like the moral and physical world, to compare small with great things, is a mixture of great good and evil. It has too much of Sir Joshua's generalizing style, to the rejection of that more neat and detailed execution of form and character, which Nature so invariably spreads before us. The head, too, of the child seems rather disjointed from the body. But the general look is altogether infantine, and the chiaro-scuro and colour are arranged and tinted with Mr. JACKSON's accustomed taste. The colour and pencilling in 122, are such as prove a confidence of hand that arises from a most vivid perception of nature. It is a head that VANDYKE might stand, with congeniality of feeling, to admire.

No. 41.

The Revolt of Islam. — a Poem. — by Percy Bysshe Shelley. — London: C. and J. Ollier. — (Concluded.)

THE reader has seen the fable as well as some passages of this poem, and heard the author's own account of his intentions in extracts from the preface. It remains for us to give a general criticism upon it, interspersed with a few more specimens; and as the object of the work is decidedly philosophical, we shall begin with the philosophy.

Mr. Shelley is of opinion with many others that the world is a very beautiful one externally, but wants a good deal of mending with respect to its mind and habits; and for this purpose he would quash as many cold and selfish passions as possible, and rouse up the gentle element of Love, till it set our earth rolling more harmoniously. The answer made to a writer, who sets out with endeavours like these, is that he is idly aiming at perfection; but Mr. Shelley has no such aim; neither have nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand of the persons who have ever been taunted with it. Such a charge, in truth, is only the first answer which egotism makes to any one who thinks he can go beyond its own ideas of the possible. If this however be done away, the next answer is, that you are attempting something wild and romantic, — that you will get disliked for it as well as lose your trouble,—and that you had better coquet, or rather play the prude, with things as they are. The worldly sceptic smiles, and says “Hah!”—the dull rogues wonder, or laugh out;—the disappointed egotist gives you a sneering admonition, having made up his mind about all these things because he and his friends could not alter them; the hypocrite affects to be shocked; the bigot anticipates the punishment that awaits you for daring to say that God’s creation is not a vile world, nor his creatures bound to be miserable;—and even the more amiable compromiser with superstition expresses alarm for you,—does not know what you may be hazarding, though he believes nevertheless that God is all good and just,—refers you to the fate of Adam, to shew you that because he introduced the knowledge of evil, you must not attempt to do it away again,—and finally, advises you to comfort yourself with faith, and to secure a life in the next world because this is a bad business, and that, of course, you may find a worse. It seems forgotten all this while, that Jesus Christ himself recommended Love as the great law that was to supersede others; and recommended it too to an extreme, which has been held impracticable. How far it has been found impracticable, in consequence of his doctrines having been mixed up with contradictions and threatening dogmas, and with a system of after-life which contradicts all its principles, may be left to the consideration. Will theologians never discover, that men, in order to be good and just to each other, must either think well of a Divine Being, really and not pretendingly, or not think of him at all? That they must worship Goodness and a total absence of the revengeful and malignant passions, if not Omnipotence? or else that they must act upon this quality for themselves, and agree with a devout and amiable Pagan, that “it were better men should say there was no such being as Plutarch, than that there was one Plutarch who eat his own children?” Instead of the alarms about searches after happiness being wise and salutary, when the world is confessedly discordant, they would seem, if we believed in such things, the most fatal and ingenious invention of an enemy of mankind. But it is only so much begging of the question, fatal indeed as far as it goes, and refusing in the strangest manner to look after good, because there is a necessity for it. And as to the Eastern apologue of Adam and Eve (for so many Christians as well as others have thought it), it would be merely shocking to humanity and to a sense of justice in any other light; but it is, in fact, a very deep though not wisely managed allegory, deprecating the folly of mankind in losing their simplicity and enjoyment, and in taking to those very mistakes about vice and virtue, which it is the object of such authors as the one before us to do away again. Faith! It is the very object they have in view; not indeed faiths in endless terrors and contradictions, but “a faith and hope,” as Mr. Shelley says, “in something good,”—that faith in the power of men to be kinder and happier, which other faiths take so much pains, and professed pains, to render unbelievable even while they recommend it! “Have faith,” says the theologian, “and bear your wretchedness, and escape the wrath to come.” “Have faith,” says the philosopher, “and begin to be happier now, and do not attribute odious qualities to any one.”

People get into more inconsistencies in opposing the hopes and efforts of a philosophical enthusiasm than on any other subject. They say “use your reason, instead of your expectations;” and yet this is the reverse of what they do in their own beliefs. They say, take care how you contradict custom;—yet Milton, whom they admire, set about ridiculing it, and paying his addresses to another woman in his wife’s life-time, till the latter treated him better. They say it is impossible the world should alter; and yet it has often altered. They say it is impossible, at any rate, it should mend; yet people are no longer burnt at the stake. They say, but it is too old to alter to any great purpose of happiness,—that all its experience goes to the contrary; and yet they talk at other times of the brief life and shortsighted knowledge of man, and of the nothingness of “a thousand years.” The experience of a man and an ephemeris are in fact just on a par in all that regards the impossibility of change. But one man,—they say—what can one man do? Let a glorious living person answer,—let Clarkson answer; who sitting down in his youth by a road-side, thought upon the horrors of the Slave Trade, and vowed he would dedicate his life to endeavour at overthrowing it. He was laughed at; he was violently opposed; he was called presumptuous and even, irreligious; he was thought out of his senses; he made a noble sacrifice of his own health and strength; and he has lived to see the Slave Trade, aye, even the slavery of the descendants of the “cursed” Ham, made a Felony.

We have taken up so much room in noticing these objections, that we have left ourselves none for entering into a further account of Mr. Shelley’s views than he himself has given; and we have missed any more quotations at last. But we are sure that he will be much better pleased to see obstructions cleared away from the progress of such opinions as his, than the most minute account given of them in particular. It may be briefly repeated, that they are at war with injustice, violence, and selfishness of every species, however disguised;—that they represent, in a very striking light, the folly and misery of systems, either practical or theoretical, which go upon penal and resentful grounds, and add “pain to pain;” and that they would have men, instead of worshipping tyrannies and terrors of any sort, worship goodness and gladness, diminish the vices and sorrows made by custom only, encourage the virtues and enjoyments which mutual benevolence may realize; and in short, make the best and utmost of this world, as well as hope for another.

The beauties of the poem consist in depth of sentiment, in grandeur of imagery, and a versification remarkably sweet, various, and noble, like the placid playing of a great organ. If the author’s genius reminds us of any other poets, it is of two very opposite ones, Lucretius and Dante. The former he resembles in the Dædalian part of it, in the boldness of his speculations, and in his love of virtue, of external nature, and of love itself. It is his gloomier or more imaginative passages that sometimes remind us of Dante. The sort of supernatural architecture in which he delights has in particular the grandeur as well as obscurity of that great genius, to whom however he presents this remarkable and instructive contrast, that superstition and pain and injustice go hand in hand even in the pleasantest parts of Dante, like the three Furies, while philosophy, pleasure, and justice, smile through the most painful passages of our author, like the three Graces.

Mr. Shelley’s defects as a poet are obscurity, inartificial and yet not natural economy, violation of costume, and too great a sameness and gratuitousness of image and metaphor, and of image and metaphor too drawn from the elements, particularly the sea. The book is full of humanity; and yet it certainly does not go the best way to work of appealing to it, because it does not appeal to it through the medium of its common knowledges. It is for this reason that we must say something, which we would willingly leave unsaid, both from admiration of Mr. Shelley’s genius and love of his benevolence; and this is, that the work cannot possibly become popular. It may set others thinking and writing, and we have no doubt will do so; and those who can understand and relish it, will relish it exceedingly; but the author must forget his metaphysics and sea-sides a little more in his future works, and give full effect to that nice knowledge of men and things which he otherwise really possesses to an extraordinary degree. We have no doubt he is destined to be one of the leading spirits of his age, and indeed has already fallen into his place as such; but however resolute as to his object, he will only be doing it justice to take the most effectual means in his power to forward it.

We have only to observe in conclusion, as another hint to the hopeless, that although the art of printing is not new, yet the Press in any great and true sense of the word is a modern engine in the comparison, and the changeable times of society have never yet been accompanied with so mighty a one. Books did what was done before; they have now a million times the range and power; and the Press, which has got hold of Superstition and given it some irrecoverable wounds already, will, we hope and believe, finally draw it in altogether, and crush it as a steam-engine would a great serpent.

CITY.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT, &c.

A Common Hall was held on Tuesday, when Mr. FAVELL proposed various Resolutions respecting the late Suspension Act, &c. He spoke with much force and truth of the hateful system pursued by Ministers, and justly contended, that if men were to be dragged to prison, and then released without trial or compensation, it was quite idle to talk of our valuable Constitution. Mr. Favell read a letter which had been sent to Lord Milton by the brother of the late Thos. Riley, stating the case of that unfortunate man; from which it appeared that he had been committed to York Castle, where he was kept a close prisoner, notwithstanding a Petition most respectfully signed had been laid before Lord Sidmouth, testifying the bad condition of his health, and the good character he bore as a loyal, industrious, and peaceable man. Lord Sidmouth would not interfere, and the consequence was, Riley became so depressed, that he terminated his existence by cutting his throat!

Mr. WATMAN seconded the Resolutions, in a speech, in which he noticed the conduct of certain City Representatives, who were so active in assisting the Ministers in their unconstitutional, arbitrary, and dirty work; but the day of retribution, he trusted, was at hand.

Mr. SCHULTES followed on the same side.

Mr. WOOLER was of opinion that the language of the Resolutions were not strong enough, though he approved the spirit of them. (See them below) He therefore moved others, by way of amendment.

They were seconded by Mr. HUNT of Bristol, who remarked, that had the sufferers at Derby been tried in London, he believed they would not have been convicted, for they had been tried by a packed Jury of farmers, who had been alarmed at the malpractices of the Luddites.

Mr. WOOLER's Resolutions were then put and negatived, but few hands being held up for them; and Mr. Favell's were carried.

Sir W. CURTIS avowed his determination not to support the Petition in Parliament.

Sir J. SHAW said he should hear both sides before he gave his vote.

Alderman ATKINS made some remarks, in which he attributed the death of Cashman to Mr. Hunt's proceedings in Spa Fields. (Here there was much uproar and hissing.)

Mr. HUNT defended his conduct, observing that Cashman had been driven to the act for which he suffered by starvation and unjust usage. The Livery, he said, had sufficiently shown their contempt of the Alderman, by the marks of disapprobation they had so unequivocally conferred upon him.—(Applause.)

Alderman Wood said he should give the Petition his best support.

Thanks were then voted to Messrs. Favell and Waithman, and to the Lord Mayor.—Adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved,—That this Common Hall has viewed with the deepest concern the frequent violations which have of late years been made upon the rights of the subject, more particularly by the late suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—a measure founded neither upon precedent nor necessity, but upon groundless alarms made by Ministers, through infamous and abandoned hired emissaries, for the purpose of stifling the complaints of the People, shielding corruption, and protecting abuses.

That the existing laws of the land were fully sufficient for the suppression and punishment of acts of tumult and disorder, and were so considered by our ancestors, who passed the Habeas Corpus Act as an additional barrier for personal security, at a time remarkable for plots and alarms, and arbitrary and illegal arrests and imprisonments.

That as the passing of the said Act in time of profound peace is without precedent—so is the wanton, arbitrary, and oppressive conduct of Ministers, under its suspension, unexampled in the annals of the country.

That this Common Hall cannot sufficiently express its abhorrence of those detestable miscreants, who, as Spies and Informers, have been seeking to ensnare the lives of unfortunate men, under the influence of want and despair, by exciting them to acts of treason and outrage. That the employment of such infamous agents is disgraceful to the Government, destructive of social happiness and intercourse among the people, and putting the lives of innocent men in a state of peril and hazard.

That this Meeting forbears to detail the numerous illegal arrests and detentions of persons who have since been discharged without trial; nor will they recount the numerous cruel and vindictive prosecutions in which the Ministers have experienced signal defeat and disgrace. They cannot, however, but express their opinion, that in the instances where convictions have taken place, those deluded men were the victims of the hired agents of the Government; and had it not been for the fortunate discovery of some of these wretches, hundreds of innocent men might have fallen a sacrifice to their artifices, frauds, and perjuries.

That this Meeting has seen, with no less grief than indignation, secret Parliamentary Committees, appointed at the suggestion of Ministers, composed of those Ministers, and other Placemen and Pensioners, for enquiry, upon such ex-parte evidence as the Ministers find it convenient to furnish them—while the Petitions of those who complain of injustice and oppression have been refused even to be taken into consideration.

That the object of such Committees, in the opinion of this Meeting, cannot tend to forward the ends of justice—to vindicate the violated rights of the subject—or to secure the people from oppression—but to screen, protect, and indemnify their oppressors.

That Petitions be presented to both Houses of Parliament, praying them immediately to institute such full, impartial, and rigid inquiry into the conduct of Ministers, as can alone satisfy the justice of the country, or the expectations of the people, by referring all the proceedings connected with the late Suspension Act to a Committee, to be composed of such Members only as hold neither place nor pension under the Government; and that they will not pass any Bill of Indemnity to Ministers, and preclude those who have been the victims of oppression from a fair appeal to the legal tribunal of the country.

BLOOD CONSPIRATORS.

There is much conversation on the recent act of grace. Three of the pardoned, Brock, Pelham, and Power, it should be remembered, hired some labouring Irishmen in Fleet-market, and set them to work in preparing counterfeit money, to betray them for the reward; and were caught in their own trap. Johnston's was a more dubious case.—Oliver and Co. incited people to the commission of treasonable acts. They were Agents of Government, men paid and patronized by Ministers. Would it not have been a strange inconsistency, to have punished the instigators to a minor crime, while those who laboured to seduce multitudes to commit the highest known to the laws, were cherished and rewarded? It does not seem at all improbable, that the Blood Conspirators owe their safety to Mr. Oliver. They should present him, and his Employers, with a piece of plate at least, in token of their gratitude and respect. Mr. Lee Keck will doubtless supply them with a panegyric on the "moral character" of their preserver, and Lord Sidmouth perhaps will supply a list of the eminent services of that "much-injured man."

Another business, of a very suspicious nature, has just been brought to light. Two lads, Spicer, aged 17, and Kelly, aged 15, have been condemned to death for passing forged bank notes. The Committee appointed by the House of Commons to examine into the state of Newgate, of which Alderman Wood is the Chairman, was applied to by a respited prisoner named Lucas, to take the cases of those boys into consideration, as he had been told by one Parsons (the nephew of Thos. Limbrick the Officer) that the youths had fallen victims to a plan concerted between Limbrick and a wretch named Finney.—Alderman Wood made inquiry into the circumstances, and Kelly was examined. He said that Finney had induced him to put off forged notes, had given him the notes, and purchased decent clothes for him, &c. Finney directed him how to proceed, followed him in his progress, and rewarded him for his trouble.—The day before he and Spicer were apprehended, he saw Finney talking to Limbrick the Officer. Spicer had never before that night been concerned in such business. Finney, Spicer, and himself were out passing bad notes; he got one of five pounds changed, and gave the five one pound notes to Finney, who put them into Spicer's hand. When they came to King-street, Seven Dials, Limbrick came up, seized him (Kelly) while walking by the side of Finney, and another Officer then took Spicer into custody; while Finney was allowed to look on, and then walk off.—Spicer said, he was never out before that night, and he had gone at the earnest request of Finney.—Parsons (the nephew of Limbrick, and a reluctant witness) was then examined by the Committee. He said that he had seen Limbrick and Finney often together, and could not conceive that any other than a bad inference could be drawn from seeing an Officer and a Thief intimate. The day before the boys were apprehended, Finney and Limbrick breakfasted together, and then went out in a chaise. He had told this to Lucas.

The Committee, on all this information, wrote to Lord Sidmouth, requesting that the two boys, who were to have been hanged on Wednesday, should be respited.—Lord Sidmouth replied, that their cases had been considered by the Council, who thought the sentence should be enforced!—The Committee, on Monday, again entered on investigation, when Sir Robert Wilson, Mr. Hobhouse, and other friends of justice and humanity, attended.—Fresh evidence was obtained.—Emma Connor, a woman who lived with Finney, said that he was in the practice of getting bad notes for Kelly to pass.—Mr. Bradley, the prosecutor, said, he had been told by Limbrick that he had got 30*l.* from the Bank for his trouble, part of which he had given to the person who gave him information.—Limbrick said, he had known Finney, who was a plaisterer, for three years. He knew him to be a thief. He offered to give information respecting the utterers of forged notes, and went and pointed out Kelly and Spicer, whom they took into custody. He did not suspect that Finney was a circulator of bad notes. When Mr. Westwood mentioned it, he went to look after him, in order to take him to the Bank. He expected no conviction-money, nor expenses. He did not know where Finney now was. Kelly's father told him (Limbrick) that he had sold his boy like a bullock.

Limbrick has been suspended.

The Committee sent another deputation to Lord Sid-month, urging the propriety of a reprieve; and on Monday evening, Mr. Brown, the Keeper of Newgate, received a letter from his Lordship, respiting the boys for one week, stating however that such time was allowed merely that further inquiries should be made into their case.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, Feb. 21.

CONSPIRACY.—NEW STREET.

This was an indictment preferred against Mr. Huskisson, M.P. one of the Commissioners; Mr. Milne, the surveyor; Mr. Nash, the builder; Mr. G. and Mr. J. Thompson, and Mr. Cornell, persons employed under the New Street Act, by Mr. C. Pitt, of the Adelphi, for a conspiracy to injure him in his employ as Agent.

Mr. Pitt pleaded his own cause, and addressed the Court in a speech of three hours.

Various witnesses were then called, who proved that Mr. Pitt was a person not at all liked by those in Office, some of whom had recommended that he should not be employed. After the evidence had been gone through, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he did not think it necessary to address the Jury upon it.—Lord ELLENBOROUGH then summed up, and the Jury immediately pronounced a verdict of Not Guilty.

Monday, Feb. 23.

LIBEL—THE KING v. GENERAL GORE.

This was an indictment against the defendant, preferred by Dr. Thorpe, and charging the defendant with having, whilst Governor of Upper Canada, published a certain pamphlet, in the form of a Letter to Lord Castlereagh, containing a malignant libel, reflecting on the character of Dr. Thorpe, who had, previously to that time (1803) held the situation of one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench in Upper Canada. The pamphlet imputed to the prosecutor that he had in his speeches from the Bench uttered seditious harangues; that he had drawn round him all the turbulent and fictitious spirits in the province; that he had been the associate of the Irish rebel Emmett, &c.

Evidence having been heard, Serjeant Copley spoke for the defendant, contending that there had been no publication of the pamphlet in question, but that it was merely a communication made by General Gore to the Attorney-General in the discharge of his duty, and not with any intention of injuring the character of Dr. Thorpe.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT thought the libel had been proved; and the Jury returned a verdict of—Guilty.

OLD BAILEY.

On Wednesday, Ann Tandy, a child only 13 years of age, was indicted for stealing, in the dwelling-house of Mr. Acres, 25 guineas, 18 sovereigns, a 300*l.* Bank of England note, and other 50*l.* 20*l.* and several 10*l.* notes, amounting in the whole to 1000*l.* the property of Richard Tandy, her uncle.—The Jury found the prisoner guilty of stealing, and the Recorder, after lamenting the depravity of a child so young, observed, that the best way to dispose of her would be to send her to the Refuge for the Destitute, trusting she was not so hardened in vice but she might be reclaimed. He hoped that with proper attention to her conduct, she might still be made a worthy member of society. He requested Mr. Tandy not to visit her.

On Friday the Sessions ended; when sentence of death was passed on R. Clayton, C. B. Pringle, J. Ram, G. Matthews, T. Cope, M. Ready, and J. Gossip, for stealing goods in dwelling-houses; R. Bishop, for house-breaking; M. Keefe, W. Dickens, and J. Dogherty, for burglary; J. Ward, and Harriet Skelton, for forgery; and J. Matthews, for sheep-stealing.—Seven were ordered to be transported for life, viz. Mary Smith, R. Barnes, J. Collins, W. Pryor, T. Smith, J. Bennett, and J. Laird.—Twelve for 14 years, viz. F. Furley, J. Law, T. Porter, T. Gregory, E. Swan, C. Daniels, W. Green, H. Sharesbrook, S. Furley, J. Stevens, J. Hill, and J. Riley; and 35 for seven years; 7 were sentenced for imprisonment in the House of Correction, London; 34 in ditto for the county; seven in Newgate for various periods; two to be publicly, and four to be privately whipped; three were fined 1*s.* each and discharged; 12 judgments respited; and 11 discharged by proclamation.—Adjourned to the 1st of April.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

Tuesday, W. Johnson, late a letter-carrier, and G. Johnson, his brother, were re-examined, for stealing upwards of 1,000*l.* from letters. The latter was told that he was discharged, and was free to give evidence. After this an extraordinary scene took place. He took the Testament in his hand, and allowed the oath to be administered to him; but when some questions were put to him, he did not answer, but appeared motionless and speechless, and the blood left his face. Some thought he was struck dumb, and others that he was struck with death; but he was at length prevailed upon to answer the question as to whether he had ever seen some prints before, which were produced, and which were purchased of Mr. Dunforth, who received one of the stolen 10*l.* notes in payment. To this he answered that he had; and on his being pressed to say when and where, he replied, it was in the Office at the time of the first examination; and this was all that could be got from him. He was, however, bound over to give evidence, and on his being asked if he was content, he replied he supposed he must be.—The former was committed.

GUILDHALL.

The Parish Officers of St. Botolph, Aldersgate, were summoned for refusing to relieve Ann Smith. Mr. Hutchins stated, that some weeks since Ann Smith, aged 15, presented herself at Cripplegate watch-house, and requested permission to remain there until morning. She said she was a native of Leicester. Her parents having died, she was induced by a sister to accompany her to London. Here, in a few days, her sister deserted her, and she was two or three days and nights wandering about, almost starving; and when she entered the watch-house she was almost fainting with fatigue and hunger. The complainant was Officer of the Night, and learning that she had slept in Aldersgate parish, he applied to the Overseers to relieve her, but they refused. He then brought her before the Magistrate, who ordered her to be taken care of, until something could be done. Having failed in procuring her employment, he (Mr. H.) felt it his duty to summon the Parish Officers, and if possible compel them to afford her relief. After some conversation between Mr. Alderman Brydges, Mr. Hutchins, and the parties complained of, Brand the Marshalman offered to take her as a servant, until she could be better provided for, if the parish would furnish her with decent apparel. He thought about 3*l.* would be sufficient. The Worthy Alderman immediately gave 1*l.* and Mr. Hutchins 10*s.* towards that sum, on condition that the remainder should be paid by the Overseers, which was agreed to. On Wednesday, however, Mr. Hutchins again complained that they positively refused to fulfil their promise. The Alderman observed, that such conduct merited the severest censure. He feared that the increase of mendicity, as well as crime, was in a great degree attributable to the harsh conduct of many Parish Officers. He was sorry he had not the power to compel the Overseers to act up to their agreement; but he hoped their conduct would be properly exposed. The girl remains in the family of Brand.

SHADWELL.

On Tuesday evening, three men, accompanied by a woman, all of very genteel appearance, called upon Mrs. King, who keeps a house in the neighbourhood of Blackwall, under pretence of wanting lodgings. She took them up stairs, to show them the apartments; when finding no other person in the house, they tied her arms and legs together, and stuffed a handkerchief in her mouth. They left the woman with Mrs. King, while the men proceeded to rife the place; the woman in the mean time was gathering up every thing portable. Mrs. K. lay in this dreadful dilemma while the villains were gathering up every thing they could. It is supposed that they must have had a horse and cart, as they took beds, blankets, four mahogany tables, chairs, drawers, bedsteads, looking-glasses, plate, fire-irons, &c. so as in fact to strip the place. They next procured some cloths, which they hung on the bannisters, placed some lighted candles underneath them, and used the same plan in other parts of the house: after which they quitted the premises, leaving those parts in flames. A person passing by, and observing the flames through the window, procured assistance, and they entered the house, before the bannisters were totally destroyed. The party who thus providentially interfered found Mrs. King in a very exhausted state; but she was soon in some degree recovered, though she still remains in a very precarious state. The Police Officers being on the alert, it is hoped the villains will speedily be brought to justice.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MURDER AND SUICIDE.—We last week noticed the dreadful catastrophe at Tottenham.—John Knighton, aged about 28 years, who resided near Tottenham Chapel, was married about a month ago to a female about the same age, and on Friday week they were found with their throats cut.—Saturday an Inquisition was taken, when Mr. Bishop, carpenter, said, Knighton was a very sober man, remarkable for his attention to business. He had passed by deceased's house frequently, and noticed that it was shut up from the 14th. On looking through a window, he saw some blood on the stairs. He informed Mr. Walter, his brother-in-law, of what he had seen. They called on the Magistrate, and he ordered the door to be forced; they found Knighton and his wife both dead, a bloody razor lay on the ground. Their throats were cut in a most frightful manner. Mrs. Knighton's head lay close to the edge of the bedstead; she had nothing on but her shift; the chamber utensil was broken, her head appearing to have struck against it. Knighton lay with his head towards her feet, his mouth and eyes wide open, and his hands and arms outstretched. They both appeared to have been dead some days. Besides the cut on her throat, she had a deep cut on her chin. He (witness) was of opinion that Knighton cut his wife's throat, and afterwards cut his own with the same instrument.—Samuel Spencer, sexton, saw the deceased lying in the situation described. The key of the chamber door was in the lock on the inside. He observed the hands of Knighton were bloody; no person but themselves, had, in his opinion, committed the act. The watches belonging to them were in the room, and the plate and cloaths; no property had been removed.—Mr. Bishop stated, that he had observed Knighton lately in a melancholy situation; he had been disappointed of some money he expected from his uncle.—Another witness said that he talked a few days before very unmeaningly; and he believed he was not right in his mind.—The Jury consulted for a considerable time. Six of them were of opinion that Knighton murdered his wife, and then committed suicide, being at the time in a state of sanity;—the other six were of opinion that the deceased cut his wife's throat, and then his own, but that he laboured under a temporary fit of insanity.—The Coroner gave the casting vote for the latter verdict, and that was recorded.

EXECUTIONS.—Monday morning, D. Evans, convicted of the murder of his wife, expiated his offence. The unhappy man ever since the deplorable event seemed rapidly approaching a natural dissolution. Sunday, the Rev. Mr. Cotton administered the Sacrament to him, when he appeared extremely penitent. Soon after the Under-Sheriff informed him that his son (a youth of 15) was waiting to see him; he requested he might be admitted, when they rushed into each other's arms, and were for some minutes so absorbed in tears as to prevent utterance. When they had recovered this first shock, Evans conversed rationally with him, impressing on his mind the awful situation in which he had placed himself by giving way to passion, and warned him against the dreadful consequences of similar conduct. He slept for some few hours during the night; and on Monday morning, as the clock struck eight, he was executed. After hanging the usual time his body was conveyed to the College of Surgeons, for dissection.

Two more executions took place on Wednesday morning. W. H. Rawlinson and J. Rawlinson, brothers, were executed for stealing silk and lace from a barge in the River. The first of these unhappy men came up the ladder, and advanced on the platform with great firmness. He then surveyed attentively the preparations that were making for his death, and having done so, he joined in devotions with the Ordinary, frequently raising his hands in a supplicant manner, as high as the pinnioned state of his arms would permit him, and casting his eyes to Heaven. The preparations with respect to him having been finished, J. Rawlinson next ascended the fatal scaffold. They immediately shook hands and kissed each other, after which they continued their devotions until they dropped.

INTERMENT OF HAITON.—This proceeding did not take place till Tuesday morning:—about half-past eight o'clock, the body, which had been placed on a shutter, was brought from Newgate, and elevated in such a position on a cart, as to permit the populace to command a distinct view of it. It was in the same state as when he became his own executioner—none of his cloaths, excepting his coat, having been removed; it was very bloody, and was calculated to excite horror and disgust. In the shutter on which he lay, a hole had been perforated, and a small gallows was introduced into it, immediately over the face of the culprit.

The razor, with which he effected the murder and suicide was suspended from the gallows. On the arrival of the cart at the spot selected to receive the mangled remains, one of the Executioner's attendants held up the gallows and razor to public view. The Executioner then turned up the shutter, and the body was thrown into the pit upon its face, with cloaths, double iron, and every thing he had on at the perpetration of the horrid deed. The gallows and razor were thrown in after him, and the pit was instantly filled up.

A few days since, Mr. Parsons, a partner in the house of Croft and Parsons, paper-hangers, Strand, proceeded on business to Cheltenham. A young Lady, to whom he was about to be married, living in the neighbourhood, he hired a horse, with the intention of paying her a visit. He had not proceeded more than two miles, when the animal took fright, ran away, and finally threw him off. He fell on his head, and almost immediately expired. His corpse was conveyed to the house in which his intended resided. Her feelings may be more easily conceived than described.

On Friday morning a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Bannister, a colour-manufacturer, in Union-street, Borough, which quickly destroyed the same, together with those of Mr. Fagg and Mr. Abrahams, in Redcross-street, at the back of Mr. Bannister's. Mrs. Fagg, who had hoarded 100 guineas, unknown to her husband, appeared very unwilling to quit the premises when the flames had made considerable progress, and resisted the importunities of her husband, equally unwilling to suffer her darling hoard to be lost, and to betray the place of its concealment. At length, as the least evil, she discovered the place of its concealment, and had the satisfaction of seeing the object of her solicitude preserved and restored to its rightful owner.

In the evening of Monday or Tuesday evening a most inhuman murder was committed on the person of Elizabeth Low, a widow, 75 years of age, residing in the village of Dunning, in Scotland. It appears, by the marks of violence on her body, that the monster had effected his bloody purpose by a single blow with an axe, so as to fracture completely the skull, and afterwards proceeded deliberately to rob the house, as every moveable article which it contained was carried off.

MARRIAGES.

Feb. 21, George Attwood, Esq. of the Leasowes, Shropshire, to Mary, daughter of Thomas Kingersly, Esq. of Clough Hall, Staffordshire.

Feb. 22, John Patteson, Esq. of the Middle Temple, to Elizabeth, third daughter of G. Lee, Esq. of Dickleburgh, Norfolk.

DEATHS.

On Wednesday the 25th instant, at Pentonville, of a consumption, in the 33d year of her age, Mrs. Jane Jones, wife of Mr. Samuel Jones, of Barnard's Inn, Holborn, Attorney at Law, and second daughter of Anthony Parkin, Esq. of Great Ormond-street; Solicitor to the Post-Office; she has left an only child to lament her loss.

Feb. 20, in Baker-street, Portman-square, Lady Impey, relict of Sir Elijah Impey, Knt.

Lately, on his passage to Ceylon, the Hon. Lieut.-Col. Erskine, Lord Erskine's youngest son. He served throughout the campaigns in Spain. At the battle of Waterloo, he had his left arm carried off by a cannon-ball. As he lay bleeding upon the ground, the Prussian trumpets being heard at a distance, he seized his hat with his remaining shattered arm, and waving it round him, cheered his companions in the midst of the dying and the dead.

In India, Capt. Henry Fitzclarence, second son of the Duke of Clarence, and Aid-de-Camp to Earl Moira.

Mr. Hickman, late a Quarter-Master in the 15th light dragoons. On Tuesday night he went to bed in good health and spirits; but not getting up at the usual hour next morning, the servant went to call him, but found him dead. The Surgeon's opinion was, that his death was caused by apoplexy.

On Wednesday evening, Mr. Auld, of Surrey-street; he had dined with a party at the Freemasons' Tavern, where he remained until about eleven o'clock, and got into a hackney-coach to come home. On arriving at his house, the coachman opened the door to let him out, but, to his great surprise, he found him a corpse.

No. 517.

BLOOD CONSPIRATORS AND THEIR VICTIMS.

On commencing this subject, the ministerial papers have rendered it necessary to say a word or two respecting what they call "a spurious commiseration for crime." The writer and repeaters of this phrase do not venture to say openly that crime is not to be commiserated. Some good old maxim, and a wish to be thought liberal in the midst of illiberality, arose within their minds, and prevented them from going so far as that. But they tell us, what we all know well enough, that we ought not to have a spurious commiseration; and the secret of this piece of news is, that they were obliged to put in that word for the sake of begging the question, and throwing cold water on the genuine commiseration. They would not confess such a thing; they do not tell it, we dare say, even to their own minds; but this is the way that circumstances make them instinctively go to work.

Now observe how differently these people talk when the upper and lower classes are concerned. It is when the offences of the latter are to be discussed, that they admonish us against their "spurious commiseration;" it is when a squalid pauper is to be tried;—when a starving labourer has been goaded on to violence;—when a young offender, the son perhaps of another, and grandson of another, has been entrapped into the hands of the law by greater knaves than all three. In short, it is when the poor, the ignorant, and the ill-educated are to be brought to account, that we must be rigid in justice, and luke-warm in charity.

But, on the other hand, let a rich man or a mere surfeited idler, or the titled descendant of a whole race of knaves,—let a syllable be breathed against him, and—good God! how very shocking and ill-bred! Let his most notorious actions be commented upon,—and how horrid not to pretend to be ignorant of them! Let the observer be ever so charitable and impartial, and make the due allowances for him as for others,—and how wrong to say any thing about things so excusable! Let the offender behave in the unkindest manner he can to others,—let it be open and manifest to the whole world,—let him refuse, in the frailty that is dearest to him, to do unto others as he would be done by,—and hush!—for heaven's sake—don't speak against "the imputed weaknesses of the great." This is a phrase of the Quarterly's, and perhaps of the very writer before us. The "imputed—weaknesses—of the great;"—"imputed," because who can say that there are such things?—"weaknesses," because the vices of the great are of course nothing else;—"the great," because they live in great houses, give jolly pensions, and have boys made to them full of worship and lowliness.

He is but half a politician, who cannot look into the causes of things, whether they affect high or low; and a sorry and suspicious one, who refuses to do so. It is thus that society is eternally kept in a half-managed, disordered, and unhappy state; and that hypocrisies and resentments are the only answers you get, if you would see human nature dealt fairly with on all sides. Those who prosper by the system chuse neither to acknowledge their own faults, nor to put up with or properly alter those of others; and having rendered the world as unjust and unhappy as it is, or done their utmost to keep it so, they crown their corruption with as brazen a piece of impudence as can be imagined, by informing you, that it is too bad to be altered.

And pray mark, that after all, this is a maxim which they never allow but when their own infirmities are concerned; for they will call upon you, and threaten, and denounce, and punish, without end, upon the plea that you can alter it if you will, and that if you will not, you ought to be put to pain for it; but on their side, human nature is—human nature. Human nature is human nature in every point which they do not chuse to mend, or which it is not their special interest to look after; but something not at all so excuseable in what touches their own self-love and enjoyments.

The atrocious case of Brock, PELHAM, and Power affords an extraordinary proof, both of the enquiries that are wanting into the first causes of crime among the lower orders, and of the tendency there is in conscious and ill-constituted governments to dislike investigations into the very worst abuses of the very lowest authorities. For let the ministerial papers cant and gabble as they will, we can regard the pardon advised by their masters for these men in no other light; nor can the public at large. We attributed the delay of their punishment to this feeling some time ago; and we are now more than ever convinced, that we were in the right. The alleged ground of the pardon is, that another blood-conspirator, VAUGHAN, had been tried both for conspiracy and for being accessory to felony,—that Brock, PELHAM, and Power, had been tried only on the latter charge,—and that because the Judges on examining into the law on the subject had not known how to punish VAUGHAN on that charge, his Majesty's Ministers thought proper to advise a pardon for the three other blood-conspirators, even without reserving the particular point for further consideration. But what a jumble of no-reasons is here! Why have the Ministers advised a pardon for these wretches without allowing time for other measures to be taken against them? Why were those measures not taken instantly? And why again were they not taken at first? As long as these questions are unanswered,—and some of them have been asked and unanswered in Parliament,—the public will conclude, that the Ministers advised the pardon of these authorized vagabonds for the same grounds on which they let greater official delinquents escape, and on which they shew such an eagerness to let no un-official antagonist escape, delinquent or not.

But, says the Courier, in a canting paragraph, which after reprobating the depravity of the men, affects to tell us coolly, that the Judges unfortunately could do nothing;—and which takes care to utter not a word about the question of conspiracy,—“Our ancestors, doubtless, did not imagine that any thing so atrocious could be committed, and would have deemed it an implied libel upon the national character to legislate upon it. Every man must lament their escape; but with the sorrow there is this consolation, that we live under a Government where the law is so paramount, that even such monsters can expiate their crimes only by its decree.”—A very pretty sentimental compliment to our ancestors, and a still prettier to the impartiality exercised towards monsters! Another time the same paper would insist very indignantly that our ancestors had taken all the care of our lives and properties, which earthly wisdom could suggest; and as to the fairness with which we deal towards monsters, the complaint is, that we do not deal as fairly as we ought with men, no, nor women either. Remember the starving sailor Cashman, who was almost out of his wits with not having his dues, and with some liquor given him on an empty stomach;—short work was made with him and his rioting. There was as little contemplation, at all events, of the redeeming parts of his case, as of the atrocious ones of these pardoned assassins. The truth is, however, that till every means was tried to bring them to justice, it could only be a gratuitous and paltering assertion, that our ancestors did not contemplate the possibility of any thing so atrocious. Our ancestors perhaps did not contemplate all the particular features of the case, or the particular mediums through which the offence was committed. This is only saying, that they did not contemplate all our possible modes of life or resources; and we might as well be told, by way of argument, that “they would have deemed it an implied libel on the national character” to contemplate our paper-money, with all its tricks and miseries, our gambling lotteries supported by pious Dutch Ministers, our leader in the House of Commons, who cannot talk his native language, our support of Spanish, and French, and Gothic despots,—and the possibility of such a writer as the Courier ever being the principal journal of a British Government. Undoubtedly, the modern system of money, among its other beatitudes, offers especial facilities as well as temptation to knavery of every species; and our ancestors never did contemplate, that in order to enable a set of rich men to buy and sell seats in Parliament more commodiously, to usurp the Constitution, and carry on what wars and speculations they pleased, a paper mint, as well as representation, was to be devised, which has increased the number of executions in this country in a degree almost incredible,—so much so as to render England a bye-word in foreign countries for her “hangman’s hands.” We pray not to be “led into temptation,” and then set about increasing the temptations of our fellow-creatures as much as possible; and thence it is, that the community is so repeatedly shocked with stories of fathers of families and decent young men cut off, and of hysterical females borne half-bewildered to the gallows. But to say that our ancestors did not contemplate and provide punishment for snares which are laid against lives for the profit of the ensnarers, is either shamefully to avoid the spirit of the question, or to exhibit a deplorable ignorance of law, history, and manners. The features of the case may be still more atrocious now; we may concede that privilege to the present state of things; but did the Courier, in the course of his studies, never even meet with the name of JONATHAN WILD?—of JONATHAN WILD the Great, as FIELDING called him?

But what made these wise and just persons admonish us against the commiseration of crime? It was the interest excited by the trial and condemnation of two lads, SPICER and KELLY, who, some excellent friends of humanity suspected, were going to be sacrificed to the same sort of iniquity as that of BROCK and the others. On this occasion, people were to be warned how they commiserated crime; and just at the same moment, they are informed, that three of the most atrocious of criminals are pardoned. Nothing surely could be more disgusting than this; and the whole public, we will venture to say, with the exception of the few that identify their impunity with that of all authorities, of whatever sort, were and are most sincerely disgusted and shocked.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, FEB. 16.—Count Lowenhjelm is gone to St. Petersburg; the son of Field Marshal Baron Essen, to Paris; Baron Von Bildt, to Vienna; Major-General Von Bergen Straele, to Berlin; and Col. Von Clairfeld, to Copenhagen, with the news of the death of his Majesty King Charles XIII., and of the accession of King Charles John. The deceased King has bequeathed to her Majesty the Queen all the ready money in his private coffers, the estate of Rosersberg, and his own private jewels, on condition of their reverting to the Crown after her Majesty’s death. The present King continues to be extremely afflicted at the death of his predecessor. He expects his consort from France.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 2.

Mr. ROSE, the Clerk of Parliament, was sworn into office by the Clerk of the Crown: they both knelt during the ceremony!

PETITION FROM MR. BUTT.

Earl Grosvenor presented the following Petition from Mr. Butt (a similar one having been presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Bennett, on the 20th ult.)

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled, the humble Petition of RICHARD GATHORNE BUTT;

Respectfully Sheweth,—That your Petitioner is now confined in the King’s Bench Prison, under sentences of imprisonment passed upon him by his Majesty’s Court of King’s Bench, for libels against the Right Hon. Edward Lord Ellenborough, and the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Castlereagh; but your Petitioner submits, that such sentences of imprisonment were the sole punishments adjudged for his offence; and that your Petitioner was not thereby deprived of any immunities, rights, or privileges appertaining to the other native inhabitants of this realm, excepting only his being so subjected to imprisonment for the term specified in his said sentences: That your Petitioner has actions at law now pending, in relation to his private pecuniary affairs, and also suits in respect of certain wrongs and injuries sustained by your Petitioner, at the hands of some public functionaries, and more particularly in regard to an alleged seizure and deten-sion of your Petitioner's person, at the instance and with the concurrence of Sir Nathaniel Conant, Chief Magistrate of Police at Bow-street Office; which illegal seizure and detention took place before the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act: And when your Petitioner was brought before the said Sir Nathaniel Conant, one Pearkes, a runner, or person employed by the said Police Office for apprehending common thieves, was admitted by the said Sir Nathaniel Conant to depose on oath, that your Petitioner had been guilty of libels, although at such time the writing, so denominated libels by the said runner, had not been the subject of a trial in any Court of Law, or declared libels by any Jury;—notwithstanding which, the said Sir Nathaniel Conant, with the perfect knowledge of such facts, constituted the said runner to be a competent authority to decide what should be deemed libel, and did receive such runner's deposition there-to; and upon such testimony did illegally commit your Petitioner to the County Jail of Middlesex (called Newgate), where your Petitioner was confined for 48 days, until delivered therefrom by due course of law; and your Petitioner thereby sustained much wrong and injury, contrary to the laws and constitution of England:—That for such wrongs and injury, your Petitioner seeks redress by the laws of his country; and in order to the prosecution of his suits, hath found it expedient to plead his own causes: in pursuance of which reasonable and lawful object, your Petitioner did apply to the Right Hon. Lord Sidmouth, his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, requesting his Lordship to grant permission for your Petitioner's being brought up by Habeas Corpus to plead his own causes, the Habeas Corpus Act being then suspended: And your Petitioner made similar applications, without avail, to Sir Samuel Shepherd, Knight, his Majesty's Attorney-General, and also to N. C. Litchfield, Esq., the Solicitor of his Majesty's Treasury, and, finally, to the Marshal of the King's Bench Prison: And your Petitioner further humbly states to your Honourable House, that the Act for the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus having been happily repealed, your Petitioner did, on the last day of last Hilary Term, apply by Counsel to the Judges of his Majesty's Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, for their permission and authority, that a Habeas Corpus should issue, to enable your Petitioner to be brought up to plead personally in his said actions, but which application the said Judges refused to comply with; so that your Petitioner is left without remedy, unless from your Honourable House: And the grievance of such refusal of the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act to your Petitioner will be in effect a denial of justice, respecting which your Petitioner respectfully entreats your Honourable House will institute due inquiry. Your Petitioner also begs humbly to represent to your Honourable House, that imprisoned debtors are not debarred, by reason of their imprisonment, from obtaining all the benefits of the Habeas Corpus Act; nor does it seem reasonable that your Petitioner should be deprived of his birth-right in the benefits of that invaluable Act, and by consequence be subjected to most aggravated punishment, beyond the penalty inflicted and specified in the sentence of the Court: And your Petitioner craves leave further to state to your Honourable House, that your Petitioner is at all times liable, both at the instance of the Crown, or of any private individual, to be brought up by Habeas Corpus, so often as they may require his presence, without his privacy or consent, and without his convenience being consulted; and that it is putting your Petitioner in the situation of an outcast and alien to his country, and depriving him, by indirect means, of his rights and privileges; and your Petitioner humbly but fervently implores your Honourable House will be pleased to direct speedy inquiry to be made; and that your Honourable House will also restore your Petitioner to his right to the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Act, and take such means as to your wisdom shall seem meet, for securing to your Petitioner, and to all the other subjects of his Majesty, the full benefits of the Habeas Corpus Act, and preventing them, or any of them, from being deprived thereof by indirect means, and grant your Petitioner such further relief in the premises as your Honourable House shall think fit;—and your Petitioner, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

King's Bench Prison, Feb. 19, 1818.

CLIMBING BOYS.

Several Petitions against the employment of Climbing Boys were presented from various parts. One of them was from certain Master-chimney-sweepers in London, which stated that they had adopted the machines instead of boys; that such flues as were difficult to be swept by machines, were precisely those most dangerous for boys to enter; and that the cruel practice of using children would never be done away without a law on the subject.—Laid on the table.—Adjourned.

INDEMNITY BILL.

Lord HOLLAND made several remarks respecting the legal objects of this Bill, to which the Lord CHANCELLOR replied; after which the House went into a Committee upon it, when a long conversation ensued on several of the clauses, which underwent various amendments. One, however, proposed by Lord ERSKINE,—that the Bill should not protect those who may have committed persons to prison maliciously or without reasonable cause,—was negatived without a division, for if carried, said the Lord CHANCELLOR, it would nullify the whole measure. Another amendment,—that of leaving out the penalty of double costs,—was also rejected, though Lord KING observed, it was quite enough that men, who had been aggrieved, were prevented from obtaining redress, without imposing on them this additional hardship, and be ruined merely for seeking justice.—A third amendment, proposed by Lord CARNARVON, stating that no plaintiff should be barred his right of action, unless a Secretary of State would affirm upon oath that the public interest demanded a concealment of the information on which the defendant acted,—was likewise negatived without any division.—Lord LAUDERDALE proposed various alterations should be made in the preamble of the Bill; such as, “whereas, a rising took place in Derbyshire, and the insurgents were not formidable in their numbers; (laughter) and whereas, about 100 persons assembled on the race-course, armed with pikes or poles (much laughter) and whereas they dispersed about two o'clock: (loud laughter) and whereas the insurgents proposed to surprize the military in their barracks, but on their march they retired on the first appearance of the soldiery, and their leaders in vain attempted to rally them: (continued laughter) and whereas, the Committee are decidedly of opinion that in the country in general, as well as in those districts in particular, the great body of the people remained unmolested even during the greatest distress—(Hear, hear!)—it has been deemed necessary to apprehend, commit, imprison, detain without trial, &c.—(Hear, and much laughter.)—Lord Lauderdale remarked, that he had used no words but what were to be found in the Report, and therefore trusted that his amendments would be adopted. They were negatived like the others, and the Bill was reported.—Adjourned.

THE INDEMNITY BILL.

The 3d reading of this Bill having been moved,

Lord AUCKLAND disapproved of such a sweeping measure, and moved that the Bill be recommitted.

Lord KING followed on the same side, and deprecated the granting an indemnity to Informers on the scanty information before the House, thus refusing all redress to the injured. His Lordship alluded to the pardon of Brock, Pelham, and Power, and asked what was the difference between the Blood Conspirators and those paid Agents of Government who had excited the people to treason?—There was no sort of plea for such a stretch of legislation.

Earl BATHURST maintained it was essential that persons who had given information to Government should be protected for having done their duty. It was very convenient to say, after the Suspension Bill had prevented disturbances, that it had not been wanted. Parliament had approved the measures adopted by Ministers, and indemnity was the natural result.

Earl GROSVENOR spoke strongly against the Bill. He said he could bring persons ten thousand times more respectable than Spies and Informers, who would prove on oath that Oliver was at the bottom of the Derby Insurrection—(Hear, hear!)—The very first principles of Government were now reversed, for the strong were protected against the weak, the rich against the poor, the high against the low;—and he could see himself nothing but the maturing a system for the establishment of despotism—(Hear, hear!)—Such was the former system of France, which had produced the Revolution; and instead of the boon of liberty with the return of peace, a lava of despotism was now pouring forth on the various nations of Europe.

The Lord CHANCELLOR asked whether proceedings which assailed the altar and the throne were to pass unarrested by the arm of the law? The present race of libellers were not libellers of the Sovereign or of Ministers, but of the Constitution in Church and State. Would the Noble Earl give an indemnity to such? Their Lordships, he had no doubt, would do their duty to the nation.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE contended that to indemnify not only a few individuals, but the whole of those concerned,—Ministers, Magistrates, Spies, Informers, and all, was a mode of legislation which he thought extremely unbecoming and unjustifiable. It was truly a dangerous example in time of peace, to withdraw the liberties of the people from the protection of the laws.

The Earl of WESTMORLAND maintained that Government was in possession of information respecting the disaffected, long before they knew those individuals whom they called Spies and Informers, though they had been of much service. Even if Ministers or Magistrates had a little exceeded their duty, they ought to be protected for the great benefit they had conferred on the country.

Earl CARNARVON contended that the passing this Bill of Indemnity would strike a deeper wound into the liberties of the people than any thing which their Lordships had previously sanctioned.

The amendment was then negatived. Another,—that the Bill be read a third time that day three months, was also negatived on a division, there being 27 for the amendment, and 93 against it. The Bill was subsequently passed.—Adjourned.

Friday, March 6.

The Offices Annual Indemnity Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned till Monday.

PROTEST

ENTERED ON THE JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS AGAINST THE INDEMNITY BILL.

DISSENTIENT.

Because it is manifest that there has been no widely spread traitorous conspiracy, nor even any extensive disaffection to the Government, since the Secret Committee, whose report is the sole foundation of this proceeding, do themselves express their satisfaction in delivering their decided opinion, "that not only the country in general, but in those districts where the designs of the disaffected were the most actively and unremittingly employed, the great body of the people had remained untainted even during periods of the greatest internal difficulty and distress;" stating further as facts, "that the insurgents were not formidable by their numbers, though actuated by an atrocious spirit, and that though the language used by many persons engaged in this enterprise, and particularly by their leaders, left no room to doubt that their objects were the overthrow of the established Government, yet that such objects were extravagant when compared with the inadequate means which they possessed; and that not finding their confederates had arrived, as expected, to their support, and that in the villages through which they passed a strong indisposition being manifested against their cause and project, some of them had thrown away their pikes before the military appeared, and that on the first show of force had dispersed—their leaders attempting in vain to rally them."

2d—Because in such a state of things, so consolingly described by the Committee, and so almost ludicrously destructive of every idea of an armed rebellion, or dangerous insurrection, more especially against a Government supported by such an untainted people, and such an immense military force, we cannot but think that a different and less alarming course ought in wise policy to have been pursued, and that tranquillity might have been equally restored by a vigorous execution of the ordinary laws and the exertions of a vigilant Magistracy, without any suspension of the public freedom, since it is the prompt selection and speedy execution of a few palpable offenders, rather than delayed proceedings against numbers upon doubtful testimony, that invest the Courts of Justice with a salutary terror and force.

3d—Because the departure from this just and judicious mode of proceeding gave an indiscriminate importance to the accused, whilst it exposed the administration of the Government to a dangerous disrespect.

4th—Because even when the Act of Habeas Corpus is suspended, none on that account ought to be apprehended upon questionable suspicion, or, to use the language of the Report, upon "such expectations of evidence as Ministers have unavoidably relinquished," but upon such grounds only as would be just warrants for arrests and trials in ordinary times, the only legal effect of the Suspension being, that it suspends the deliverance of the accused; we think, therefore, that a general indemnity for such numerous and long imprisonments, on it not even to have been proposed to Parliament, until an open and impartial investigation had taken place.

5th—Because, from the mistaken principle of this Bill, malicious and meritorious illegality are equally protected, on the false and unfounded assumption that informations ought to be indiscriminately and perpetually secret; but even if we could agree that whilst traitorous conspiracies are actually in force, and extraordinary powers in action for their suppression, secrecy could in all cases be justified, yet we never could consent to its continuance after order was restored; the laws being then sufficient to protect good subjects for having honestly discharged their duties, and because holding out such general prospects of Indemnity is a dangerous encouragement to mercenary informers, who make an infamous traffic in the lives and liberties of mankind, deceiving and disgracing the Government, whilst they betray the innocent whom they accuse.

6th—Because it is not the occasional resort to such secret and impure sources of evidence in cases of obvious necessity, but the systematic encouragement of it, which we conceive is sanctioned by this Bill, that we protest against and condemn, since the successful prosecutions of the worst traitors and libellers can bring no security to the Government of this country, unless the conduct of its Ministers and of its Parliament, by a faithful adherence to the free principles of the Constitution, shall constantly expose the malignity of their treasons and the falsehood of their libellous complaints.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 2.

Various Petitions against the additional duties on Leather from tanners, curriers, &c. were presented from different parts of the country, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HART DAVIS and Mr. PROTHEROE presented two Petitions, signed by 20 persons each, from Bristol, praying for Reform.—Mr. DAVIS observed that hundreds more of the kind were in preparation, but if they arrived, he did not think they would express the sentiments of his Constituents, who were enemies to radical Reform.—Mr. PROTHEROE remarked, that he was a friend to moderate Reform, but not of universal suffrage, which the Petitioners desired.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR gave notice of a motion respecting the proper supply of Water in cases of Fire, unless the want on such occasions should be remedied.

BLOOD-MONEY.

Mr. BENNET called the attention of the House to the several Acts for giving rewards upon the conviction of offenders. The evils of the system were many, but the most obvious was the effect which these rewards had in nourishing of crimes; for, instead of a criminal being stopt in the commencement of his career, he was encouraged, till by increased crime he was made, as it was technically termed, worth his weight; that was, till he had committed such a crime as should make his conviction produce to the person apprehending him the reward of 40*l*. Another great evil arising out of this system was conspiracy—conspiracies for the purpose of tempting unfortunate individuals to commit crimes, for the sake of getting the reward for the conviction of the unfortunate offenders. This system was of long standing, for in 1756, a wretch named Mac Daniel was, with others, convicted of a most foul conspiracy of this description, to which no less than 72 unfortunate wretches fell victims. A similar conspiracy was detected some years after, and now again in our days the same thing had been proved to exist in the case of Brock, Pelham, and others; and he much feared, that even at present two wretched boys, Spicer and Kelly, confined in Newgate under sentence of death, had been the victims of similar detestable practices. He proposed to bring in a Bill to repeal all the statutes giving rewards on the conviction of offenders, except two, namely, the reward of the Tyburn Ticket, which reward, however, should not in future be transferable, or an object of sale; and the reward of 40*l*. to be paid to the executors of persons killed in pursuit of highwaymen, or to the executors of officers killed in the discharge of their duties. Other modes of remunerating the services of Police Officers would be made the subject of consideration in the progress of the Bill. After some further observations, the Hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.—Leave given.

THE ELECTION REGULATION BILL.

Mr. W. WYNNE moved the third reading of his Election Regulation Bill.

A conversation ensued, in which various objections were urged; and on a division, the Bill was thrown out by a majority of seven—there being 44 for, and 51 against the 3d reading.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

The House went into a Committee of Supply, when Lord PALMERSTON moved the Army Estimates. It would be seen, he said, on reference to the Estimates, that there would be a diminution, in the amount of the Establishment, of 188,000*l.* In the present year, the permanent number of Land Forces, for Great Britain, would be diminished 1959, while those for Ireland were only 21,000; last year the amount was 24,000. The whole amount, in point of diminution of Land Forces was about 74,000*l.* With respect to the troops in France, a reduction in the expence had taken place, amounting to 175,000*l.* On the whole, the charges on the Establishment would be less by 418,000*l.* than at the reduction of the War Establishment. The whole amount of force on every station less this year than the last, would be 21,604 men. The Noble Lord concluded with moving, that the number of Land Forces for the service of the year be 113,740, including the army in France, &c.

Mr. CALCRAFT expressed his regret that the House was so thinly attended, on a subject of such importance. He thought that the army now proposed was greater than the necessities of the country warranted keeping up, or its safety required in time of peace. The Finances of the country were certainly not so flourishing as to justify so large an Establishment, nor so far, as he was informed, was the state of Ireland so untroubled, as to induce the Government to keep an army double in amount to the force in India. At present he should abstain from offering any motion for reduction, but in bringing up the report, he should move to reduce the number of force 8 or 9,000.

Sir M. W. RIDLEY agreed in the opinion of his Hon. Friend.

Mr. PEEL said, that the internal state of Ireland was most gratifying. The people had suffered great privations, to which they had submitted in a manner that reflected the greatest credit on their forbearance. Indeed, the Government had not found any necessity for enforcing the Insurrection Act; and he congratulated the House, that it had been judged expedient to reduce the force so low as 20,000 men.

Sir W. BURROUGHS contended, that in no former period did the Government think that the internal state of the kingdom required so large a force as now proposed to be kept up. He maintained, that under a deficit of 14 millions it was impossible the country could go on keeping up so large a military establishment, at a cost of six millions a-year, after being three years at peace. In truth, unless Ministers meant to propose a Tax on Property, he saw no probable means of defraying these enormous expences. With respect to the state of Ireland, if the Right Hon. Gentleman's congratulations on the tranquil condition of that kingdom were correct, what necessity could there be for a yeomanry force of 41,000, and a regular army of 20,000 men, to preserve a country which was so very quiet?

A desultory conversation then arose, after which the motion was agreed to.—The Noble Lord then moved the following among other sums, which were agreed to:—

£2,470,140, for the Pay of the Land Forces.

817,231, ditto for Ireland.

116,716, Staff of Great Britain.

33,860, ditto Ireland.

27,650, Medical Staff of Great Britain.

10,061, ditto of Ireland.

92,000, for the Volunteers of Great Britain.

31,541, ditto of Ireland.

855,419, for the Forces in France.

175,672, Pay of General Officers.

10,263, ditto Ireland.

129,009, Full Pay of Retired Officers.

3,697, ditto Ireland.

601,730, for Half-pay Officers.

50,172, ditto Ireland.

136,300, for Retired Officers of Foreign Corps.

42,050, Pensions of Chelsea Hospital.

16,796, ditto Kilmaham.

180,133, for Out-Pensioners.

32,800, Royal Military Asylum.

82,000, Widows' Pensions.

18,418, ditto in Ireland.

161,806, Compassionate List.

Mr. PEEL obtained leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the system of taking prison fees in Ireland.

BANK TOKENS.

Mr. VANSITTART obtained leave to bring in a Bill to prevent any inconvenience arising to the lower orders from too rapid a call of the Silver Tokens into the Bank. This Bill would propose, that for a twelvemonth after the 25th of March, Tokens should be received in the payment of postage and taxes. With such an arrangement he hoped no inconvenience would occur from calling in the Bank Tokens, and that it will do away with much of the alarm which he feared had prevailed on this subject.

Mr. F. LEWIS said, if the Bank currency were to be withdrawn, the greater part of the silver would be melted, and we should have none in circulation.

Mr. VANSITTART said, the general principle of the Bill was to suspend the penalties on persons taking these Tokens. Those Tokens taken for taxes would, of course, be conveyed to London at the sole expence of the Government.

Mr. BABINGTON was apprehensive that considerable inconvenience would be felt in the country by withdrawing these Tokens from circulation.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, March 3.

POOR'S RATES.

An Account of the monies raised for the maintenance of the Poor in England and Wales being laid on the table,

Mr. D. GILBERT said, he considered this the most important topic that could be discussed, for unless some limit could be set to the rapid increase of the Poor Rates, the ruin of the country was inevitable. Regulation would do little; they must grapple with the system itself.—He moved that the papers be printed.

Sir C. MONCK was of opinion that some radical measure of the Government could alone cure the evil.

Mr. CALCRAFT observed, that if by some radical measure it was meant to do away with the Poor Laws, he should protest against such doctrine. The Poor's Rate was doubtless an evil, but it chiefly arose out of the Taxation. Gentlemen must have their Corn Bill: they wanted a high price for corn, labour low, and a moderate poor's rate; but they could not have them at the same time. The labourer must eat.

Mr. F. LEWIS remarked, that if the Poor Rates were allowed to go on as they had done, they would gradually absorb all the rents and produce of the country. The people would have been much happier had the Statute of Elizabeth never been passed. There were too many instances of the detestable system of paying the wages of labour out of the Poor's Rate. Nothing, in his opinion, was less satisfactorily proved, than the position, that the amount of taxation influenced the number of paupers—(Hear, hear!)—The effect of taxation was only to take from the pockets of one class to give to another: it did not destroy the expenditure, it only altered the channel. Taxation merely changed the form and shape of society—it changed the description of employers rather than the amount of employment.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that the discovery of the Hon. Gentleman was certainly highly curious,—that taxation had no effect in increasing the number of paupers, or the sums necessary to be distributed among them: that is, it was of no consequence whether 1000*l.* were laid out in the employment of productive labour, or whether such sum should be withdrawn from productive labour, and given to a Sinecure Lord of the Admiralty, who did no work whatever!—(Hear, and laughter.)—He protested against such a doctrine, and he pledged himself to show, that there never was one more fallacious and dangerous to the country.

Mr. CURWEN observed, that a 25th part of the wages of every labourer was taken for the duty on Salt alone!

THE PARODIES.

Mr. BENNET presented a Petition from Jonathan Buckley, a small bookseller of Warrington, who had been arrested for selling the Political Litany for which Mr. Hone had been tried. He was dragged to jail, loaded with irons, removed at night in an open cart, ironed, to another prison, where he remained two days and nights in irons, without even straw to lie on. He was then re-conveyed to Preston in a cart along with convicts sentenced to transportation. After being confined for 15 weeks, he was discharged on his recognizance. During this time his wife and children were obliged to have recourse to parochial aid.—Mr. Bennet said, however indifferent the House had hitherto shown itself to the grievances of the people, he trusted that it would not allow them to be made the victims of such wanton and altogether unjustifiable cruelty.—The Petition was ordered to be printed. Mr. Bennet then presented another Petition, complaining of similar ill treatment, from Samuel Billing, of Warrington, who had been arrested on a similar charge; and he asked, whether, as Mr. Hone had been acquitted, it was the intention of the Attorney-General to bring these men to trial?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that would depend on circumstances; but it did not follow, because one acquittal had taken place, that no others were to be followed up, and that poison was to be circulated in every quarter.

Mr. LITTLETON observed, that notwithstanding the verdicts of the Juries, he considered these parodies as detestable libels; but it was doubtful whether further prosecutions would not aggravate the evil. Had not the minds of the Jurors been indisposed towards all State Prosecutions by the unconstitutional law which had been passed?—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. BROUGHAM avowed his unqualified disapprobation of such parodies; but considering the impunity of former libels of the kind, had he been on the Jury, he should have returned a like verdict. The Jury deemed them political prosecutions, and that had ten times as much blasphemy been crammed into them, they would not have been called upon for a verdict, had they been on the right side. They saw that the intention was to make Religion a cloak for political purposes.—(Hear, hear!)—When the Noble Lord and his Colleagues entered office, parodies of a much more disgraceful nature were put forth, under the special protection of those very persons who now instituted prosecutions: but those parodies were to serve their own political ends. Nothing could be more shameful, nothing could be worse, than to make Religion a handle for political interests.

Lord CASTLEREAGH remarked, that no doctrine could be more pernicious, than that Juries were to travel out of the question of law, and erect themselves into a political tribunal, to consider the motives of prosecutions. Whenever the Scriptures were held up to ridicule, it was a high offence; but the parodies alluded to by the Hon. Gentleman had not been sent among the lower orders, to degrade the public morals, and render religion contemptible.

Mr. WILBERFORCE said, it was part of the law of the land that religion should be defended; and the Officers of the Crown would not have done their duty if they had not proceeded against the publications in question.

Lord COCHRANE contended that the pretext of religion had been used as a cover for political oppression. He hoped the House would attend to the Petitions presented, and not screen the guilty from punishment.

REFORM, &c.

Sir S. ROMILLY presented 46 Petitions from Bristol, each signed by 20 individuals, praying for Annual Elections and Universal Suffrage. He observed, that those who thought it illegal to send Petitions signed by more than 20 persons, were in an error: there was no law against it. He had formerly stated, that his view of Reform was not in unison with that here prayed for.

Lord COCHRANE presented petitions from R. Thorne, W. Irvine, and J. Buchanan, who had been arrested at Glasgow, and cruelly treated when in confinement. Thorne had been kept five days in a close cell without a bed and without aliment.

Mr. KINLAY contended that there had been no harsh treatment in Scotland: the prisoners had in fact been well provided for.

The Petitions were ordered to be printed; and Lord COCHRANE then presented nearly 200 Petitions for radical Reform, each signed by 20 persons, from Leeds, Newcastle, Glasgow, &c. &c. His Lordship said, that before the Session was over, Petitions with hundreds of thousands of signatures would be presented.—Laid on the table.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

The Report of the Committee of Supply having been brought up, Mr. LITTLETON alluded to the practice of exacting from the half-pay Officer an affidavit that he held no other office or employment, which he thought a very harsh proceeding, and one that should be altered, as such Officers were extremely ill provided for, and ought not therefore to be restrained from civil pursuits.

Lord PALMERSTON observed, that the half-pay was a kind of retaining fee for the army. If Officers were allowed to enter into the Civil Service they might become averse to the Military.

The Resolution being read, that the army for the present year be 130,000 men,

Sir Wm. BURROUGHS insisted that such a force was not required in the third year of peace, nor one which our finances could support. In 1792, the regular establishment was less by nearly 30,000 men; and then there was no yeomanry, as now. He moved that the number should be decreased ten thousand.

Lord PALMERSTON thought that the prodigious changes which had of late taken place in the internal situation of the country, the increase of our population, and the consequent increase of our establishment of the two periods.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. CALCRAFT contended that the reduction was quite practicable, and Government was bound to press down the expenditure to the lowest possible point.

Mr. BROUGHAM maintained that the people had a right to be governed at the smallest possible expence. If ever there was a period of danger, it was in 1792; but the French revolution had now fallen into disrepute, and the dangers which it was said to have inspired were now on the other side. The danger now arose from the doctrine that legitimate governments were to be supported by military force, and the fear that the liberties of the people would be trampled upon. He supported the amendment.

Lord CASTLEREAGH was confident, that if the House had not been satisfied that every possible reduction had been made, there would have been a fuller attendance of Members! The year 1792 was an argument against too hasty reductions of the military force, for the next year the country was at war. The enlarged state of the metropolis, and the increase of population, since 1792, seemed to have been forgotten.

Mr. BANKES thought a reduction might be made.

The House divided, when Sir Wm. Burroughs' amendment was negatived by a majority of 24—there being 27 for and 51 against it.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 4.

SUPPLY.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, various sums were voted for the public service; among which were 250,000*l.* for expences of a civil nature not included in the Civil List—60,000*l.* for the Milbank Penitentiary—25,000*l.* for Law Charges for 1818—6000 for prosecutions, &c. relating to the Coin, for 1818.

Mr. ARBUTHNOT moved a grant of 4,895*l.* for the expense of the Superintendence of Aliens, but withdrew the motion after some observations of Sir M. W. RIPLEY.

A grant of 725,681*l.* 12*s.* on account of the two millions stipulated to be paid to the King of the Netherlands, towards the improvement of the fortresses in the Low Countries, by virtue of the Treaty of 1814, having been moved, a conversation took place.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to some observations from Mr. WARRE, allowed that the Treaty (which stated that the sum to be paid by Great Britain should not exceed three millions) was not very clear, but that it was distinctly understood that not more than two millions would be expected.

INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

Mr. BROUGHAM moved for a Committee to inquire what steps had been taken as to the destruction of the returns under the Income-Tax. When he noticed this matter two years ago, it was said that directions had been given for their destruction; but subsequently these Returns were sold in all quarters for waste paper, and the same thing had been since observed. In one instance, goods had been sent to a person from a chandler's shop wrapped in a Return of his neighbour's income.

Mr. VANSITTART said, such a Committee would be productive of no sort of good. With respect to the Property-Tax, whatever he might do in the event of a new war, it was not his intention to propose that it should be revived during peace.—It had been eminently serviceable in war, and had carried the country triumphantly through the greatest difficulties with which she had ever had to contend with: but he thought it would be objectionable, as he trusted it would be unnecessary, so long as the nation should be blessed with peace. (Hear, hear!) With respect to the returns of the Property-Tax, he regretted that some of them had been destroyed, as if they had been preserved, they might have been useful in recovering arrears, or in detecting frauds. He, however, had no wish that any of the returns made, which related to trade, should be preserved. He only wished those to be preserved which could be no service to the Minister when imposing any new tax, which had reference but to landed property,—which had never been a matter of secrecy, and which never could disclose any thing of importance. The present motion, however, was premature, for there still remained an arrear of from 200,000*l.* to 300,000*l.* of the Property-Tax due.

Mr. GRENFELL congratulated the country on the avowal, that the Income-Tax would not be laid on during a time of peace.

Mr. CALVERT noticed the conduct of certain Surveyors of Taxes, who overrated houses without due examination, particularly in the neighbourhood of Twickenham and Isleworth.

Some conversation ensued, and the further consideration of the motion was postponed till Tuesday.

REFORM.

Alderman WOOD presented Petitions from Leeds and Birmingham, stating that if a Reform did not take place, they should not be able to pay the exorbitant taxes.—Laid on the table.

Sir M. W. RIDLEY presented a Petition on the same subject from Newcastle, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAYMENTS IN SPECIE.

Lord A. HAMILTON, for the purpose of learning what steps had been taken towards the resumption of Cash Payments, moved "for a Copy of any Notice issued by the Bank in 1817, respecting the Payment of their Notes, the amount of Payment to which they became liable in consequence of such Notice, and the Amount which they actually paid."

Mr. VANSITTART deprecated all interference on the part of the House with the proceedings of the Bank, as tending to retard rather than accelerate the wished-for object. The Bank had made considerable payments, and the Directors were most willing to resume payments in cash. If they were not interfered with, the intention of Parliament would be carried into execution as early as possible.

Mr. GRENFELL observed, that when he formerly had made a similar motion, the Right Hon. Gentleman said the Bank had virtually resumed cash payments: now, however, this was not even pretended. The conduct of the Right Hon. Gentleman was certainly remarkable respecting the Bank.

The House divided—For the motion, 11—Against it, 34.

Mr. TIERNEY then rose and made various observations on the same subject, contending, that if the Bank, by their large paper issues, were multiplying difficulties rather than facilitating a return to Cash Payments, then there was a juggle going on, disgraceful both to Government and the Bank. No one could deny, he said, that whilst the present fluctuating state of circulation continued, the private property of every man in the kingdom was placed in the greatest jeopardy, and that some great calamity must, sooner or later, be the inevitable result. It was impossible but that an inconvertible paper currency without limit, must end in ruin. It might be the case that some of the Directors of the Bank would explain the motives for these increased issues of their paper. Should they afford no such explanation, but shelter themselves under the majorities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he for one, and he believed the whole kingdom, would entertain their suspicions of such conduct.—The Right Hon. Gentleman concluded with moving for the total weekly account of issues, from the 3d of February to the 3d of March, distinguishing the Bank Notes from the Bank Post Bills.

Mr. VANSITTART said, he should not oppose the motion, and he agreed in the principle maintained, that a reduction in the issues of the Bank was a necessary preparation to the resumption of Cash Payments.

Mr. MANNING said, that the Directors were prepared to justify all their proceedings. The Bank had no wish to extend their issues, and he had no objection to the motion.

Mr. GRENFELL remarked, that the Bank issues had increased during the whole half of last year. It was greater than at any former period of equal duration since 1797; and at this moment gambling in the funds was carried on without precedent or parallel. (Hear, hear!) The Right Hon. Gentleman was a moral man, and he was sure he was not aware of the effects of the present vacillating system. He would, therefore, intreat him to give the public some certain information respecting his plan of finance.

Mr. VANSITTART denied that any thing he had ever said could have led to the encouragement of gambling in the funds, and he treated the insinuation with contempt. (Hear, hear!) He should make no such disclosure, as suggested by the Hon. Gentleman, as premature statements could only lead to the evil complained of.

Mr. TIERNEY said, that for many years past they had heard much of the sorrow of the Directors at not being allowed to pay in specie, and he wanted them to prove their sincerity.

Mr. GRENFELL disclaimed any personal allusion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, believing as he did that a more conscientious Minister never filled the situation.

The motion was carried, and the House adjourned.

Thursday, March 5.

EDUCATION OF THE LOWER ORDERS.

On the motion of Mr. BROUGHAM, the Committee was revived to examine into the State of the Education of the Lower Orders, and to report thereon.

SUSPENSION ACT.

Mr. PHILLIPS, after some judicious introductory observations, moved, "that the House, taking into consideration the report of the Secret Committee of the 20th of June, and also that of the Secret Committee of the Lords communicated to the House on the 23d of June last, so far as related to their statement, that persons said to be employed in detecting conspiracies might have had the effect of encouraging them, and having heard the allegations of certain Petitions on the same subject, were of opinion that it was their duty to investigate the nature and extent of the same."

Mr. ROBINSON opposed the motion, contending that the Petition from Manchester was of no importance: it was signed by 26 persons only; that one Lomax, said to have been a spy, was not a spy; and that as to another person called Dewhurst, they knew of no such individual. The assertions of Scholes and Mitchell were contradictory, and the House knew what Mr. Ward's evidence was worth. Upon the allegations of such men, the motion could not be agreed to.

Mr. F. DOUGLAS said, that all that had been urged had nothing to do with the question of inquiry. This was all that was wanted.

Lord MILTON thought that inquiry was loudly called for. They had heard statements of Oliver having been in different parts of the country, entrapping the unwary, holding meetings, using violent and inflammatory language, and inciting to the wildest acts of rebellion. Not one word of this had been denied. He hoped some denial was to be given before the present motion could be negatived.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—The conduct of Government was rather singular; they felt an abhorrence of the conduct of spies, but no inquiry must be instituted into this abhorred conduct! All other subjects were investigated in that House; the Civil List was overhauled; the Army Estimates were examined; but Espionage was not for the profane eyes of the House of Commons!—(Much cheering.)

Mr. BENNET observed, that the real name of the informer, who passed as Dewhurst, was Michael Hall, a returned transport; who after getting the people into a net, suddenly disappeared. He believed the whole of these pretended plots to have been fabricated in the forge at Bolton, and whilst such a Magistrate as Mr. Fletcher remained in the commission of the peace, he doubted not that crimes enough might be committed with impunity. The Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Robinson) had thought proper to cast reflections on the sources from which his Hon. Friend and himself derived their information. Such reflections well became those who had fitted out Castles, in the absence of all other evidence, as a witness to enable them to magnify tumult and riot into rebellion and treason. He would now repeat, that he was prepared to support all the statements he had formerly made respecting the conduct of Oliver, not by suspicious or polluted evidence, but on the testimony of men in no way connected with the acts of the conspirators.—(Hear, hear!)—He dared his Majesty's Ministers to file inquiry, and if they did not face it, there would be but one verdict in the country—that their guilt alone prevented them.—(Hear!)

Mr. B. BATHURST was prepared to contradict the dark surmises of the Hon. Gentleman, as to the employment of Oliver. Government knew nothing of his private character previous to his journey in company with Mitchell; but they had reason to believe that he had ever since conducted himself as a respectable individual. He was, in fact, an accomplice, but represented himself to Government to have fallen into what he feared was a dangerous society—one formed for the purpose of secreting persons charged with treasonable practices. It was deemed necessary to encourage him to afford information, and he was sent down to the North with Mitchell, who was a principal conspirator, and against whom a warrant had been previously issued. The Magistrate whom the Hon. Gentleman had thought proper to stigmatize, had exerted himself most zealously and meritoriously in preserving the public peace.

Mr. W. SMITH said, evidence had been produced to him, which charged the avowed agent of Government, Oliver, with having defrauded his employer, and prevailed on his daughter to commit the crime of perjury. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. B. BATHURST denied that there was any foundation for these charges against that much-injured individual, and cautioned the Hon. Gentleman to be more circumspect in future.

Mr. W. SMITH believed what he had stated, and contended that inquiry should be entered upon.

Mr. TIERNEY made many strong observations. He said that the fate of the motion was of the utmost importance, not merely to "the much-injured individual," Mr. Oliver, and his coadjutors in fomenting treason, but to the whole country; for the question was, whether the House should give its sanction to a system which had no parallel in the history of Great Britain. Three spies were principally referred to: the first was named Lomax, and all the other side could state was, that he could not have been a spy, because he had been taken up with the rest. But what could they say to his singular discharge, while the rest continued in custody? Nothing; and the unavoidable inference was, that he was a spy, and that as a spy he received favours at the hands of Government. The next was named Dewhurst, and of him the Right Honourable Gentleman had stated, that no person of the name of Dewhurst was known; but this Dewhurst was in truth no other than Michael Hall, who had passed under an assumed name—had taken advantage of an alias to carry on his plot against the lives of innocent men. It was equally true that Mr. Hall (another "much-injured individual") had enjoyed the advantages of foreign travel on board one of his Majesty's hulks.—(Hear, hear!)—As to Waddington, the third spy, not a syllable had been urged by his friends; he was left to his fate, and on that account might well be stiled a "much-injured individual." Against all these evidence was offered, and from the respectability of the individuals tendering it, it was fair to presume that the testimony was deserving of credit. If one thing more than another required the immediate investigation of Parliament, it was the rapid increase of spies in this country.—(Hear, hear!)—It was no answer to say, that Lord Sidmouth was a man of good character, when the proposal was, that an inquiry should be instituted into an odious system, which had grown from year to year, and was now arrived at a height disgraceful to the character and injurious to the Constitution of the country.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. WILBERFORCE was of opinion that the inquiry suggested would be laborious, endless. He felt convinced, that if the strictest investigation were to take place, all parties would come out of it with disgrace.—(A loud laugh from the Opposition.)

Lord ARCHIBALD HAMILTON observed upon the inconsistency of the last Hon. Member, who pretended to abhor spies, yet would vote against the present motion for inquiry into their proceedings.

Mr. PHILIPS replied at some length, when the House then divided.—Against the motion, 162—For it, 69—Majority against it, 93.—Adjourned.

Friday, March 6.

In a Committee on the Assessed Taxes, Mr. Lushington moved a Resolution, that all surcharges upon Four-wheel Carriages not drawn by horses or mules, should cease: a Resolution for regulating the Duties on Four-wheeled Carriages under a certain value, was also agreed to.

THE INDEMNITY BILL.

A message from the Lords brought up the Indemnity Bill, which was ordered to be printed, and to be read a first time on Monday.

Mr. VANSITTART gave notice that he would on Monday se'night move for a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration that part of the Speech from the Throne which related to the erection of places of Public Worship.

THE MUTINY BILL.

On the Report of the Mutiny Bill being brought up, Lord ALTHORPE moved, as an amendment, that there should be a reduction of 5000 men in the present Military Establishment. This was opposed on the ground, that, in proportion, our Military Establishment was not greater now than it was in 1786 and 1792.—The reduction proposed by the Noble Lord was rejected by a majority of 63 to 42.

THE LONGITUDE.

Mr. CROKER obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the various Acts relating to discoveries of the Longitude.—Adjourned to Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MARCH 8.

THE Ministerial papers have begun to say something again of the reported attack on the Duke of WELLINGTON; but it is merely to inform us, that they have nothing to say. The private letters from Paris mention some communications made by Lord KINNARD, in consequence of which it is supposed that a Belgic Officer has been arrested. Some say that the assassin was seen hastening into a house of ill fame; and others, that whoever he was, he was of importance enough to be got almost immediately out of the French frontiers. The affair, it is added, has been submitted to the Royal Court; but no proceedings transpire. A French General, who has written some observations upon the late speech of Lord STANHOPE, seems to consider the affair itself as Macbeth did the dagger—"Here's no such thing." In short, all that has come of it hitherto, is what comes of every thing in France,—an epigram. A joke, to use a characteristic English phrase, is meat and drink to a Frenchman. He divides his time between wit, gallantry, and society, as a modern Englishman does between shop-keeping, beef, and bad temper. The writer on the present occasion, alluding perhaps to the usual objects of assassinations and infernal machines, says that the offender missed his mark by taking too high an aim, having mistaken his object for a great man:—

"Mal ajuster est un défaut,

"On l'a manqué; mais voici comme:

"L'imbécille a visé trop haut,

"Il l'avait pris pour un grand homme."

"A report," says an article from Vienna dated Feb. 11., "was spread at the beginning of the week, that there had been an insurrection at Naples, and that the Royal Family had quitted the capital; we have just learned with certainty that these reports are greatly exaggerated, and that the whole is reduced to an affray which took place in a little town some miles from the capital, between the militia and the regular troops: they fought with great fury on both sides; night hardly separated the combatants. The following day order was perfectly re-established."

It is no very great specimen however of a pleasant state of things in a country, when the regular troops and militia fight against each other with great fury, and are hardly to be separated by night; neither is it the custom of very friendly states to let such pieces of news transpire.

The new King of Sweden (BERNADOTTE) appears to have succeeded to the throne, not only quietly, but triumphantly. The Ministerial papers here have taken a new tone in their mention of him; and he is now treated with "legitimate" respect, and not the less so, it seems, for not living with his wife. Her Majesty, who is sister to JOSEPH BONAPARTE's wife, and daughter of M. CLERY, a respectable merchant, and who would have been called a washerwoman or any thing else, had her husband not taken part against the maker of his fortunes, lives in a retired way at Paris; and it is said that the Duc d'AUMONT waited upon her the other day, from Louis the 18th, who has not been supposed very friendly to BERNADOTTE, with his compliments on the late event. The jumble of causes, reasons, feelings, views, &c. &c. in all these Court matters, is endless, but generally as common-place as most other mixed motives. That BERNADOTTE and his wife do not live together, may or may not be creditable to either party or to both; but it does not appear, at any rate, that he persecutes, or denies her the same independence of living he takes to himself,—still less that he married her for mere convenience, or has in any way ill-treated her; and it is things of this kind that make people indignant on such occasions, and not matters which they cannot possibly understand. Perhaps the cause of separation is on her side; or perhaps mere politics are in the case; or perhaps the separation, to whatever it is owing, may only be temporary. An honourable man will never treat his wife unjustly, or even make himself comfortable at her expence; but the most honourable persons may separate kindly, just as they may remain tenderly and without hypocrisy together,—precisely because they are honourable. It is impossible however to tell what may be the freaks of the legitimate and their imitators.

An excellent Protest has been entered on the Journals of the House of Lords, among the names to which, as usual, is that of Lord HOLLAND.

According to an article from Brussels, letters had been received there from Paris, dated the 27th ult. announcing that the Police had arrested three individuals who were suspected of not being unconcerned in the attempt upon the Duke of WELLINGTON.—Courier.

Report says, that a conference took place between an illustrious Duke and Ministers on the subject of his wished-for matrimonial alliance; when the objections of the confidential advisers of the PRINCE REGENT, to the Royal Duke's marriage with a subject of the Crown, were frankly stated. It is added, that his Royal Highness required some time to give his definitive answer, whether he would persist in putting the entry on the books of the Privy Council, according to the provision in the statute, where previous assent was withheld.—Daily Papers.

A morning paper says, "It is definitively arranged that the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess ELIZABETH with the Prince of HESSE HOMBERG, shall take place in Easter-week. After spending two or three weeks at Cranborne-Lodge, which is preparing for their reception, the Royal couple will proceed direct to Homberg, through France, by way of Calais."

There will be a meeting on Thursday next at the City of London Tavern of the friends of independent Election, Mr. Alderman GOODBENERE in the chair. We differ with Mr. WATMAN in some smaller matters, but we agree with him in great, and sincerely hope he will be returned. We are sure he ought to be,—especially as he has a tongue as well as good sound sense to guide it; and Parliament wants enormous recruiting in point of speakers.

A Correspondent wishes an answer to the following question:—"Which are the greatest scoundrels, Spies or those who employ them?"

It is calculated that above a hundred vessels have been wrecked in the late hurricanes. The last letters from the various ports abound in details of ships driven on shore, &c.

On Friday week, at a Meeting of the Committee of Directors and Guardians of the Poor of the Parish of St. Mary-le-bone, Dr. THYNNE was unanimously appointed Consulting Man-midwife to the St. Mary-le-bone Infirmary, in the room of the late Sir RICHARD CROFT, Bart.

The will of Baron DE QUINTELLA (of the city of Lisbon) has lately been proved in Doctors' Commons; his property in this country amounted nearly to 400,000*l.*, independent of his wealth in Spain: the duty which was paid to Government on his effects here amounted to 5,250*l.* We understand this to be the rich merchant to whom the Fortunate Youth asserted himself to be heir.

Saturday week an elegant dinner was given at Edinburgh to Mr. KEMBLE; Mr. WALTER SCOTT in the Chair. After dinner a snuff-box of 100 guineas value was presented to Mr. KEMBLE. The party included many of the first literary characters in Edinburgh.

The Reverend JOHN GEE SMYTH, of Chalsworth Rectory, (as we see by the Bury and Norwich Post) has been presented with "the valuable gift of a silver ink-stand," by certain Gentlemen, "as a token of the high sense they entertain of the zeal manifested by him, on a particular occasion, in support of"—What think you, reader?—"in support of the Game Laws."—In the letter of thanks for this "valuable gift," the Reverend Gentleman observes, that "the offence of poaching generally tends to the commission of the greatest crimes." But if there were no Game Laws there would be no offence of poaching; and this game-protecting Divine should remember, that his constant prayer has been, "lead us not into temptation."

NEW JERUSALEM CHAPEL.—A Correspondent denies that the murderer Hatch was a Member of the New Jerusalem Society; but says that he attended the Chapel for the purpose of betraying unsuspecting innocence. Our Correspondent adds, that at this place of worship "the heavenly graces of virtue, meekness, pure love to God, faith in the holy word of divine revelation, and heaven-born charity to one another and to all mankind, are insisted on as necessary to constitute man a safe candidate for immortality."

MR. HAZLITT'S LECTURES ON POETRY.—MR. HAZLITT terminated his series of Lectures at the Surrey Institution on Tuesday last. It was not a little striking, that though the subjects on which he treated necessarily decreased in interest every lecture,—(he began with SHAKESPEAR and ended with SOUTHEY!)—his audience continued increasing to the last; and on Tuesday the ample hall in which he read was crowded to the very ceiling. Nor was this at all surprising; for however some may have differed with him in his opinions of the merits and defects of the various authors under review, this was manifest to all, that a deep, an original, and a fearless thinker stood before them, one who could fix the attention as well by the force of his reasoning as the power of his satire and the flow of his eloquence. His touching allusion to his former friendship with a living Poet, at the termination of the lecture, excited the liveliest attention of his hearers; and when he retired, three peals of applause, and exclamations of "Bravo," marked the general sense of his critical labours.

The case of LORD FOLKSTONE v. MR. EASTAFFE, has been decided at the Berkshire Assizes.—It will be recollected, that LORD FOLKSTONE, under the Act of the 31st of the present King, which directs all Magistrates to visit the gaols, and examine and report the state of the prisoners, demanded admittance to the three state prisoners confined in the jail of that county, which the defendant, who was the jailer, refused, by order of the Secretary of State, which directed him to admit none but the Visiting Magistrates.—For the defendant, it was contended, that the Act could not contemplate State prisoners; and on this ground, after a trial of ten hours, a verdict was given for the defendant.

PITT v. HUSKISSON AND OTHERS.—We briefly noticed this trial in a late paper. It was an action brought by a Surveyor, an agent for claimants under the New Street Act, against MR. HUSKISSON, MR. NASH, MR. MILNE, &c. for a conspiracy to injure him in his profession. On looking over the report of the trial, it appears that MR. PITT proved by several witnesses, that as far back as the year 1815, Messrs. NASH and MILNE had induced persons not to employ MR. PITT as their agent. MR. PHILLIPS, a Clerk in the New Street Office, deposed,—(after admitting that the office was open to all the agents except MR. PITT)—that the Plaintiff was objected to on account of a transaction respecting a house in the Haymarket, which occurred in July, 1816! Now, whatever may have been the conduct of MR. PITT in this last transaction, it is quite clear that the endeavours used by the Defendants to deprive him of employment in 1815,—that is, the year before,—could not possibly have been occasioned by that conduct: they must have had other reasons at the time they first prevented his being employed.—As for the transaction about the house, it was this: MR. PITT asked 2000 guineas for what was afterwards purchased for 900.—Now we are decidedly hostile, at all times, to asking more than the true value of a thing; but it should be remembered, that the practice, on the other hand, of offering sums far below the fair value, is equally bad. One unjust attempt begets another. The New-street Commissioners, when cases in dispute have been referred to a Jury, have almost always, we believe, been compelled to pay more than they originally offered; which is a circumstance not at all to their credit.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

A publication is announced, under the title of "Observations on Lord Bathurst's Speech in the House of Peers on the 18th of March, 1817." These Observations are stated to have been written in the early part of last June; and they are preceded by a sort of imprimatur, dated Longwood, Oct. 9, 1817, and signed "Napoleon," in which he approves of them, and desires that they may be seen by the Sovereign and the people of England.

The observations are said to be written in the manner of those comments on the speeches from the British Throne, which occasionally appeared in the Moniteur while Bonaparte was ruler of France. The Emperor takes occasion in the outset to protest against the Bill in Parliament of April, 1816, which he calls an act of proscription similar to those of Sylla. He denies the authority of the British Parliament to place him at the disposal of Ministers, and to invest them with the right of placing him under restrictions. He denies their power of delegating that right, and then proceeds to argue against the restrictions themselves—namely, the detention at St. Helena; the name imposed of General Bonaparte; the prohibition of going abroad on the island, unless accompanied by a British officer; and lastly, the obligation of having all letters which he may write or receive opened and examined by the British authorities. He quotes in succession the principal statements in Lord Bathurst's speech, respecting the treatment to which he is subjected at St. Helena, and severally contradicts them in very round terms, entering much into detail occasionally, and execrating the conduct of Sir Hudson Lowe, as capricious and cruel in the extreme degree.

These arguments are mixed up with certain domestic disclosures respecting the Emperor's personal condition, from which it appears that he finds himself very ill accommodated at Longwood-house, which he describes as having been originally a barn, and as situated on the most unhealthy and exposed spot on the island, destitute of water, trees, shade, and verdure. The Governor having reduced the range originally allowed him; having forbidden him to hold conversations with the inhabitants, or to go into any house; and having also insisted that an English Officer must accompany him when he rides out, he has discontinued his favourite exercise, not having been on horseback for eighteen months. Under the conditions prescribed for his correspondence, the Emperor will not write or receive any letter. Such is the dearth of living at St. Helena, that the stipulated allowance of eight thousand pounds a year, divided by the number of individuals in his establishment, will scarcely amount to ten-pence per head, per diem, which he says is "soldier's pay." The flour was so bad latterly, that he did not taste bread for three months. He has betaken himself to a sedentary life; his legs begin to swell, and the scurvy has attacked his gums. He declares that there exists an intention to terminate his existence by agonies so protracted as to make it appear that he died a natural death.

The following is given as a specimen of the Observations:—

"These four restrictions are contrary to the law of nations. It was not then to ameliorate the lot of the detained persons, that the Ministers caused themselves to be invested with the right of making restrictions. No instance can be cited, in the history of Great Britain or France, in which prisoners of war were sent to be detained in another hemisphere, on an isolated rock in the midst of the seas. If the only object was the safety of the detention, there was no want of castles or Houses in England; but the grand requisite was the devouring climate of the Tropics!

"The second restriction (that of the title of General Bonaparte) has also no relation to the security of the detention, it has the effect of rendering the position of this Prince more grievous. Prisoners of war, when they fall into an enemy's power, are recognized by the title which they have borne at home: but the Bourbons ceased not to reign in France; the republic, and the fourth dynasty, were not legitimate Governments. On what are these new principles founded? If the English Government acknowledge that the Bourbons reigned in France at the time of the peace of Amiens, in 1802, they acknowledge that Cardinal York reigned in England at the treaty of peace in 1783; that Charles XIII. does not reign in Sweden. To sanction these principles would be to throw all thrones into disorder, and to propagate the germs of revolution among all nations."

No. 313.

DRURY-LANE.

A NEW comedy in five acts,—a visitor of great importance now-a-days,—made it's appearance here on Monday last under the title of The Castle of Glyndower. It is attributed to a Mr. RILEY, who formerly acted at this theatre for a short time, and is author of a work called the Itinerant, which is said not to be destitute of humour. The comedy was one of the completest failures we ever remember to have witnessed. Hisses began here and there very early; and in the course of the third act the pit rose in a body, put on their hats, and refused to hear a word more. Mr. H. JOHNSTON came forward, and requested that they would only hear the piece out, "for the sake of the performers;" but they were not to be propitiated; he was answered with cries of "No, no! Shame! Too bad, too bad!" And the Manager after this not very wisely persisting, the very few voices that would have encouraged him withdrew into the general uproar; and the two next acts, to the evident perplexity of the performers, were hurried through like two or three scenes of dumb show, in the teeth of one unceasing storm of groans, hootings, hisses, and cat-calls.

The chief cause of this fearful damnation was, we have no doubt, a terrible mistake made by the author on the score of sentiment. It is impossible to detail the incidents of a piece so received; and what could be told, would not redound to the credit of his dramatic talent; so many of the jokes were poor, and of the characters superfluous. But the whole comedy evidently turned on a decayed old Welsh gentleman, who was or supposed himself to be descended of Owen Glendower, and was literally insane with notions of ancestry. He took an old ruin for a castle, himself for the reigning sovereign of the principality, and his daughter for the Princess Glindora; and all this madness was rendered as pompous and comic as possible, while the patient was at the same time suffering poverty and illness, and pale wretched beggars were brought in on purpose to shew how generous he could be. The reader may judge of the medley on hearing that the part was acted by DOWTON, who though very capable of a natural pathos, is nevertheless out of the pale of refined gentility, and decidedly a comic actor. Now, the idea of a gentleman and his daughter situated like the persons in the play, seems taken from one of the novels of an amiable living writer,—the Wild Irish Girl of LADY MORGAN;—but the fair author knew well, that an infirmity of this description, in order to be written about or portrayed, even in a book, was to be treated with as great tenderness and refinement as possible, and accompanied with genuine dignity on the part of the sufferer. It is the same with the immortal work of CERVANTES, in which Don Quixote (not to mention it's other beauties) is as unlike a comic actor as can possibly be, and defies any situation in which he may be placed, however ridiculous. His very dancing is pathetic, as an excellent modern Artist felt and has expressed when he drew those designs for SHARPE'S Edition*. But the author of the Comedy lowered and vulgarized this awful infirmity. We acquit him, of course, of the slightest intention of trifling with it; but he undoubtedly wanted the proper sentiment; and the character, at intervals, was degraded, and almost Tom Thumbed.

Perhaps the feelings of the audience on this occasion were doubly embittered by the presence of the Duke and Duchess of GLOUCESTER, which may have suggested a very painful association of ideas. But be this as it may, and however we may regret that the author's mistake subjected him to a rejection so severe, they did their duty, not merely to the cause of the drama, but to humanity.

We must add, that we regret most sincerely any mistake made by this theatre. We like it's elegance, it's liberality, it's excellent comic strength, it's possession of KEAN, who is a tragic host, and it's association with the memory of SHERIDAN, the last dramatic writer of any wit and repute; and as neither of the theatres at present is supposed to be very flourishing in point of finances, it is with great unwillingness that we are compelled to object to any novelties they produce. But the great truth is, they have overbuilt themselves, and that people can neither hear nor see in many parts of the houses. If they could manage it, we would seriously advise them to contract themselves into smaller dimensions. We are persuaded, at any rate, that a moderately-sized winter-theatre, with such a company as Drury Lane, would carry every thing before it.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

Our limits confine us to the mere mention of the names of the following pictures of merit:—31, The Bombardment of Algiers, P. H. ROGERS; 193, View at Harrow Weald, and 107, View up the Avon near Clifton, Miss H. GOULD-SMITH; View of Cnicht, a remarkable Mountain of Merionethshire, C. V. FIELDING; 145, The Cook and Gamekeeper, W. KIDD; 154, The Procession at the time of the Ceremony of claiming the Fitch of Bacon, slightly drawn, but graceful, J. M. WRIGHT; 174, The Favourite, WM. DAVISON; 219, Rosa, and 186, A Dispute with the Favourite, H. SINGLETON; 210, Landscape and Cattle, and 204, Penning the Flock, J. STARK; 187, Landscape and Cattle, W. WESTALL, R.A.; 206, A Hare and Pheasant, R. T. BONE, beautifully coloured; 228, Entrance to Petersham Wood, C. DEANE; 231, A Study, W. WATE; 240, View near Dulwich, P. NASMYTH; 9, The Artist, J. PARTRIDGE; 156, Moonlight, T. C. HOFLAND; 259, Waterloo, D. DIGHTON; 36, An Afternoon Nap, F. P. STEPHANOFF; Birds, Fish, &c. N. CHANTRY; 180, A Quay in Ireland, G. JONES; The Boar that killed Adonis brought to Venus, richly coloured, by G. ARNOLD, A.R.A. His Scene on the River Wey, charmingly reminds us of the often quoted, because most feelingly and poetically descriptive line of our SHAKESPEAR,

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon yon bank."

Mr. STARK'S industry has crowned his talents this season with that rich reward of the honourably aspiring, the fixed notice and approval of the tasteful; for there can be but one opinion of such respecting the beautiful simplicity of composition and rich Cuypish colour in 250, Bishop's Bridge, Norwich, 210, Landscape and Cattle, 10, Lambeth, and the naturally grey sedateness of 247, Lake Scene. In the last, we think the different objects want rather more distinctness from each other. Mr. STARK here evidently has in his eye the matchless aerial softness of CLAUDE. Mr. G. VINCENT also, whose style is the reverse of Mr. STARK'S, being sharp and sparklingly touchy, is getting

* See this elegant little work with engravings after STOTHARD. We wish Mr. SHARPE had gone through the Arabian Nights, and other works of fiction, with the same companion.

fast onward in the approval of the reflecting and feeling. 99, Cottage Scene, 103, Landscape, and 217, Landscape, are true English rusticities, seen under our bluest and sunniest sky. We expect next year to see his pencil a little less sketchy.—Mr. COLLINS, whose excellence Mr. VINCENT is approaching, gives us, in 127, A Scene on the Boulevardes, Paris, a luxurious treat from all the colours of his pallet. It is dulcet music to the eye.—64, Banditti, by A. COOPER, A.R.A., whose pictures always justify their titles in the catalogues—a very rare merit. Were the majority of the performances there truly designated, this title would be printed at the head of them—Affectations.—pretended imitations of Nature. But here Mr. COOPER has clearly impressed his professional signet—Truth. The Banditti are in act and look what they are in the woody recesses and lonely wilds of nature, a physical and moral tornado, a fierce concussion of the animal powers of man, aided by death-dealing instruments—

“Arms on armour clashing, bray horrible discord,”—

a display of this lamentable fact, that “Man is to man the surest, direst foe.”

We are much indebted to Mr. COOPER for doing so much as he has, and in this admirable work especially, towards rooting out the corruption in Art, which Sir J. REYNOLDS, the Sir R. WALPOLE of Painting, had mainly introduced by his generalizing, careless, and unscientific style of execution, which was unfortunately too much recommended by the graces of his genius. His Muse was a beautiful, playful, and richly-attired slattern. Every outline of the Banditti is nearly and richly filled up with the touch of feeling and taste. It is all carefully painted, and yet as animatedly done as if struck off at a heat; as if it was the inspired act of instantaneous enthusiasm. So are his oil miniatures, 151, A Battle, and 153, Still Life.

The New York Academy of Art has raised 400*ls.* to procure a Portrait by LAURENCE of Mr. WEST, the venerable President of our Royal Academy.

Mr. WILKIE has been elected an Honorary Member of the Highland Society in London, as a mark of respect for his great talents. On this occasion, Mr. ROBERTSON, the eminent Miniature Painter, spoke with much animation of the merits of Mr. WILKIE and of other Artists from North Britain.—Messrs. ALLAN, RAEBURN, NASMYTH, GEDDES, &c. In the course of his speech, he threw out some suggestions as to the propriety of giving such encouragement to Scottish Painters, as would enable them to illustrate the history and poetry of their native land.—We lament that we have not room to give Mr. ROBERTSON's speech.

LITERARY NOTICES.

No. 42.

The History of British India, by James Mill, Esq.
3 vols. 4to. London, 1818.

Few works have appeared of late more interesting than this, either on account of the subject of which it treats, or the manner in which it is executed. It comprehends the civil, military, and commercial transactions of our nation in India, from the time when a few associated adventurers in 1601 sent five ships round the Cape of Good Hope, to the present period, when the British power extends over the richest and greatest portion of that continent, which for so many ages excited the wonder or the envy of Europeans.

The information necessary to convey a correct idea of this part of British history lay scattered in a great variety of works, exceeding in number what any one, who had not inquired into the subject, could easily imagine. Of these publications, some detail with great minuteness small passages of history, or rather of the military transactions of particular periods; some of them the personal adventures of the authors, or their observations on the natives in particular districts; others were the correspondence of the different Governors, and the evidence extracted in judicial proceedings, printed by the order of the Houses of Parliament, but so voluminous, that, for the mass of English readers, for all indeed who would not devote years to consider or digest them, they might as well have not existed at all. There was no publication which in itself served or pretended to convey an idea of the whole of the history of the British in India, and at the same time enabled the enquirer to form an estimate of the character and institutions of the people with whom they have been connected. To obtain even an imperfect idea of Indian affairs or Indian manners, it was necessary to wade through a vast number of volumes, and consume a much greater portion of time than many diligent readers bestow on the whole course of their historical studies.

It was hardly possible, as Mr. Mill observes, that the matter from these scattered sources “should have been brought together, for the first time, without being instructive, however unskilfully the task may have been performed.” But there was a danger, lest it should be done under an improper bias. The persons who turn their attention chiefly to Indian affairs, are, with so few exceptions, warmly interested by gratitude or expectancy in the support of the Company and the Indian Government, that a proper developement of their proceedings can hardly be expected from them. Those again who have studied the manners and language of the natives, are much too apt to over-rate the value of the institutions and the literature, in the study of which they have employed so much time and labour. From these causes of prejudice, Mr. Mill is entirely free, and he seems to have a mind very little liable to be imposed upon by the prejudices of others. To give an opinion of his other qualifications, we shall look to the natural divisions of the subject of the work.

Mr. Mill describes,—1. The early intercourse of this nation with India, previously to our acquisition of territory;—2. The character, history, and manners, institutions and advancement, of the people of India, at the time of our interference with their internal concerns;—3. The military affairs and negotiations of the British in India; the affairs of the Company at home; the proceedings in Parliament, and the schemes which have been from time to time adopted or proposed for the Government of our Indian dominions.

The first of these parts it will be only necessary briefly to refer to. It exhibits the prosperity of the commerce of the East, while it continued in the hands of a Regulated Trade Company, and the difficulties which the Joint Stock Company early met with.

The second part of the book is extremely interesting. Mr. Mill has brought a vast quantity of evidence to bear upon the subject. He gives a clear and detailed account of the notions of the Hindoos as to their ancient history, the fabulousness of which is made sufficiently apparent; of their forms of government,—their religion, their manners, and morals,—their literature, science, arts, and general advancement in civilization. He shows, we think conclusively, that the progress of the Hindoos in civilization has been prodigiously over-rated by most of those who have written on the subject; and proves, even from the works of the Hindoos themselves, that the distant period when Hindostan, according to the accounts of its admirers, was united into one great monarchy under native princes, could have had no existence. Not the least amusing part, is the collection from their various Sacred Writings of some of the most striking of their ceremonies. The Brahmins' worship of the rising sun "is performed by first tying the lock of hair on the crown of his head, while he holds much cusa grass in his left hand, and three blades of it in his right, or wears a ring of it on the third finger of that hand, reciting at the same time the Gayatri. He then sips water three times, repeats the mysterious names of the seven worlds, recites again the Gayatri, rubs his hands as if washing them, touches with his wet hand his feet, head, breast, eyes, ears, nose, and navel; and again three times sips water.—If however he should sneeze or spit, he must obey the text, which says, "after sneezing, spitting, blowing his nose, sleeping, putting on apparel, or dropping tears, a man should not immediately sip water, but first touch his right ear." The sipping however being at last performed, he passes his hand filled with water briskly round his neck, while he prays, "may the waters preserve me." He then shuts his eyes and meditates in silence. Till we got better information, very wonderful ideas were formed of the sublimity of the Brahmin's meditations. On this, one of the most sacred and solemn of all occasions, while he meditates in silence, with his eyes shut and every mark of intense thought, we are informed, he is only "figuring to himself that Brahma, with five faces and a red complexion, resides in his navel; Vishnu, with four arms and a black complexion, in his heart; and Siva, with five faces and a white complexion, in his forehead."—Nor is this the whole of his meditation. He ponders next on the holiest of texts; and this sublime duty is performed in the following manner:—Closing the left nostril with the two longest fingers of the right hand, he draws his breath through his right nostril, and then closing it with his thumb and suspending his breath, he repeats to himself the mysterious names of the worlds; after which, raising his fingers from his left nostril, he emits the breath he had suppressed; and thus ends one part of his meditation. The same process is repeated three times, and the whole is concluded."—Vol. 1, p. 247.

Perhaps the most instructive part is that in which the author shows how fallacious, as proofs of the goodness of a religion, are those high-sounding declarations of the nature of the Divinity, and even the occasional precepts of good morality, which are to be found in the religious books of the Hindoos, buried amongst absurd rituals and obscene legends. He argues, that in proportion as frivolous observances (the giving "tithes of hyssop and cumin") occupies much of the attention of the believers in any creed,—and are raised to a superiority over moral duties or to an equality with them,—that religion, though it does not neglect to define or enforce those duties, is vicious in its principle, and much be mischievous in its operation;—that the general praises of the goodness of God, when they are found amidst legends which degrade him, are marks of the adulation of savages towards a power which they dread, and not the result of a rational conception of the Great Cause of all things. Accordingly, the effect of the detestable superstition of the Hindoos has been, to produce a strict observance of rituals, and the most shocking instances of self-torment, under the name of penance, amidst the most general immorality.

The character of the Hindoos was at first mistaken by Europeans. With an outward gentleness of demeanour (which was taken as a proof of many virtues,) and with great timidity, they combine an utter indifference to the feelings of others, and display the most ferocious and cruel dispositions. They have a superstitious respect for the lives of some animals; but this is the utmost extent of their humanity. Perjury is so prevalent, as to form a serious obstacle to the administration of justice. They are patient, temperate, and persevering; but averse to violent exertion, litigious, subtle, and avaricious; and though some forms are prescribed by their religion, which are called the duties of hospitality, they are in fact inhospitable. In the sciences, the Hindoos have never made great advances; and it seems more than probable, that what knowledge of the mathematics they do possess, was chiefly derived from the Greek monarchy of Bactria. Their agriculture and their common implements are in a state of extraordinary rudeness; and those manufactures, particularly weaving and spinning, in which they have attained great perfection, depend more on the delicacy of their hands and the cheapness of labour, among people whom a very small portion of food serves to support, than on the result of any inventive power of their minds. They have works of architecture, in which much rude labour has been bestowed, but which have little else to merit attention.—Previously to the irruption of the Mahometans, they were not acquainted with the construction of an arch; and to these invaders much of the works of utility which they possess are to be attributed.—As on this subject the author had many prejudices to refute, he proceeds, on the surest grounds,—on a comparison of the state of the Hindoos, with all the knowledge we have obtained of other nations in an imperfect state of civilization. The evidence on this subject is in itself as valuable, as it is satisfactory as to the points at issue.

The third portion of the history affords much food for national pride, but some reasons for humiliation. It contains a clear narration of those successes, which a few Europeans achieved against large eastern armies; successes which are as wonderful as those of Alexander, and as remarkable in their effects. The phrase in which Livy wishes to detract from the merit of that celebrated conqueror (nihil aliud quam bene ausus est vana contemnere) might indeed be applied to the European commander who first led his troops against the armies of India. Amidst all these successes, there were instances of perfidy which it would be difficult to match in any other history. But the most valuable characteristic of this part of the work is the examination of the different plans which have been proposed for the improvement of India, and the systems of legislation, or rather the efforts of legislation without system, which have been made by the British rulers of that country. It forms an admirable specimen of the wisdom of men who take a pride in calling themselves practical;—of men, who, while they profess a great contempt for theory, are guided in reality by some theory founded on a very narrow experience and scanty knowledge. Mr. Mill has applied to this subject the result of much research and reflection on the science of government, and he has applied it with uncompromising firmness. By an examination of the principles and consequence of the successive measures, he gives a new interest to the narration of statutes and regulations. As one of the best instances, we should refer to the account of Lord Cornwallis's reforms in 1790, particularly the establishment of the Zemindarry system, the intention of which was to give an additional security to the tax-gatherers of the districts, and to change them into landholders; and the effect of which was to displace nearly the whole of them. It is lamentable to think, that after half a century of experiments, Bengal, which when it came into our hands was one of the worst governed countries of India, has been very little improved; and it seems to have been the uniform result, that in those countries, the monarchs of which are dependent upon the Company, the condition of the people is worse than in any other part of Hindostan. As the Princes there are protected from those rebellions which in the East are the practical remedies for misgovernment, oppression goes on without any other bounds than the possibility of endurance, and often has produced or threatened depopulation.

The account of the trial of Hastings, the obstacles which the legal rules of evidence threw in the way of the prosecution, and the examination of those rules, form a valuable chapter of the 3d volume; and show the mind of a master of the principles of all law. It is the first time, too, that an impartial account has been given of Hastings's administration.—It is fortunate to find a writer who was able thoroughly to investigate, and so clearly explain the proceedings of that Governor, without imbibing the spirit of an accuser or an apologist; who could tear aside the profligate pretexts with which Hastings covered his violent measures, expose the contradictions in which his furious temper involved him, and the haste with which he assumed principles or facts, and with which, when it served his purpose, he abandoned them; and who could, at the same time, make due allowance for the difficult circumstances in which he was placed, and the temptations to which he was exposed. There is another thing which Mr. Mill mentions, which should not be forgotten, viz. that if in Hastings's administration we discover an unusual proportion of injustice and error, "of no man, probably, who had so great a share in the government of the world, was the conduct so completely explored or laid open to public view."—P. 683, vol. 2.

Towards the conclusion of the work (which is brought down to the Mahratta Peace of 1805) there is an acute examination of the Treaty of Bassein and the consequences of the policy of "defensive alliance and subsidy," as the Marquis of Wellesley called his plan for reducing the Native Powers to dependence on the Company, leaving them the administration of their civil affairs. We can only refer to his arguments on that subject. Of Mr. Mill's merits as an historian we need say no more;—his style is occasionally quaint, but is always clear, and generally forcible, especially in those pieces of reasoning which form the most valuable part of his performance.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Wednesday, March 4.

RANXISTER V. SPOONER AND ANOTHER.

This was an action by which the plaintiff, a Gentleman residing at Brixton, sought to recover a compensation for the injury he had sustained by the negligent driving of the defendant's servant.

Mr. SCARLETT stated the case to the Jury on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was a Gentleman connected with the house of Richardson, Goodluck and Co.; the defendants were proprietors of the Brixton coach, by which the plaintiff was in the habit of travelling to town from his residence at Brixton. On the 1st of July last, the plaintiff took his place as usual in the stage at the end of Neighbour-lane, Stockwell. The coachman, Ball, recollected that he ought to have stopped at a house he had just passed, to take up two Ladies, he therefore proceeded to turn round, when going too near the bank the carriage was thrown over, and several of the passengers were severely hurt. The plaintiff fell underneath, and had his leg fractured; he was confined to his bed six weeks in consequence of this accident, and was still lame, and would always continue so, as the sinews of one leg were so much contracted as to render it some inches shorter than the other.—These facts were proved by several witnesses.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH observed, that the accident originated in the careless negligence of the driver, who having forgotten to take up his passengers was obliged to turn back for them. This deviation from the direct course caused the accident, and rendered him liable.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 50*l.*, Costs, 40*s.*

POLICE.

HATTON-GARDEN.

Wm. Allcroft appeared upon an information, charging him with having dyed, fabricated, and manufactured sloe, ash, and other leaves, to imitate tea; and with having in his possession such leaves for such purposes, contrary to an Act passed in the 17th of George III. It appeared that a large quantity of what seemed to be sloe and ash leaves had been found by the Excise Officers in the house of a poor man named Rhodes, in Tenter-row, which they took to be intended for mixing with tea in order to defraud the Public. This they seized, together with drying screens, and other apparatus. It was ascertained that similar leaves had been conveyed to a house in Seward-street, where the defendant had asked leave to deposit some empty casks. When these casks were inspected, they were found to contain such leaves as those found at Rhodes's house; but there being no proof that Allcroft had any knowledge of their contents, and there being an informality in the information, the defendant was acquitted.—The process observed in making the stuff, said to be very frequently imposed upon the poor, is as follows: a quantity of ash leaves are placed upon a copper, where they remain for some time; they are then put on a plate and placed over the fire, where they get a crisp appearance.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Information was given at this office that Lord C. M., the second son of the Duke of Athol, had suddenly deserted his paternal roof. For some time past, the young gentleman, who is only 19 years of age, has been observed to be very dejected. He always seemed to court solitude, and took a more than common pleasure in perusing religious publications. The object of the Missionary Society was one which struck him as most laudable, and at length engrossed so much of his attention, that he seriously expressed his determination to go on a mission himself. This step was opposed by his friends; but their advice had no weight. The youth had already formed his opinion on the subject, and finding that he was unlikely to receive the approbation of his father, he secretly left his paternal mansion, without any considerable sum of money. As soon as his flight was discovered, the family were in the greatest terror and confusion. Hand-bills and placards were posted in all directions, describing his dress, and offering a large reward to any person who could give information respecting him. He was at last discovered at the Albany tavern, Rotherhithe. It appears that he had slept there one night, and in consequence of his leaving a letter in his room, in which there was mention made of his family, the landlord, from finding the description given of him in the posting-bills correspond, sent a messenger to his friends, when his tutor and servant, accompanied by two police officers, went and brought him home.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

CALAMITOUS FIRE.—On Sunday morning, about six o'clock, an alarm of fire was given at the house of Mr. Wheeler, grocer, No. 460, Strand, nearly opposite Hungerford-street. In a few minutes after the first alarm a sight of the most heart-rending description took place: men and women were seen rushing out of doors in their night-clothes, and children in a state of nudity. At the house of Mr. Wheeler a sight more dreadful was witnessed; at the front window, second-floor, was observed Mrs. Wheeler, with a child in her arm; she leaned out of the window, holding the child by its clothes for a considerable time, endeavouring to excite the attention of persons underneath to catch the child. She dropped the infant, and it was caught by one of the crowd; at the moment she loosed the child, a blaze and volume of smoke rushed through the window where Mrs. Wheeler stood. In about a minute after one of the shopmen, whose name is Tasker, was seen at the window of the third floor, which was completely enveloped in fire; seeing no hope of relief, he threw himself out of the window; he fell upon his head, which was cut open, his limbs were broken, and he instantly expired. Another shopman, named Lloyd, fell upon the pavement; he had thrown himself out of the third floor back window; his fall was broke by his dropping upon a projection, but he was injured dreadfully. At the back of the house, Mr. Wheeler was found, nearly insensible, on the ground. He had thrown himself through a back window at the top of the stairs on the landing of the first floor. He was injured very much by the fall. His child was shown to him; his little feet were burnt, and his head cut, though not dangerously. A neighbour had the child to suckle it.—A great number of firemen reside in Hungerford-street, and they were very promptly on the premises; but no water could be got for three quarters of an hour, and the flames were communicating with the greatest rapidity to the houses of Mr. Ashman, pawn broker, Mr. Buckingham, brush-maker, and Mr. Rowley, picture-frame-maker. The firemen were running from plug to plug, and no water could be got, while the thieves were busily employed in plundering. Some of the Guards arrived, and were placed at the disposal of the Civil Authority. Property to a great amount had in the mean time been carried away by the thieves. The family of Mr. Ashman had just time to escape from the house before it was in a general conflagration. One of the female servants was actually dragged out in her night-clothes; if she had remained a minute longer, she must have been destroyed. The houses of Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Ashman, Mr. Buckingham, and Mr. Rowley, were entirely destroyed by half-past eight o'clock, and all the property, except a few trifling things, was destroyed. The engines were not supplied with water until seven o'clock. The flames continued their ravages chiefly at the houses in Hewitt's-court, at the back of the above houses (which were chiefly occupied by poor persons), which were before nine o'clock entirely gutted. The poor occupants had but very little time to get out of their dwellings, and therefore could save but very little of their property. The children were carried into St. Martin's church-yard, and wrapped in blankets, their apparel having been consumed.—Mrs. Wheeler was burnt to death, a shopman, named Sturges, shared the same fate. Another shopman, named Tasker, was killed in leaping from the third floor window. Another shopman, named Lloyd, is dreadfully injured. Mr. Wheeler is in a dangerous state. The value of the property destroyed is incalculable. There is no positive proof how the fire commenced. Mr. Wheeler's statement is as follows:—He awoke about six o'clock, and found his chamber, which was on the second floor, full of smoke; he awoke his wife, who lay with her child in her arms by his side, and told her to get up or she would be burnt to death. He leaped out of bed and ran up stairs to alarm his shopmen; he called to them; they answered, he ran down stairs again, and could not see his wife and child for the thick smoke that filled the place; he supposed that she had run down stairs; he attempted to go after her, but was prevented by the flames issuing up the stairs; he ran back and got to a window at the top of the landing-place of the second floor, when he could proceed no further. He forced the window out with his arms, and put his head through to get air, as he was almost suffocated; as soon as he had recovered himself a little, he found the flames had reached his legs, and they began to burn; he had time only to recommend himself to the protection of his Maker, and threw himself through the window frame.—At eleven o'clock the body of Mrs. Wheeler was got out of the ruins a dreadful spectacle. The body of the shopman was seen a short time afterwards behind a chimney, between two half burnt pieces of timber, where it was suspended in the view of the spectators, a most appalling sight. The house of Mr. Greensill is also greatly injured.

An Inquest was held on Tuesday, at the Cannon, in Hungerford-street, on the remains of the unfortunate persons destroyed by the fire. It appeared from the evidence, that one of the watchmen left his beat before six, instead of waiting until the clock struck, and that the parish engine was sent for; but when, after some delay, it arrived, was found so much out of order as to be quite useless, although a Parishioner stated that he had paid 75 guineas for its repairs a short time ago.—The CORONER, in summing up, regretted that they could not ascertain the cause of the fire, and expressed a hope that in future the watch would be better regulated.—The Jury returned a verdict of Accidental Death by a fall for J. Tasker; and Accidentally Burnt to Death for Mrs. Wheatley and Sturges.

Several females in the vicinity of the Strand remain ill, in consequence of the fright occasioned by the late calamitous fire. In the case of Mrs. Jackson, the wife of Mr. Jackson, bookbinder, in Villiers-street, it has proved fatal. She was among the first persons attracted to the spot, and had seen the unfortunate Mrs. Wheeler traversing her room in a state of distraction, with her child in her arms, the moment before she threw it from the window, and was herself shortly after enveloped in the flames. Mrs. J. returned home in a state of great agitation: and so continued during the day; but was a little composed when she retired to rest at night: she was however soon after seized with epilepsy, and expired on Monday morning.

Wednesday, as some workmen were elevating a pole to support the house of Mr. Bowling, which was injured by the late fire in the Strand, it fell on the head of Mr. Buckingham, nephew to the gentleman of that name whose house was among those which fell a prey to the destructive element; by which his skull was so fractured as to cause serious apprehensions for his recovery.

An Inquest was held on Wednesday in Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, on the body of T. Curzon.—Mr. Miles, of Bow-street, stated, that on Tuesday night, about nine o'clock, the deceased came to his shop, and requested him to let him lie down: he told him he might sit there; but finding he grew worse, he helped him to the door, and went for a watchman to take him to the Watchhouse; but the watchman swore at him, and told him he was engaged. A coach was then procured to convey him to the Watchhouse, but on its arrival he was dead; and then, but not till then, a surgeon was called in, who was of opinion that his death was occasioned by the rupture of a vessel in the head. It was ten o'clock before he arrived at the Watchhouse.—The CORONER lamented that an hour should have elapsed before medical aid was procured; and the Jury returned a Verdict—Died by the Visitation of God.

Mr. J. Newsham, a gentleman nearly 60 years of age, was robbed and beaten in a most brutal manner, on Sunday evening. He was passing near the New London Institution, in Moorfields, when a man craved charity. Mr. N. gave him a shilling; when the fellow whistled, and in a moment he was joined by three others, who surrounded Mr. N. and demanded his money. He pulled out his purse, containing 7l. and a gold watch and seals, which he handed to the ruffians, entreating that they would not injure him. The villain who first accosted him insisted, however, that he had more cash, and bid him "lug it out." In vain did Mr. N. assert to the contrary; the assailants threw him on the ground, and examined his pockets, but found nothing of value. Enraged at the disappointment, they beat and kicked him severely, and left him almost senseless. Two boys passing, half an hour afterwards, heard him call for help, and went to his assistance. A coach was shortly procured, and he was conveyed home, but he is likely to recover.

Friday se'night as Sir J. Smart, was returning from Drury-lane Theatre, about 12 o'clock, to his house in Great Portland-street, he was attacked by two robbers near Newport-market: one of them knocked him down; a Gentleman coming up at the time, the villains ran off and escaped. Sir George received some bruises from being knocked down, but lost no property. Mr. Cramer, the celebrated performer, was knocked down in a similar manner a few nights before.

The Leeds Mercury says, "About 12 o'clock last night, as Mrs. Ryley, who keeps a small shop in Boar-lane, was preparing to go to bed, she was alarmed by a noise in the shop, and perceived a man with his hand in the till; she involuntarily uttered a loud shriek, and ran up stairs; but the burglar ran after her, and threw her down upon the stairs; he forcibly grasped her neck with one hand, and placed the other over her mouth, evidently with an intention to strangle her. But the noise she had made awoke the children, who shrieked out so loudly as to induce him to relinquish his murderous grasp, and attempt to escape. Mrs. Ryley, exhausted as she was, had the presence of mind to open the window, and called out, "Watch! Murder!" The watchman and other assistance being at hand, the wretch was taken and conveyed to prison; but between 10 and 11 o'clock in the forenoon, he cut his throat with a knife which had been left in the cell. He was removed to the Infirmary. The wound is not very dangerous, and it is supposed that he will be able to undergo an examination in a few days. The name of the prisoner is T. Watts, a joiner, who has only been married about a month, and we understand that up to this time his character has been irreproachable."

The same paper of the 28th ult. says,—“We lament to state, that the steam impelled engine of J. C. Brandling, Esq. employed on the rail-way of his colliery near this town, exploded about five o'clock this afternoon. We regret to add, that the engineer is literally blown to pieces, several children who were near the place have been severely scalded, but we believe that no other life has been lost on this melancholy occasion. The cause of this shocking catastrophe has not yet been ascertained, but it is conjectured to have arisen from the safety valve not having been properly attended to.”

The Dublin Journal says, “It is in the recollection of our readers, that Miss Kelly was violently assailed in London by a desperate enthusiast. We regret to state, that a similar fatality has befallen her here; as, on Saturday last, a young man of wild appearance, as we are informed, followed her home, though perfectly unknown to her, as it appears; and whose conduct was so strange as to mind, as to resemble that of the person we have already mentioned in London. In the present state of this affair, we do not feel authorized to go into further detail.”

On Saturday week, as Lieut. R. Bridges, R.N. with his brother Thomas, a Midshipman, and his youngest brother, Charles, (all sons of Mr. Brydges, of Tewkesbury), accompanied by Lieutenant Butcher, R.N. were sailing in a pleasure-bent upon the River Severn, a gust of wind upset her, and the whole of them were drowned, with the exception of Mr. T. Brydges, who with great difficulty got to the shore in a most exhausted state. Mr. Brydges had sailed from Tewkesbury with the party, but got on shore at the Upper Lode, to get refreshments for them; and thus escaped the dreadful fate which overtook his unfortunate children and their friend!

On Monday night the house of Mr. Jackson, in Maze-pond, Bermondsey, was broke open, and plate, money, linen, and liquor, to a considerable amount, stolen; and on Tuesday night those of Mr. Cribb, in South-street, Lambeth; Mr. Druce, Bermondsey-street; Mr. Wallis, Snow's-fields; and Mr. Owan, Suffolk-street, St. George's-fields, were broke open, and property of various descriptions to a large amount stolen.

THE HURRICANE OF WEDNESDAY NIGHT.—Not only several shells of houses, but houses which had been slightly built in the vicinity of the metropolis, were levelled to the ground, particularly in the East. Trees in St. James's-park were blown down, houses were unroofed during the storm, and chimney-pots were falling in almost every direction. Considerable damage has been done to the shipping in the river. Several of the mail-coaches did not arrive till two hours beyond their time, and many of the heavy coaches were four hours later than usual. Upwards of 2 cwt. of lead was blown from the roof of Surgeons'-hall, Lincoln's-inn-fields. During the prevalence of the storm, the wall of the old building on the eastern side of the avenue to the Waterloo-bridge came down with a dreadful crash.

At half-past 10 o'clock, as Mr. Kinnard, the Magistrate was sitting in his back parlour, in Holborn, with Mrs. Kinnard and his two daughters, a stack of chimnies fell in upon them. They had just a moment's time, and a moment only, for escape. The chair in which Mr. Kinnard was sitting was broken into shivers, as well as the flap of the table on which he was leaning. The assistant also, who was sitting in the counting-house, narrowly escaped with his life. We are happy to find that none of the family are actually injured. What makes the above case very remarkable is this, that if Mr. Kinnard had not instantly quitted his chair when he heard the noise, he must have been killed; and if Mr. Bradford, the assistant, had quitted his, he would have infallibly been killed. So at least it is said.

Between half-past ten and eleven o'clock, the following occurrence took place at the house of Lady Hayes, Somerset-street:—The servants had just sat down to supper, when the door bell rang. The footman rose for the purpose of opening it, but had not proceeded only a short distance along the passage, when he was alarmed by a loud crash, resembling that of the falling of a house. He instantly ran back, but was unable to proceed farther than the end of the passage; for where the kitchen stood but a moment before, was now one mass of ruins. Three of the female servants could not be found. After some time the body of Mary Mauntie, the cook, was taken out, the head dashed to atoms, and the body greatly disfigured: she was quite dead. The bodies of the house-maid and laundry-maid were also dug out, most dangerously bruised. One had her thigh broken, and was burnt about the shoulder; the other was much worse hurt, but had no limb fractured. The kitchen of Lady Hayes was in the yard, at the back of the dwelling-house, and in the rear of this again stood Calomel-buildings. A wall had been raised to the height of about 60 feet for the purpose of preventing theft, and blocking the communication between Calomel-buildings and the houses in Somerset-street. In the course of the evening, the wind shifted, and blew along Calomel-buildings full against the wall, which at length fell in, and by its weight bore down the roof of the kitchen. Part of the leads fell against the wall, but in that situation, that any persons under it, although unable to extricate themselves, might respire. This was the situation in which the housemaid and laundress were; but having fallen at the fire-place, were exposed to the most horrid torture from the heat. The large beam that supported the kitchen and went across the roof, was found broken in two; and as the body of the cook was found near this spot, it is supposed that it must have fallen on her and caused her death.

Two old houses in Peter's-lane, Cow-cross, which were condemned, but in one of which a poor family resided, (the other was unoccupied), were blown down as low as the first floor; no person was hurt. Another old house in Frogwell-court, Charter-house-lane, was blown down; it was unoccupied, except by an old woman, who was dug out unhurt. The garden-fences and paling along Church-row, St. Pancras, were blown down, and the streets in various parts of Clerkenwell were strewn with tiles and garden-pots.

On the same night, about eight o'clock, the house of Mr. Thatcher, of Union-street, Chelsea, was unroofed by the violence of the wind, great part of which unfortunately fell upon that Gentleman, who was sitting by the fire-side reading, and was instantly buried in the ruins. An alarm was given, and his neighbours immediately set about removing the rubbish, and got him out alive, but very severely injured.

Mr. Rickettson, of Broad-street, was dangerously wounded on returning home through Wardour-street, about twelve o'clock. Part of a stack of chimnies were blown down, and a part fell upon his head and shoulders. He was conveyed home in a senseless state.

The upper part of a house, 92, Wells-street, Oxford-street, was blown in. This was inhabited by an old woman, whose screams were heard in the street. A ladder was procured, and she was got out, one of the beams having fell slanting, which protected her.

A man on board a Gravesend packet was blown overboard and drowned. Two men also were drowned in the Thames, near Blackfriars-bridge.

The arrival of the Taunton mail was delayed beyond the usual time, in consequence of a stoppage it met with on the road, owing to several trees having been blown down by the severe gale of Wednesday night, which choked up the road; much exertion was required to clear them away to procure a passage for the coach, which having been effected, it proceeded to town without further impediment.

The accounts received from all parts of the coast confirm the fears which were entertained, as to the effects of the hurricane.—The damage sustained by the shipping is immense; and, what is still more lamentable, it has been in several instances accompanied with loss of lives. One ship, totally dismasted, went down, and all hands on board perished. A Swedish vessel, in driving from her anchorage, ran down a Revenue cutter and two brigs. The crew of the former were saved, with the exception of one man; the fate of those of the brigs has not been ascertained. A French vessel was lost on Portland Beach, and all on board perished. The gale of wind was at Portsmouth more violent than ever was known; the tide rose six inches beyond its greatest height at any former time, and there was so enormous a difference between the morning and evening tide, as five perpendicular feet. The stairs, piers, and sea walls about Haslar and South Sea Castle are considerably damaged. The whole of that beautiful and useful work, the New Pier at Ryde, is said to be completely destroyed.

MARRIAGES.

March 5, Viscount Newport, eldest son of the Earl of Bradford, to Georgiana Elizabeth, only daughter of Sir Thos. Moncrieffe, Bart. of Moncrieffe, Perth.

March 5, S. P. Wright, Esq. of Wood Green, Tottenham, to Sarah Louisa, second daughter of Thomas Harrison, Esq. of Kentish Town.

DEATHS.

Feb. 18, in Upper Seymour-street, at an advanced age, Gen. Edmund Fanning.

Feb. 18, Anne, the wife of Peter Burke, Esq. of Birr, Ireland.

On the 17th ult. at Springwoodpark, near Kelso, Mary, daughter of the late Admiral Sir James Douglas, Bart. Miss Douglas, who had been in a delicate state of health, was induced by the warmth of the weather to walk on the margin of the Taviot, and two ladies happened to be on the opposite side under the ruins of Roxburgh Castle. They observed her stoop as if to pick something from the ground, when she lost her balance and fell into the river. Her feeble frame rendered her quite unable to contend with the stream, and she had floated a short way down before help was obtained. The body was taken out after having been five or six minutes immersed, and the best medical assistance was in vain applied.

Wednesday week, at the great age of 100, at Rockliffe, near Carlisle, Mr. George Sinclair. His memory and judgment were so strong, that his neighbours referred to him as an oracle for his decision on any disputed subject.

BLOOD CONSPIRATORS AND THEIR VICTIMS.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

THE Ministerialists and others, who warn us against indulging a "spurious commiseration for crime," have of course none themselves. With them every thing is "legitimate," and in due and loyal regard to "the privileged orders." Thus they are very suspicious and admonitory, if a couple of lads, like SPICER and KELLY, are thought to have been made thieves from infancy,—victims to a bad education; but if a man has had a good one, and is a Member of Parliament, and walks off with a good respectable sum of money,—then let us be charitable;—"convey, the wise it call." Against such a rascal as BROCK what can be done, if the law has not distinctly provided for one view of his case? The simple may imagine that something may be done in the other; but this is a piece of officious supererogation;—the law is not in a position to hit him on the left leg,—therefore it cannot hit him on the right. But has Mr. EVANS, or Mr. RILEY, who killed himself in his anguish, conspired against the Corruptionists in any way,—or is he suspected of having done so,—or is he not suspected, but only thought capable,—away with him to a secret dungeon, and never mind the law;—a bill of indemnity settles that matter. Then there is PELHAM; he is a grown-up offender,—a man with all his faculties and experience about him,—and he seduces innocent and unconscious men into a crime; but he is "in some authority;"—he is the lowest rag in the dirtiest train of power;—therefore let us see by all means what can be done for him:—but KELLY and SPICER are lads,—young rogues, little more than arrived-at years of discretion,—infants in law, and not old enough to have enjoyed any situation under the Bow-street Government;—therefore take care how you regard their crime with a "spurious commiseration." Lastly, there is POWER;—there is nothing in his case but what is atrocious; he had no necessity for doing what he did; he was in his perfect senses; he had no claims of any sort that were denied him; and yet he deliberately and in cold blood went about to hang innocent men; but again, the law has not provided for a particular part of his case, and he must be acquitted:—on the other hand, there was CASHMAN, a carving sailor who had fought for his country; he was half wild with having taken liquor on an empty and morbid stomach; he thought his claims on the Admiralty stifled with; and in the frenzy of his various feelings he took part in a riot; but the law has not provided for such fetures of a case as these;—it has given him no redemption on all these accounts;—and therefore he must be hung up. No wonder the populace cried out for the Blood Conspirators, when he was going to execution!

All men are more or less the creatures of circumstance; and it is the business of every one, as he acquires knowledge, to endeavour to create proper impulses and motives, and to contest the fortunes, as it were, of those who come after him, with Fortune herself. Upon this principle, allowances are to be made even for such men as BROCK and PELHAM, who are, we have no doubt, men very badly educated, and as ignorant as they thought themselves knowing. But is it not monstrous, that every thing possible should be said for these men, and not even on that account, and yet that society should be warned against a "spurious commiseration for crime" in the case of two miserable boys! The Courier has two or three favourite quotations from such of SHAKESPEARE's plays as are usually performed at the theatre; and it has the face, among others, to be eternally repeating the following:—

Man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep.

With what indignant force do such noble passages recoil on the heads of those who rashly venture to use them. If the reader could see how exquisitely inapplicable the application usually was, he would feel double pity for the brains, that could so completely forget how they were talking against secret prisoners, knavish secretaries, awkward public accusers, wretched speakers for indemnity acts, spies and informers, and pardoned Bow-street felons. A higher order of creatures may readily be imagined sorrowing instead of laughing over the lamentable mistakes of an inferior; and angry and selfish sophistications, hypocrisies, tyrannies, betrayals of innocence, and maddening solitudes, may well make the angels weep.

The situations of two human beings so young and so wretchedly brought up as SPICER and KELLY, ought to make the community think to some purpose. Indeed, to do justice to one feature in our age and the one just preceding it, we are more alive to the elements of things, and to the necessity of referring to them for any lasting improvement, than any perhaps in modern history. We do not say that individuals in the present age are greater; far from it; but it has the accumulated advantages of the great individuals that preceded it; and the sorrow we have witnessed, the extremes of various sorts, even the very obstinacy and hopelessness, make us doubly perceive the necessity of piercing vice and misfortune to the roots, or of at least extending that sense of the necessity, which mankind have rather tacitly admitted than openly and freely discussed.

It was thought by many an eccentric thing in the excellent Mr. OWEN to say that the Secretary of State for the Home Department ought rather to be in irons himself, than a lad of fifteen. It was thought a similar eccentric thing, no doubt, by our painted-bodied ancestors, if any one doubted the justice of sacrificing an occasional human being to the Gods. But Mr. OWEN, without meaning any reflection on the individual, was right. It is the business of the great officers and legislators of the state, to see that good laws are made and executed, and that such monstrous inequalities between the chances of human beings are prevented by education, and by avoiding as many temptations to poverty and ignorance as possible.

But instead of going upon proper principles in these matters, and availing themselves of the growing philosophy of the times, our modern rulers, identifying their own existence with that of a bad state of things, take two special ways of maintaining this unfair dealing with the lower orders. In the first place, they incite them to crime by encouraging the temptation to it, and increasing the facilities, such as lotteries, and the paper system; and secondly, after helping to make the vice, they set about detecting and punishing it in the worst possible way, by rewarding informers, and by mixing together offenders of all descriptions, great and small, aged and boyish, wilful and untaught. The spectacle of a boy in irons, much more at the gallows, is the greatest of reproaches, not on himself, but on the system that destroyed him; and he would have full as much right to bite off the ear into which he whispered that truth, as his fellow in the fable had to bite off his mother's.

We do not dilate on this subject at present. We only give hints; but they are such as to make the intelligent reader think; and this is at least half the end of writing.—The causes of mistakes and sorrows of this kind are those of nine-tenths of all which humanity suffers;—1st, a false idea of gain, which sets the general good at naught for personal aggrandizement; and 2d, selfish and vindictive systems of religion, which while they profess the contrary, have a tendency to shelter all sorts of unsocial conduct under pleas of dispensations and retributions. Let any benevolent mind take these two points for subjects of reflection, especially the latter, and see what lights he will strike out of them upon the deformities of our social system.

Take the two boys, for instance, before us. One of them is confessedly the son of a man who keeps a house for the resort of bad characters. Perhaps both are so. At any rate, there is every reason to suspect that their parents could be worth little. And who are the bad characters that frequent these houses? They are partly thieves; partly thief-takers, who have or have not been thieves; partly informers, who partake of both characters, and are in the habit of practising some of the meanest and most odious vices. The Government, it seems, countenances these houses for the absurd purpose of detecting what such houses create; somebody must keep them; a father of a family keeps one; his son has no example, no education, no chance of being good and happy; the company corrupt him very speedily; the thief-takers or informers, in return for their house-room, seduce him into dangerous practices; he leads, for a time, a life of premature bullying, debauchery, and misery,—his young face, and body, and spirits, all spoiled; and then when he is ripe, as it were, for bleeding into the cups of these scoundrels, he is informed against and hung.

Is it not barbarous and brutal, setting aside all the absurdity, to affect to consider this poor creature with resentment, or as a fit object of sacrifice to the laws, or in any other light than as a sacrifice which the laws are bound to rescue from villainy? If they say they cannot, the system of the society they govern must be bad; and they must begin with altering that. They must not eternally beg the question in favour of the mistakes of the great; and punish with a double and conscious resentment what they provoke.

And one thing else is well worthy of reflection; which is, the effect which the instinctive knowledge of all this has upon the lawless part of society themselves. We do not merely mean the more obvious one, but the kind of scornful insight it gives them into the common-place pretensions and virtues of the flourishing or self-satisfied. The necessity of reconciling themselves to their own minds teaches them some elements of this knowledge; mutual suffering gives them more; and so far, the knowledge might be superior to much which is taught others;—but want of education and of a better taste makes them stop short of its advantages; and instead of learning to look with such an eye upon vice as should make the toleration turn to a virtue, they learn to regard virtue as nothing but a selfish and hypocritical practice of a different sort of vice. Indeed the common modes of it too often are; and the vicious part of the more staid community fall, from a similar want of understanding, into a similar mistake; and either secretly regard virtue as a joke or a term of convention; or adopt the still more summary method of theologizing upon it, and reducing it to dogmas and heavenly privileges;—only taking care, observe, to get rid of it somehow or other.

We do not claim, in one sense, a merit for virtue; but still less will we allow a saving grace to an opinion, or a right to any class or classes of men to make ill-educated victims of another. The least that the more unfortunate part of society can claim of the rest is really and truly to look at the first causes of what they suffer, and to set about reforming them; not to go eternally quarrelling with fourth and fifth causes, still less to make the causes themselves, and then visit them with an absurd and barbarous anger.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 9.—The Duke of Wellington gave a dinner, at which were present the French and Foreign Commissioners for the liquidation of claims.

The Seine has risen considerably; it already overflows the neighbouring plains.

We have announced that Lord Castlereagh will be present at the Congress of the Sovereigns, which will take place this summer. It appears that M. Richelieu will be also called upon to attend them.

The tempest which raged yesterday in Paris has occasioned a great number of accidents. The violence of the wind was such, that several persons were thrown down on the quays, many ladies carried some distance from the ground, and even horses were impeded in their course. A hackney-coachman was crushed to death in his box, by the fall of a chimney. A man had his arm broken in the rue de Petit Carreau, by a similar accident. Showers of tiles and slates fell in all directions. The roof of the Palace

Bourbon, and several other public edifices, were much damaged.

"The elements are at war," says one of the Paris papers, "and it seems for some time as if a grand physical revolution was in preparation. Luminous meteors, discharging stones, appear on all sides: earthquakes have been felt in all latitudes; water-spouts carry women up into the air; all shores are covered with wreck: at Munich subterraneous noises are heard; and horses are suddenly visited with cold sweats, as from fear; wells are dug to ascertain the nature of these sudden explosions. At Petersburg the barometer has fallen as low as during the great earthquake at Lisbon. Shall we speak of Paris? The tempest rages both in the air and in the mind;—slates and pamphlets rain down upon us at the same time, and passengers incur the double danger of being overwhelmed by chimnies and editions. Who shall alay such a tempest, and pronounce the celebrated Quos ego?"

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

WINCHESTER.—F. Piesse, alias F. H. Parsons, was indicted for stealing 388*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.* the property of his Majesty.—The prisoner was a Clerk in the Navy Pay-office, at Portsmouth. On the morning on which he was to hand over his balance, he produced sundry notes, assorted in parcels of 50*l.* composed severally of 5*l.* 2*l.* and 1*l.* notes. Upon examination it was discovered that two parcels which he produced as each consisting of ten 5*l.* notes, were arranged with a 5*l.* note at the top and bottom of each, the intermediate ones being only those of 20*s.* On further examination, it was found that he was deficient the sum of 388*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.* On being told his balance was not correct, he replied he would make it so, instead of which he immediately left the office, and absconded to France. Bishop apprehended him in Paris, and brought him back.—Seven years transportation.

O. Lockyer and R. Hand, were charged with the murder of J. Sutton, at Northwood, in the Isle of Wight.—J. Holding, a surgeon, was going to South America with the prisoners on board the ship Grace. On the 9th of December he was with them at the Dolphin Inn, West Cowes; they sat together for two hours; when Sutton remarked, that all the company were in debt.—Major Lockyer replied, "Do you mean to say, that I am in debt?"—Sutton said, "he did."—Major Lockyer answered, "Whoever is in debt, I am not."—Sutton replied, "We are all in debt to our Creator."—Major Lockyer left the room, and messages passed between them, and a Mr. Redesdale, another passenger. Sutton said, if he (Major L.) called him out he would meet him. Next morning they met to settle the dispute by fighting a duel. Hand and Redesdale measured the ground. Hand called Sutton, and gave him a pistol; when he and Major Lockyer took their ground, Major Lockyer fired, and Sutton clapped his hand on his breast, staggered forward two or three paces, and held out his hand. Major L. advanced and took it. He immediately fell, and the prisoners ran away. Sutton soon after expired.—Mr. Fitzgerald (brother to the owner of the vessel) deposed, that Hand seriously pressed Sutton to settle the affair, when they were going to the field—all was said that could be said to induce him to make concession for the words he had used, and not fight; this admonition he repeated several times.—Several other witnesses were examined, but their testimony added no new fact to those not already known. Major Lockyer and Mr. Hand both read a long defence. Verdict.—Man-slaughter.—Three months imprisonment each.

NORTHAMPTON.—T. W. Keene and R. George were indicted for robbing J. Law of two one-pound notes and 9*s.*—It appeared that the prisoners entered the kitchen where Law resided, when they charged him with harbouring George's wife, and other things—threatening him, at the same time, with exposure and an action at law, if he did not give them 50*l.* Being much frightened, Law said he would give them what he had, which was the sum they were charged with taking.—The Judge intimated that the prisoners must be acquitted, for though their conduct was most disgraceful, yet it did not amount to felony.—They were accordingly acquitted.—Keene is an attorney, and the son of a Clergyman of the county.—The Judge hinted to him, that he would not long have an opportunity of following a profession, which he had so disgraced.

HARTFORD.—W. Dyer, only 19 years of age, was found guilty of robbing and ill-treating T. Clarke, on the 12th Sept.—Clarke was a mealman at Hoddesdon, and was going with bran and pollard, in a cart, to Dazell. Near Haytree, he was joined by Dyer, who had a musket. They proceeded together, and at the first public-house, as Dyer seemed fatigued, Clarke gave him some meat, bread, gin, and beer. After this, they went on, and on the close of day, Dyer suddenly gave Clarke a desperate blow on the back of his head, which felled him to the ground senseless. The ungrateful ruffian then bruised and cut him in several parts of the body, and afterwards, drove the cart over him, which broke his thigh! He next rifled his pockets, and left him apparently dead. Some persons shortly after came up; the villain was pursued, and taken with some of the property on him. Dyer conducted himself very indecently during the trial, and when the sentence of Death was passed upon him, he exhibited the utmost indifference. He was told not to expect the slightest mercy.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 6.

Earl GROSVENOR presented a Petition from W. P. Rogers, of Chelsea, shopkeeper, stating that he had been dismissed from his office of receiver of letters for the Post-Office at Chelsea, without any cause being assigned, and that he imputed his dismissal to his having signed a Petition for Parliamentary Reform and redress of grievances. This Petition he signed on the 17th of July last, after which his removal from this office of receiver took place. The Petitioner also complained of threats of the loss of his customers having been held out to him by a reverend gentleman, on account of the interest he took in the Petition. The Petitioner concluded by praying for an inquiry into his conduct, and the cause of his removal from the office which he had held. Ordered to lie on the table.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN presented a Petition from Wakerfield, in Yorkshire, in favour of the chimney-sweepers' regulation Bill.—Ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, March 10.

The Chimney-sweepers' Regulation Bill was read a second time and committed.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 10.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.

Lord AUCKLAND moved, that a humble address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying that his Royal Highness would be pleased to order the Surveyor-General of the Board of Works to make inquiries, in order to ascertain how far it may be practicable to supersede the use of climbing-boys in sweeping chimnies.—Agreed to.—Adjourned.

Thursday, March 12.

A great number of Chimney-sweepers were sworn to give evidence before the Committee, on the Bill for preventing the employment of Climbing-boys.—Various Bills were forwarded, and the House adjourned.

Friday, March 13.

On the motion for the 3d reading of the Mutiny Bill, Earl GROSVENOR, after noticing the dangers to liberty of a standing army, as well as the enormous expense it entailed on the suffering people,—which he did with much force of reasoning,—moved that 100,000 men be substituted for 113,000.

Earl BATHURST contended, that the army was already scarcely sufficient to perform its necessary duties.

Earl GROSVENOR replied, and told a sarcastic story of a certain Prince of a powerful island, whose Ministers encouraged him in brilliant courts and splendid military establishments. To wean the Sovereign from this folly, which excited the general discontent, an honest courtier assembled in a room a number of baboons, cats, and dogs, dressed up in the military fashion of the day, and showed them to the Prince, who was first offended with the ridicule thus cast on his favourites, but was at length convinced of the absurdity of the system, and reformed it altogether.

Earl Grosvenor's motion was however negatived without division.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 9.

Mr. MELLISH obtained leave for a Bill for the construction of a bridge over the Thames at Hammersmith, with power to make roads leading thereto.

Mr. PROTHEROE presented a Petition, signed by 1000 persons in and about Bristol, praying for Parliamentary Reform on the principle of Universal Suffrage.—Ordered to lie on the table.

THE INDEMNITY BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the first reading of the Indemnity Bill. He contended that within the last 14 or 15 months conspiracies had existed, with a view to overthrow the established Government, some under the pretence of a Reform of Parliament. Strong measures had been necessary to repress them. An explosion took place at Derby, and it had been attempted at Nottingham. It had been said, that the criminals had been incited by Spies and Informers; but such was not the fact. Oliver had been taken to Derby, but all the prisoners disclaimed having any knowledge of him. Great pains had been taken to demoralize the lower orders, by blasphemous and seditious publications, and it was the bounden duty of the Government to stop such proceedings. For having done their duty, Ministers should be protected; and unless they were enabled to shield those who had given necessary information, treasonable conspiracies would in future proceed with impunity.—Large bodies of men were besetting themselves to Petition for Reform; but let the House beware, let them consider what may be the object of men who came forward, as it were, with a petition in one hand and a sword in the other!—(No, no; from the Opposition.)—There could be no doubt, that a Reform extending to universal suffrage and annual parliaments was but another name for Revolution!—On every principle of necessity, propriety, and justice, they were bound to press the present Bill.

Mr. LAMBTON remarked, that the Habeas Corpus had never before been suspended on such flimsy pretences: but when Ministers last year found that the people could no longer be diverted from exposing the system on which they acted, they had recourse to their last refuge, and gagged the mouths of the people, as the only way left to stifle the cry for economy and retrenchment. This was like the execrable Robespierre, who however attacked the high and the powerful, while Ministers directed their assaults against the poor and the starving; thus showing that they had no bowels of compassion, and teaching the people that it was extravagant folly to look for redress to that House.—Why was not Oliver, that blood-stained spy, in whose hands Brandreth was only an instrument, brought to trial?—(Hear, hear!)—But if the voice of justice and of the country called for the punishment of Oliver, equally did it call for the impeachment and punishment of those who sent him forth, who praised his moral character, and who vindicated his whole conduct. In their councils originated the plan of sending spies among the people—from their cabinet issued Oliver as their champion. Yet those men now came down for an Act of Indemnity, requiring the House to screen the perpetrators of all those dark atrocities! The Learned Gentleman had said, that indemnity was not sought for so much to protect Ministers as to protect those who gave information. This was false; but if true, he would maintain that Ministers were not warranted to call for such an indemnity. Who were their informers? Were they gentlemen of character? No, they were the blood-thirsty spies, who were sent forth by Ministers, and who created all the evils that had disturbed the country.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—There was one fact now come to light, in addition to what had formerly been detected, which called for the utmost attention. He was authorized, if necessary, to produce the name of the gentleman who would prove all the circumstances at the Bar.—(Loud cheers.)—This gentleman stated, that on the day of opening the Session last year, before the Prince Regent returned from the House, he met Oliver at the Horse Guards going into the Park, and inveighing in such loud terms against the Prince Regent as to collect a crowd about him. The individual remonstrated with Oliver in vain. The consequence was, the outrage on the person of the Prince, and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus.—(Much cheering.)—He therefore opposed any indemnity for proceedings so flagrantly unjustifiable. Not only was his own private opinion against the Bill, but, in the name of the county which he represented (Durham), where the people had not altogether lost the right of election; in their name he called for a full, fair, and impartial inquiry into the abuses practised during the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. (Loud cheering.) He did not say so in hopes of influencing the House, but he would say on his conscience, that the House was bound in duty to the people of England to support him, when he moved that this Bill be read a first time this day six months.—(Loud and continued cheering.)

Sir M. RIDLEY would not have risen so early, if any gentleman on the other side had attempted to answer the eloquent speech of his Hon. Friend.—(Hear, hear, from the Ministerial side of the House.)—If, as he supposed from that cheer, any gentleman was now disposed to make the attempt, he was perfectly ready to give way to him.—(Hear, hear, from the Opposition.)—The Hon. Baronet sat down, and the Speaker put the question; but no Member presenting himself, the Hon. Baronet, after a short pause, resumed, and argued with much force against the Bill.

Mr. PROTHEROE supported it, as he thought the House should protect Ministers against the consequence of exercising powers it had itself bestowed on them.

Col. STANHOPE contended that the Secret Committee of the House had shewn the necessity of the measures adopted by Ministers, and therefore the Bill of Indemnity should follow of course. It was not Oliver and the rest who had caused the disaffection, but it was Cobbett and the seditious writers who followed his example, by whom the minds of the people had been poisoned.

Mr. SMYTH opposed the Bill. It was a melancholy fact, he remarked, that the victory of Waterloo, and the return of the states of Europe to the ancient legitimate forms of government, should have been followed by the same result which the ill success of Mr. Pitt's measures, and the revolutionary spirit of the age, had formerly created. Whatever might be the fate of the constitution, whether it was to fall before the prerogative of the crown, or by the servility of that House, a more dangerous precedent could not be established. The force and authority of all law depended on opinion, and the respect paid to it could only be maintained by affording to every individual who thought himself aggrieved the opportunity of obtaining redress.

Mr. BRAND followed on the same side. He said that it was the first time that such a measure had been resorted to, whilst the country was in a state of peace abroad and tranquillity at home. He much feared that, if now adopted, it would be hereafter frequently resorted to, there being unfortunately a feeling of disrespect in the people's minds towards that House, which was fostered by the inattention with which the House treated the Petitions of those whom they represented. The Bill appeared to him to be one not of indemnity but of injustice, and ought to be rejected.

Mr. MARRYATT observed, that though he had voted against the Suspension Act, yet as he could not find that Ministers had abused their authority, he should vote for the Indemnity Bill.

Lord ALTHORP said, he should always maintain, that the House had no right to deprive an Englishman of his legal remedy, unless a very strong case was made out. Acts illegally done should be inquired into, and the Commons were bound to institute a proper one, not such as had been hitherto adopted.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. FREEMANTLE supported the Bill, and was of opinion that the people in general would hereafter applaud the firmness and judgment of Ministers.

Lord NUGENT gave his hearty vote against the Bill, conceiving that the Suspension Act had not been called for by the circumstances of the country. When he saw the Petitions which had crowded the table this Session, when he found that many individuals had been hurried to dungeons, and loaded with chains, for crimes which had never been proved; when he learnt that many had been bound by recognizances, which were afterwards enlarged to an indefinite period, and were then discharged without any explanation; when he saw that our gaols had been crowded by persons confined under arbitrary warrants, persons whom Ministers would not afterwards put upon their trial, he thought that Parliament was bound to inquire why, if guilty, they had not been tried; and why, if innocent, they were imprisoned.—(Hear, hear!)

The House divided—For the motion, 190—Against it, 64—Majority, 126.

The Bill was then read; and upon the motion that it be read again to-morrow,

Mr. BROUGHAM hoped that the Bill would not be hurried through in such a manner, and that too by the dead eloquence of votes. If the measure was thus to be carried by the shouts of an overbearing majority, he should avail himself of the forms of the House, which would give them an opportunity of making Ministers pause in their proceedings.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH thought the Hon. Gentleman had made a most unprovoked attack; and had he emerged from his hiding-place at an earlier period of the evening, the charge of silence brought against Ministers might not have been sustained. There was no sort of ground for delay.

Mr. BROUGHAM explained, that the only ground on which he abstained from speaking was this,—he had never found anything said on his side of the House had any effect but that of being superfluous.

Sir SAMUEL ROBINLY was astonished at the reasons given by the Noble Lord for a second reading to-morrow; there had, in fact, being no discussion on the Bill at all. The Noble Lord said, that Ministers did not speak because his Learned Friend (Mr. Brougham) had not spoken. But had nobody else spoken? Was it necessary for Ministers on all occasions to wait till his Learned Friend rose from his hiding-place before they would condescend to make any reply to what was urged from that side of the House?—(Hear, hear!)—If so, his Learned Friend had only to conceal himself, and Ministers might be silent for ever—(Hear, hear!)—The Noble Lord was sure of carrying it, and he and his colleagues would, therefore, be just as safe three weeks hence as at the present hour. They had no reason whatever for pressing it forward with such indecent precipitation, but to gratify the mere wantonness of power.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. CANNING said, it was perfectly true that the greater number of speakers had figured on the other side; but then they had answered one another, and so had left Ministers nothing to do. It was not usual to debate a measure on the first reading.

Sir J. NEWPORT contended strongly for further delay.

The motion for the 2d reading was then put and carried.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, March 10.

BEER.

Mr. LOCKHART presented a Petition from 14,000 inhabitants of London and its vicinity, complaining of the high price and inferior quality of the beer, and of the illegal monopoly, by which eleven great brewers acted in concert in regard to the price of that necessary of life. It represented that the system of monopoly arose from the discretionary power given to Magistrates to give or refuse or take away publicans' licenses, which was often used for interested purposes, and in an arbitrary and unjust manner. The Petitioners therefore wished the trade to be thrown open, and that some definite rule for the Magistrates should be adopted by Parliament. The Hon. Gentleman recommended attention to the Petition, although he would not pledge himself to support the statements in it. The Police Committee had examined persons well-informed on that subject, and had reported, that the brewers held more than half the public-houses.

Mr. BARCLAY said, that the resolutions on which the Petition was founded were passed at a meeting called by a Mr. Beaumont, and he was not at all surprised at the number of signatures to the Petition, when he considered the means employed to procure them, by sticking it in shop windows, &c. It was certainly a practice among the great brewers of lending small sums of money to persons taking public-houses, but this did not positively fix the publicans in general. The charge respecting the high price of porter was unfounded, as would be seen by looking at the change in the price of the raw materials; and Mr. Beaumont had both misquoted and misrepresented. The price of malt was not always a criterion, as the quality varied. He denied that there was any combination of the brewers. Porter was sold cheaper on account of the large breweries. There was no reason for charging the brewers with using deleterious ingredients, though some convictions had taken place for that offence. If such ingredients were used, they must be brought in cart-loads to the great breweries and must consequently be known by many people. He could not consider the Petition as from 14,000 persons, but as the production of Mr. Beaumont, of whom he knew nothing.

The further consideration of the Petition was postponed.

COMPLAINT OF OPPRESSION.

Lord FOLKSTONE presented a Petition from Mr. Rogers, a tradesman in Chelsea, complaining that the Two-penny Post-office had been taken from him because he was a friend to Parliamentary Reform.—Laid on the table.

REFORM.

Sir F. BURDETT, in presenting a Petition from some inhabitants of Warwickshire in favour of annual parliaments and universal suffrage, took that opportunity of protesting against the doctrine maintained in that House, that Petitions such as the present one were intended to overthrow the Constitution. He contended that ancient practice was in favour of annual parliaments. In those days, Members had no objection to appear frequently before their constituents, for they did not go into Parliament to be corrupted, to mend ruined fortunes, or to make them by base subserviency! He objected therefore to the plan of answering such Petitions by abuse.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BROUGHAM presented a Petition from James Robertson, a weaver, complaining that he had been illegally confined, under false pretences. The Petitioner stated, that he was arrested with 19 others while promoting Petitions for Reform, committed to prison, only allowed to see his friends five minutes a week, and after being confined eleven weeks, was compelled, in order to get released, to procure bail, which he did with great difficulty. He prayed for redress.

Mr. FINLAY thought this statement refuted by the confessions of those implicated in the same charges. He had made enquiry, and would attest that there was no foundation for the charge of cruelty against the Magistrates.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, it was a strange thing to meet a Petition by alluding to former ones, and, because others were not well founded, to conclude that this was so too.—The Hon. Gentleman presented a similar Petition from Heath, a cotton-spinner, and a third from William Edgar, teacher, Glasgow. It stated, that the Petitioner had been dragged about from place to place, bound like a felon, and handcuffed like a ruffian; that he was tried three times for the same offence, without being convicted after all; that all the attempts against him served only to vindicate his character, and to cover his prosecutors with shame and confusion; the Petition concluded by praying the House not to pass a Bill of Indemnity, which would prevent the injured from procuring redress of their wrongs.

Mr. BOSWELL said, that in Scotland none had been taken up under the operation of the Suspension Act, and therefore individuals would not be prevented from procuring redress by the common law.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, the Hon. Gentleman knew no more of the provision of the Bill, which he was so ready to support, than the child unborn. That Bill extended not only to those who had acted under the Suspension, but to all persons whatever who had been concerned in the arrest and detention of individuals under certain charges since the 26th of January, 1817.

Mr. BOSWELL was not previously aware that the provisions of the Bill then before them extended to those persons, but he was now happy to find they did.—Laid on the table.

Mr. BROUGHAM then presented a Petition from some respectable inhabitants of Liverpool, who had been prevented from calling a meeting, expressing their surprise and indignation at the Indemnity Bill.

On the motion of Mr. CALCRAFT, a Committee was appointed to enquire into the Salt Duties.

BILL OF INDEMNITY.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the second reading of this Bill.

Some objections were made by Sir W. BURROUGHS, Mr. TIERNEY, and Sir C. MONCK, respecting that part of the Bill which indemnified all persons concerned in seizing arms and papers; but Lord CASTLEREAGH said that should be discussed in the Committee.

Lord LASCELLES wished to make some observations on the statements contained in the Petition of Richard Lee, affecting the character of the Keeper of York Castle. The Petitioner stated, that he being placed in the same cell previously occupied by Riley, the unfortunate man who had destroyed himself, was obliged, with his own hands, to cleanse away the congealed blood, in order to make it fit for his reception. Now, he held in his hand the affidavit of the person who had performed that office; and who positively denied that Lee had any share in it. He had also a letter from Mr. Stavelly, the gaoler, to Lord Sidmouth, stating, that Lee had expressed his sense of his kind treatment to Mr. Dealtry, the Magistrate. The greater part of the statement was equally untrue; for, instead of being, as he described himself, loaded with irons, he had no more than the usual weight of 5lb. attached to his left ankle. His prison allowance was ten pounds and a half of bread, and sixpence per week, to which seven shillings were added by Lord Sidmouth's order. It was true that he had been confined for five days with a felon, who was afterwards executed, but he was removed as soon as he could be accommodated elsewhere. With regard to the case of Riley, and the assertion that his death had proceeded from illness caused by his confinement, it was here stated that Riley was deranged before he was confined.

Sir F. BURDETT attached very little importance to the statements of gaolers and those under their influence. On a former evening, an Hon. Gentleman had contended, that it was Mr. Cobbett's writings which had created the necessity of suspending the Habeas Corpus. He certainly thought Mr. Cobbett a powerful writer, but he had never imagined that he possessed the degree of influence now attributed to him. It was singular to hear it represented, that the Government, with the means of bribing and corrupting almost the whole press, in addition to the exertion of their own wit, intellect, and literary talents, should attach so much importance to what was sometimes called twopenny trash, and always described as maintaining doctrines equally false and absurd!—There was no occasion for these miserable subterfuges. Ministers knew very well, that the only Conspiracy was to prevent Reform. He should reserve what he had to say of the Bill until it had gone into a Committee.

The House divided—For the 2d reading, 89—Against it, 24—Majority, 65.

On Mr. BROUGHAM's motion, a statement was ordered of the measures which had been taken in regard to the destruction of the books and papers relating to the Property Tax.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 11.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT presented Petitions for Parliamentary Reform from Macclesfield, from Preston, and from Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Ordered to lie on the table.—He also presented a Petition from James Sellers, complaining of having been put into Reading gaol and ironed, under the Suspension Act.—Ordered to lie on the table.

INDEMNITY BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL having moved the order of the day for going into a Committee on the Indemnity Bill,

Sir S. ROMILLY objected to the general principle of the Bill, which was to prevent aggrieved individuals, however aggravated were their injuries, from seeking redress. It embraced three chief objects, indemnity to Ministers, indemnity to Magistrates, indemnity to Informers. As to the first point, some Gentlemen maintained that the House was bound to protect Ministers in the exercise of the powers which it had granted to them. Nothing could be more erroneous. The Suspension itself protected them in the exercise of extraordinary powers. It was said that no person had been arrested but upon information on oath; what need was there then for indemnity? It was said too that no information could be obtained without a promise of secrecy; but what security was there that all the informations were not the result of private malice, since there was no responsibility in giving information? An oath, under such circumstances, was deprived of all legal and political security. It had been asserted that all the Petitions complaining of abuses had been disproved; but out of eleven petitions, only three had been denied. If the statements in these Petitions were not taken to be true, should indemnity be granted to Magistrates without inquiry? On a former discussion, Ministers had said nothing in their own justification, because their own conduct was called in question. But they had furnished the evidence to the Committee, and perhaps drawn up the Report. It was said that a Bill of Indemnity was the necessary consequence of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and this assertion was justified by precedents; but, as far as he knew, there was no such precedent but that of 1801. As to the other periods when Suspensions had taken place,—in 1715 and 1745,—the country was in a very critical situation, and the Ministers had been compelled to have recourse to unforeseen measures, which required indemnity. He was sure that the indemnity to Magistrates was not contemplated at the time of the Suspension. Was it to be supposed that in this country, in 1817, the Magistrates could not trust to the strong bulwarks which the law had provided for the security of the country, but must have had recourse to violent means, and exert a vigour beyond the law? A great many persons had been arrested at Manchester, and if Government possessed evidence sufficient to convict these men, why not bring them to trial, instead of asking indemnity for these Magistrates, while the House were left perfectly in the dark with respect to the real state of the case? No explanation whatever had been given why this Bill extended to the 26th of January. It remained to be seen whether they could vote such a measure as this, without even the shew of a reason, or an explanation. There was one part of the Bill justifying Magistrates for the seizure of papers. The subject had been very warmly discussed, when a house (Mr. Wilkes's) was entered, and papers were seized at mid-day for libel, and the practice was strongly and explicitly condemned. Petitions were laid upon that table, a few nights back, in which it was alleged, that the petitioners' houses were entered at midnight, the petitioners dragged away, loaded with irons, brought before the Sessions, condemned to hard labour,—and all in consequence of the celebrated circular letter which had been discussed in that House. The punishment to which they were thus exposed was such as they could not suffer if convicted. A punishment so atrocious could not be inflicted. It would be a thing so monstrous that it could not be attempted. Yet thus were they punished, without a charge and without trial.—(Hear, hear!)—One case appeared in the public Papers, which it was incumbent on Ministers to explain. It was the case of a person of the name of Swinton, whose house was entered at midnight, when he lay in bed with his wife, who was far gone in pregnancy; his house was ransacked for papers, he was himself dragged away, his wife was prematurely delivered, in consequence of the alarm; the child died, and another child, deprived now of the support of its parents, was sent to the work-house. And all this dreadful suffering was inflicted upon a person charged with no offence!—(Hear, hear, hear!)—He would ask the Gentlemen opposite, whether they thought that, because they could suspend the laws of this country, they could suspend the laws of God and of Nature? This Bill would be made a precedent for others; and they might expect to be called upon next year for another indemnity for illegal acts—illegal they must be, or no indemnity would be wanted. The House should take an example from Ireland, where the most dreadful tortures had been inflicted, which should show them the consequences of encouraging Magistrates to act against the law. Those who demanded redress were refused, and the refusal sanctioned by an Act of Parliament, which was now cited as a precedent! The danger from persons in France corresponding with others in this country was then the pretence. In the present case such a danger was not pretended. But those who had given information would be exposed to danger—from the populace, he supposed it must be, or from individuals. He would then seriously ask, whether one individual in that House could for one moment believe that danger was to be apprehended by any witness in this country; whether such was the state of the country as that witness could not give evidence with safety? The Report said nothing of such a danger. There were trials for treason in London, in Derby, in York. Did any of the witnesses show reluctance to come forward, or desire protection for their persons?—He would say a word about spies and informers. There could exist no circumstances in which spies could be employed as Oliver had been. Information might be received from bad characters, but that was a very different thing from employing them as spies. An Honourable Gentleman had said that the persons whom Oliver addressed at Derby were ill-disposed. Was he aware that he was taking the same ground with men who were the execration of mankind? This was the very defence of Vaughan's conduct. Vaughan had enticed persons to commit a burglary, and then got them apprehended in the act. The defence was, that their characters were so bad, that they required only an opportunity to act, in order to be guilty of theft and burglary. The defence for instigating the starving men in Derby to rebellion was, that they were not unwilling to commit state offences. Between those two cases he could not see the slightest distinction. The Bill then was framed to protect those who were the agents in such cases, in order to continue the system. This Act would now become a precedent for all others, which Ministers might choose to demand. His only consolation was, that when these arbitrary and cruel proceedings, and these precedents against the people of England should be read by posterity,—and when all the venerable institutions for the administration of justice should become the instruments of oppression,—that posterity would at the same time see that a few individuals, small in number compared with those who willingly surrendered their liberties and cheered the advance of a system that overwhelmed law, justice, and liberty,—that those few individuals continued to exert all their power to preserve that happy constitution of civil society which formed the boast of this country, and the envy of other nations, till they were borne down by irresistible force. He would not say that this Bill was the destruction of our liberties, but it led directly to it, and formed part of a system which would end in the triumph of arbitrary power; when the language of our immortal poet would be fatally true—“That England, which was wont to conquer other nations, has gained a shameful conquest over itself.”—(The Hon. and Learned Gentleman sat down, amid the most animated and expressive cheers.)

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL distinctly denied that the present measure had ever been introduced or supported on the presumption that Ministers had been guilty of the last irregularity. The reports of Committees appointed by the House had led to the two acts of suspension, and, together with the report recently received from a third Secret Committee, could never be laid aside in the consideration of this measure. The indemnity claimed for Ministers did not rest upon any supposed inability on the part of Ministers to defend themselves in a court of justice, but on the reasonable apprehension, that a disclosure of the names of those who had supplied information to Government, as to the designs and proceedings of the disaffected, might be prejudicial to the future security of the state. As to there being little difference between the cases of Oliver and Vaughan, he really could not conceive any cases more dissimilar. It was not even pretended that Vaughan had ever been employed by others to entrap unwary men. Did the Learned Gentleman mean to accuse his Majesty's Ministers of employing Oliver for the express purpose of doing mischief? Every fact which came out in evidence at Derby showed the strong probability that similar insurrections would have taken place in other parts of the country, had not very strenuous exertions been made by the Magistrates to prevent them. It was on this ground that indemnity was now asked for that valuable class of the community, who might in some instances have exceeded their legal powers in their anxiety to secure the public welfare. The whole question might be safely referred to the general principle, that in extraordinary cases private interests must yield to the public safety.

Sir F. BURDETT avowed it as his fixed opinion, that the disturbances were excited purposely by Ministers, and that they were directed solely against persons who wished to obtain a Reform in that House. It was absurd to suppose that the Reformers could have sanctioned or encouraged any breach of the peace; it was important to them that the public tranquillity should be preserved. It appeared to him that no person could derive any advantage from it but the Ministers themselves; and when he considered that the present administration were the remnant of the administration who formerly practised a delusion on the country, by pretending that great and serious dangers existed, he could come to no other conclusion than that they were the persons who had instigated all the acts of riot and treason (if they were treason) which had been committed. Ministers, he contended, had violated the King's coronation oath; they had denied and refused justice; they had broken the laws of the land, and trampled on the liberties of the people. The whole of these transactions seemed to him to be of a piece—the abuse of the powers, and the original delegation of them, were equally illegal and unconstitutional. Though some of the statements had been contradicted, it had not been shown that many had not been placed in solitary confinement, and others loaded with heavy irons, and even chained together. Could one conceive any sort of treatment more inhuman? Was it possible to imagine any thing more dreadful, than that persons in this situation, chained together, should be obliged to bear all the infirmities of human nature? A tyrant of old had ventured to practice such cruelties, but, in modern times, they had been deemed beyond all human endurance. The very contemplation of such cruel indignities was enough to drive the mind to despair. The House had heard, that a man of the name of Riley, who was committed to prison on a charge of treason, was so dreadfully afflicted by this mode of treatment, that before the time came when he was to be tried, he committed an act of suicide.—(Hear, hear!)—These cruelties were as contrary to the old law of England as they were to the mild precepts of the Christian religion. He remembered that my Lord Coke had described the damnable and damned proceedings of the judge of hell:—"First he punisheth, and then he heareth;" and yet, persons who had suffered the punishment of imprisonment for months, had been afterwards discharged without trial; and then came Ministers to ask for a Bill of Indemnity, not only for themselves, but for gaolers and all others, under a pretence of having arrested persons on suspicion of treason.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—With respect to the trials at Derby, he contended that the offence with which the prisoners were charged might have been suppressed by the ordinary laws, and yet that was the only instance in which any thing like treason had been found to exist. Let the House pause for a moment, and consider the nature and extent of those proceedings. There ought to be some proportion between the means and the end; and it was ridiculous to suppose, that Brandreth, armed with a stick and a gun, could destroy such an army as the Government had, and overturn the Constitution of the country. He should always maintain, that there was no pretence for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in the last Session of Parliament; that there were no real grounds for arresting the persons who had been arrested; and that, as Ministers had grossly and wantonly abused the powers with which they were invested, this Bill of Indemnity ought not to be granted. He should, therefore, give his vote against it.

Mr. LAW said, that the country were greatly indebted to his Majesty's Ministers for the wise and salutary measures which they had adopted for the restoration of the public tranquillity. The Hon. Baronet had said that they wished to stifle the cause of Reform; but it was only when the country was in a state of perfect tranquillity that the Hon. Baronet could hope to bring forward his cause with any success, and to receive the fair, unbiased, unprejudiced determination of Parliament. The House was bound to protect all who had acted under the powers which were given to the Ministers. The question was simply this—whether they should protect those who prevented, or those who committed, offences? He was persuaded that Ministers were entitled to the gratitude of the country for the manner in which they had exercised their powers, and he should give his hearty support to this Bill.

Sir WM. BURROUGHS said, this was the first time he had ever heard from an English lawyer a doctrine so much in violation of our Constitution, that, on a warrant issued on oath, the information should remain a secret. By the law of the land, the Magistrate was bound to commit the party, next to return the informations to the proper court, and then to bind the prosecutor over to prosecute. Ministers had come to this House for greater powers, and, having obtained them, the first thing they did was to exceed them. If the Ministers had not exceeded their powers, where was the occasion for any indemnity at all? (Hear, hear!) It had been implied that Ministers would not go into an inquiry, because the persons who said they were aggrieved had their remedy in a court of law. But they said, next day, they would have a Bill of Indemnity, and therefore all remedy at law would be taken from the complainants. If such proceedings did not add insult to injury, he was much mistaken in his views. He could not help designating the Bill as "a most odious, and, indeed, audacious proceeding."

Sir F. FLOOD said, the arguments of the Hon. Bart. (Sir W. Burroughs) were unfounded: if he would look to Blackstone, he would find that great lawyer said, that whenever the State was apprehended to be in danger, a suspension act was proper, which, instead of injuring the Constitution, would preserve it for ever. (Hear, hear!)

The Hon. W. LAW contended that there had been an apprehension of danger sufficient to justify the proceedings of Government, and he did not think that any thing that had passed had had any tendency to influence a belief that the statements made had been exaggerated. He believed that there was, in the manufacturing districts, a steady spirit of disaffection, not exasperated, not rising or falling, but always at work, always lying in wait to take advantage of the misfortunes and calamities of the country. Oliver had always rejected petitioning, and disregarded parliamentary reform; but the conspirators received him, relied upon him; he was trusted, and he became their leader. (Hear, hear!) And what, then, could be the spirit of the people by whom he was received? He had been considered as high in the confidence of the conspirators till he was found to be a spy, and then he was charged with their offences. There had been a story about his using violent language in the Park; but all these statements had been no doubt considerably exaggerated. He thought the powers granted last year had been properly confided to Ministers, and executed with equal propriety. The Hon. Gentleman made various other remarks, and concluded amidst vehement and continued cheering from the Treasury benches.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that whatever might be the talent or the character of his Hon. Friend, it was his argument, and not his authority, that was to be considered; and hardly any of it had reference to the present Bill, which held out indemnity to all who had been concerned in any of the late transactions—to those who had overstepped the law with the best of motives, and those who had transgressed it with the worst. It confounded the magistrate, the man of honesty and character, who had taken every precaution, and faithfully discharged his duty in maintaining the public tranquillity, with a person whom he should describe without periphrasis, but who had been called by the various names of "that loyal and upright subject," "that much injured individual," "that meritorious agent of the police,"—he meant that Oliver; it confounded this man, or any other such miscreant, if any other such there could be—that is, it placed those persons in the same attitude as the magistrates, by holding out the same indemnity to them.—Mr. Brougham then entered into the conduct of Oliver, and instanced the uncontradicted case of the unfortunate Scholes, who had suffered merely because he had disregarded the invitations of Oliver; for this he had suffered a painful imprisonment—for this his health was ruined, as attested by his physician—for this his fortune and character had been destroyed, as appeared by the evidence of most respectable neighbours. And why? because he threatened Oliver, (such was the uncontradicted statement—(Hear, hear!)—backed by the testimony of a most respectable Magistrate) to lay his discourse before a justice, when he proposed the adoption of physical force as a means of promoting Parliamentary Reform. In forty-eight hours after this threat, he was conveyed to prison.—Mr. Brougham here made various observations on the stigma which had been thrown by Ministers on all the Petitions, and on their endeavours to stop all evidence and prevent all inquiry, by which alone justice could be done—(Hear, hear!)—It was such conduct that destroyed the confidence of the country in the measures of Government: it was such conduct which stigmatised the Secret Committees of the House, and made their reports no justification of the administration in the eyes of impartial men. He had yet to learn by what legitimate process of argument it was decided, that because one Petitioner had presented exaggerated statements—that because another had addressed to the House what was false,—that because a third had magnified his sufferings beyond the strict line of truth,—therefore the House was to lend no ear to any Petitions, however different in their nature, and however differently they came recommended by the character of those who framed them. The House had now got to this—that it reckoned complaint sufficient to excite suspicion against the person who preferred it, and thought it enough to throw discredit on a man's word or oath, if he was found coming forward to state his grievances. "You are a Petitioner," was the language of gentlemen opposite, "therefore you cannot be believed; you complain of oppression and hardship, therefore you must be an impostor." Was the House thus to turn a deaf ear to the Petitions of the people? How could it support its own consistency, or show any regard to its professions? As often as it was approached with Petitions for Reform, as often as the Petitioners presumed to say to it, "You do not represent the people; you neither attend to their wants, or allow them to enjoy their rights;" it answered pharisaically, (he could not use another phrase), "we are the real representatives of the people: we deliberate for their advantage, we consult their wishes, we throw the door wide open to Petitions." But what was the use of this bare abstract right of petitioning; what did it signify whether the doors of the House were thrown wide open to applications or not, if the Petitions of the people produced no effect; if they were merely received and neglected; and if the Petitioners, when they complained of grievances, were to be told, your statements are false, they cannot be listened to; they do not even deserve inquiry into their allegations. This was not the manner in which the House of Commons should perform its duty to the people,—this was not the way in which it should fulfil its office of standing between them and the Government, hearing the representations and the prayers of the former with a willing and indulgent ear, and the defence of the latter with the most scrupulous jealousy—(Hear, hear!)—supporting the former and leaping against the latter, proving a shield of defence to the one, and resisting the encroachments and arbitrary designs of the other (Hear!) Mr. Brougham maintained, that the Suspension Act was resorted to by Ministers to preserve their places; they saw that their standing armies and their resistance to retrenchment placed them in jeopardy, and hence originated their cries about plots and conspiracies. A plot was necessary for their power; and they made one: they would maintain their places, though at the expense of the public liberties. If all inquiry was thus to be resisted—if a confidence in Ministers was always to be cherished by the House—and if, after such conduct, Members were to meet their constituents and be secure in their re-elections—then, he would say, it mattered little who were in office, or who out; it mattered little that the forms of the Constitution were preserved, when its substance was gone; when the first storm that rose would be the signal for surrendering it, and the nation was to enjoy its liberties at the good-will and pleasure of the Ministers. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. CANNING observed, that the Bill before the House was to prevent inquiry as tending to dangerous disclosures; and yet those who opposed it, arguing in a vicious circle, said, "Let us have inquiry, let us complete the trial of those who were by Parliament directed to be detained without trial, and then we will show you that the powers given you have been abused."—The House, however, had too much good sense to be thus misled, and would not now undo what last year it had so deliberately determined to do. No doubt, he said, every man who had been arrested would declare that he was the most innocent and injured of men, and that all was to be attributed to the spy Oliver: so it was with Mr. Ward, that renowned instigator of murder and rebellion; and so with the venerable and silver-haired Ogden, who had merely been cured of a rupture at the public expense. (Cheers.) This might be a very fit case to be brought before the Rupture Society, but to require upon it the decision of Parliament was such a daring attempt upon its credulity as would probably be never again attempted. (Cheers and laughter.) Mr. C. here noticed the assertions about Dewhurst, and alluded to those "respectable persons" who now denounced Oliver as having declared the necessity of reforming the State by physical force, and charged him with exciting riots in the Park. These "respectable Gentlemen," said Mr. Canning, never disclosed these proceedings till the conspirator became an informer. Such concealment was misprision of treason; and was it too much to attribute to these persons a wish to see the Government overturned, and that they were only prevented by dastardly cowardice from joining in the plot? (Continued cheers.) But the story about Oliver and the Park was a recent invention, and none but an idiot or a dolt could believe a word of it. (Much confusion; and Mr. Lambton rose.)—Mr. Canning continued, saying, of course he did not mean to apply the epithets of dolt and idiot to the Hon. Gentleman. All he meant was, he should consider himself as a dolt or an idiot if he gave the statement a moment's belief. (Hear, hear!) The private character of Oliver was doubtless of some importance; but in nine cases out of ten intelligence respecting conspiracies must come through polluted sources.—After making a variety of such remarks, Mr. Canning alluded to the proceedings of the reformers, and asked the Hon. Baronet (Sir F. Burdett) whether he could persuade any one man to believe, that as the whole nation were bent on Parliamentary Reform, Ministers had no other means of saving themselves than by inventing plots and fermenting conspiracies? Did the Honourable Baronet expect to persuade the House or himself, that Parliamentary Reform was a favourite measure with the people of England?—(Hear, hear, hear!)—Did he suppose that the great body of the nation cared one jot about his wild plans, and annual parliaments, and universal suffrage? Nay, could he reconcile to himself the justice or consistency of his plan of universal suffrage, as it was called? How could he excuse the omission of females, and of the insane, from the class of electors and representatives? Oh! calumniated females! Oh! calumniated insane!—(A loud laugh.)—Was it from any jealousy of the influence of female charms, from any dread of the wisdom of reasoning insanity?—(Loud laughter.)—Surely the Hon. Baronet should not be so fastidious as to reject the insane—(Shouts of laughter.)—For his part, he could not conceive that Hon. Baronet engaged in the discharge of any more appropriate duty, than presenting a Petition for Reform from the madhouse at Kensington—(Loud laughter.)—vouching for the respectful tenour of its language, and pledging himself for the constitutional justness of its argument (Repeated shouts of laughter.) But if this were consistent in the Hon. Baronet, what could be said of the Hon. and Learned Gentleman who had just sat down—of him, who in his heart laughed at all these schemes of Reform, and looked with the profoundest scorn on all who entertained them—of him who knew that every Petition on the subject came either from deluders or the deluded; yet under a pretence that he was a friend to something like a Reform, would every now and then present such Petitions, for the mere purpose of popularity? (Hear, hear!) Who were the best friends of the abused and deluded people; those who were always ringing in their ears that they had rights, or those who, while they told them of their rights, told them they had duties also?—(Hear!)—He would say to the real friends of the people—instruct, enlighten them, and then there would be no danger—(Hear, hear!)—But do not teach them to feel jealously at wealth, hatred at rank, and a general malignity at all superiority—(Hear!)—Hatred to government as government, to rank as rank, had been industriously inculcated, and the starving artisan was told by his mischievous seducer that all his distress arose from an imperfect representation in Parliament. If this assertion meant any thing, it must be this—that Parliament, as at present constituted, encouraged unnecessary wars; that unnecessary wars produced extravagant expenditure; that extravagant expenditure produced exorbitant taxation; and that exorbitant taxation produced overwhelming misery. Now, what was the inference of the Parliamentary Reformers? Was it that Parliament, more democratically constituted, would be less inclined to war? He would appeal to all history whether democratic states were not always the fondest of war? Look at Athens, look at Rome, look at the petty republics of Italy. The dangers that now threatened society sprung from a different source. It was not more idle in the time of imperial Rome to declaim about Brutus and Tarquin, than it was now to talk about servile parliaments or an usurping crown: (hear.) It would be the boast of the present Parliament, that although they had fallen on a time when the very ark of the Constitution trembled in its shrine, yet they had the happiness of seeing, through their means, the shrine again secure, the temple still firm and unimpaired. (Long and loud cheering.)

Mr. LAMBTON rose to ask an explanation as to the terms debt and idiot, so liberally applied by the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Canning.)

Mr. CANNING observed, that the words dropped from him unintentionally in the heat of the debate, and that he had no design of applying them in their common acceptation.

Mr. LAMBTON supposed so; indeed it was not of any consequence, except in one sense—and that was, a sort of fear that as the Right Hon. Gentleman had applied the same terms to the dear friends now united with him in office, the use of them might be a prelude to an intimate union between him and the Right Hon. Gentleman! (A laugh.) But he rose chiefly to say, that he would pledge himself for the respectability of the person who had given him the information respecting Oliver. He was a person not connected with any plot or conspiracy, but a mercantile gentleman of consideration. If the House would let him, he would pledge his honour to prove all he had asserted, unless the Right Hon. Gentleman should be disposed wantonly to depreciate his (Mr. Lambton's) honour and character, as he had already to-night cruelly sported with the disease and agony of an unfortunate Petitioner. (Hear, hear!)

Sir JOHN NEWPORT rose amid such vehement cries of question that not a word could be heard for some time, till the voice of the Speaker recalled the House to something like order. The Hon. Baronet then animadverted on those who were so anxious to pass the vote and decide without hearing.

Amidst loud cries of "Question, question!" Mr. BARTET rose, to enter his protest against the Bill. He hoped that the House would have honour and firmness enough to reject so infamous a measure.

The gallery was then cleared, and a division took place. The numbers were—In favour of the motion, 238—Against it, 65—Majority, 173.

The House then went into a Committee on the Bill, and afterwards adjourned at one o'clock.

Thursday, March 12.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM, &c.

Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from Leeds, which complained of the state of the representation, stating horror at the conduct of Ministers respecting the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and praying that the House would impeach them, and that they would enact a Parliamentary Reform.

A Petition was received from Hull, complaining of the Poor-rates, which stated that they had risen from 6,000*l.* to 31,000*l.* a-year.

Captain WALDEGRAVE presented a Petition from Newcastle-on-Tyne, praying for a Parliamentary Reform. Ordered to lie on the table.

A Petition was received from a town in Lancashire, praying for a repeal of the Corn Bill, and Parliamentary Reform. Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir R. HENON presented two Petitions from Kirton and Swinesherd, in Lincolnshire. They were villages, but the Petitions were respectably signed; one of them had the signature of the Clergyman. The Petitioners stated, that they had heard of the assertion that the emissaries of sedition had been very busy in that county; but they had not discovered the slightest traces of their attempts. The people in Lincolnshire were peaceable and loyal, and had heard of such insinuations with indignation.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LEATHER TAX.

Lord ALTHORP, after noticing the great number of Petitions before the House against the duties on Leather, and urging the distressed condition of all concerned in the trade, moved that leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal the additional duty on Leather.

Mr. VANSITTART denied that the Leather Trade was in a depressed state—on the contrary, he had reason to think it was flourishing. If this duty was repealed, others would come forward with complaints of another duty, and thus the most alarming attacks on the Revenue might be apprehended. The Noble Lord recommended as a compensation, the reduction of our establishments—(Much cheering from the Opposition.)—Sluiceways were abolished last year, and every practicable reduction had since been effected. The Noble Lord had moved a reduction in the army, which he had calculated rather too highly, at 180,000*l.* Now this would be no adequate compensation for 268,000*l.* yielded by the Leather-Tax. If this tax should be repealed, the House would be placed in a painful situation, between bankruptcy and disgrace on the one hand, and the Property-Tax on the other.

Mr. COWEN thought that the Right Hon. Gentleman must have felt much distrust in his own statements, since he had found it necessary to threaten the House with the Property-Tax. Great as his aversion was to the present tax, he could not vote for its repeal, if he thought the Property-Tax a necessary consequence. But not thinking so, he should vote against it.

Mr. BENSON contended, that the distress of the trade had been admitted even by the Right Hon. Gentleman. He was always ready to support Ministers in times of war and danger, but he should vote against this tax.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, the House would always feel anxious to afford relief to persons who complained of real distress; but they would watch with great jealousy the ground of giving relief from a reduction of taxation. He therefore moved that a Committee be appointed to inquire.

Mr. BROTHAM observed, that Gentlemen on the other side were exceedingly fond of referring to Committees petitions which required no examination; but they obstinately refused any reference, when examinations and inquiry were quite necessary. It was a tax on a necessary of life. Such a tax was a solecism—it was an arithmetical blunder. Those who employed labour paid it, and Government, the greatest employer of labour, paid the most of it.

The House divided, after some further debate—For Lord Althorp's motion, 94—For the amendment, 84—Majority, 10.

The motion for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the late tax was accordingly carried.

POOR LAWS.

Mr. STURGES BOURNE rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of the existing laws for the relief the poor. He intended to move for leave to bring in two Bills, the one to regulate parish-vestries, the other to amend the laws for the relief of the poor. The object of the former Bill would be, to effect a beneficial change in the present mode of administering the Poor Laws, by giving persons an influence in parish vestries in proportion to the sum which they were liable to pay by way of rate. It was proposed to enable parishes to appoint select vestries, consisting of the minister and officers of the parish for the time being, and a certain number of the inhabitant householders, who should have a controul over all local matters. And it was also proposed, that where such a select vestry should be appointed, appeals should not be made to a single Magistrate, but to two or more Justices of the Peace. The next object would be to enable parishes to appoint an extra overseer, with a salary. The next object would be to make better provision for setting children to work, where the parents were unable to support them. Another clause went to give effect to the existing laws, by providing employment for those who were out of work; and it was likewise proposed, to enable parish officers to recover the possession of tenements which might have been let to paupers, without being under the necessity of bringing an ejectment. The next provision was one of great importance, but which was not entirely new to the House. It had been proposed as a local measure last year, on a Petition from Birmingham, and was rejected on the ground that it was not intended to be made a general principle. The object was, to make the owners, and not the occupiers of houses under a certain rent, responsible for the payment of the Poor-rates. By adopting this plan, the expenditure of the parish money was more likely to be controlled; and Gentlemen stated last year, that if this principle were made a general one, they should have no objection to it. Another point was, that whereas the Act of Elizabeth gave power to the Magistrates in Sessions to make orders of maintenance on the relations of the poor; it was now proposed to give them the same powers out of Session. The next clause went to enable overseers, under the authority of Magistrates, to exercise a discrimination in affording relief, according to the character and behaviour of the parties. It empowered them, in certain cases, to lend small sums of money, and to accept the repayment by instalments. Another point which had been under the consideration of the Committee was, the case of persons who received pensions, and who frequently expended a quarter's allowance in two or three days, and then became chargeable to the parish. To prevent this evil, the Bill would contain a provision to enable the overseers to receive the pensions of such persons, and to pay them weekly instead of quarterly. There was one other point which deserved attention. It is well known that considerable difficulties often arose from the pauperism of persons who had no settlement in this country, but who were natives of Scotland or Ireland. The only way of sending them away, as the law now stood, was, by committing them as vagrants; but Magistrates did not like this mode of proceeding; and, therefore, it was now proposed to give them a pass to the nearest place, without committing them at all.—These were the general outlines of the Bills which he intended to submit to the House; and if leave were given, he should bring them in, and move to have them printed, in order that they might be circulated in the country, and enable gentlemen to come to a discussion of the subject with a full knowledge of the several clauses and provisions. The Hon. Gentleman concluded with moving for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate parish vestries.

After a few words from Mr. NICHOLAS CALVERT, respecting the payment of wages to the labouring poor,

Mr. S. BOURNE begged to observe, that this was a point which deserved serious attention. Men were hired at so low a rate, that they became chargeable to the parish for nearly the whole of their support, and those who derived no benefit from their labour were obliged to contribute in nearly as large an amount as those by whom they were employed. In one parish in Suffolk, the price of labour was reduced to six-pence a-day:—(hear, hear!)—so that the honest and industrious labourer was driven to resort to that relief which, if properly paid, it would be his pride to avoid:—(hear, hear!) This evil originated from the worst of motives, and pressed most heavily on the rest of the parishioners.

Mr. S. BOURNE then moved, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the laws for the relief of the poor.—Leave was given.

INDEMNITY BILL.

The House then went into a Committee on the Indemnity Bill. The Bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.—Adjourned.

Friday, March 13.

BEER.

The debate on this subject being resumed, Mr. CALVERT said, he was prepared to refute all that had been urged in the Petition against the London Brewers, if the House would refer it to a Committee.—After some conversation, the Petition was so referred.

OPPRESSION UNDER THE SUSPENSION BILL.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY presented a Petition from Robert Swinton, in the town of Chester, complaining of harsh and cruel treatment, under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. The Hon. Member said, he had alluded the other night to the case of this individual, for the purpose of affording Ministers an opportunity of contradicting the statements. No explanation, however, was given, and perhaps that Petition was destined, at some future period, to furnish topics of merriment, in order to relieve some future debate.—The Petition was ordered to be laid on the table, and to be printed.

INDEMNITY BILL.

On the motion for the 3d reading of this Bill, another debate ensued, when various amendments were proposed by the Opposition and rejected.

Sir R. HERON and Mr. P. MOORE strongly condemned the measure.

Mr. W. SMITH asked whether persons guilty of cruelty could be indicted?

Lord CASTLEREAGH apprehended, that if inhumanity or excessive rigour were proved, the Judge would state that the author was responsible.

Mr. LYTTLETON declared, that the whole series of these transactions was one of the most impertinent and mischievous farces that had ever been practiced on the country: (hear, hear!)

After much discussion on the preamble of the Bill, and after several amendments had been proposed and negatived,

Mr. BROUGHAM expressed his opinion finally on the Bill: he stated that his friends had not had their objections to it removed one tittle by any thing that had been done upon it, and he entered his protest once for all against the measure.

Mr. TIERNEY said he had intended to have said something on the Bill, but feeling how useless it was to urge any observations, especially when he considered the excellent general reasoning of his learned friends near him, he forbore to press any thing on their attention. He should only say, that in every point of view he believed the Bill to be one of the most detestable measures ever introduced to Parliament: (hear, hear.)

After a few observations from Mr. W. WYNN in favour of the measure, the Bill was passed without a division.—Adjourned till Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MARCH 15.

THOUGH some of the persons who have been confined under the Suspension Law may have exaggerated their sufferings, this is apparent to all, that a number of Englishmen,—whose houses it has been usual to call their castles,—have been dragged from their business and families, enveloped in irons like murderers, pent up in cells and dungeons for months, and at last dismissed without hearing and without redress. Can tyranny now-a-days well go further? A Bill of Indemnity, to protect those concerned in these atrocities from making any legal atonement—(for recollect, it must be by the verdict of a jury that redress could be obtained)—is now to be hurried through the House of Commons,—that House, which should be the especial protectors of the people, and not their especial scourge. It is in vain that the voice of the Nation is raised against this most unjust and oppressive proceeding. What does a Boroughmongering Majority, who hold their seats in contempt of the Nation, care for the general voice? They possess the power to do wrong, and their will is their law. What a mockery, to call men Representatives of the People, who allow of their being treated like ruffians of the vilest class,—who suffer them to be torn from their necessary avocations, from their wives and children—to be chained together like wild beasts, to be dragged from prison to prison, to be immured in unwholesome dungeons, with or without manacles, according to the humanity or inhumanity of their keepers,—and after being thus harassed for months, some injured in health, others ruined in business, and all great sufferers in one way or other, to be suddenly dismissed, without hearing and without redress!—Representatives of the People indeed! No; it is quite enough that the people have the misfortune to be governed by the Oligarchists; the disgrace of chusing them for their rulers is not theirs: they are weak, defenceless, oppressed; but they are not such drivellers as to be the willing instruments of their oppressors.

No language can express our entire disgust at this shameful measure of indemnity, which goes at once to level all distinctions of right and wrong.—Its meanness and its wickedness are alike enormous, and we should be ashamed of ourselves if we forbore to speak out on such an occasion. It is indeed time to "cry aloud and spare not." Every man who votes for this Bill of Indemnity merits at least the same treatment which it sanctions. As they judge, so should they be judged. What should prevent the ATTORNEY-GENERAL from being dragged from his home and carted from town to town? Why should not Mr. BRAGGE BATHURST be fastened to a felon, and sent from prison to prison? Is there any just reason why Mr. CANNING, who makes brutal jokes about a ruptured prisoner, for which he is cheered by the Honourable House, should not be taken handcuffed from Gloucester Lodge and forwarded to Gloucester Jail? or why my Lord Cass-

TLEREAGH's limbs should not be loaded with the same irons which have weighed down worthier men, both here and in Ireland?—We ask, in the name of Justice, why not? Have the poor no feelings, no interests, no rights, that they alone should thus be treated? "Have they not hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Are they not fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer," as rich men are?

Will not even these doings convince those that are left of the Whigs, that there is no alternative between a reformed House and an enslaved nation? They talk loudly of the iniquity of this Indemnity Bill, they speak truly of its hateful enactments, and complain most justly of that overwhelming Parliamentary Majority which silently carries all before it. But not a word do they utter about the only remedy which can possibly prevent this same Majority from inflicting still deadlier wounds on the Constitution, if that be possible. What has produced this Ministerial Majority, but the corrupt state of the Representation? and while that remains unreformed, so long will the same vital disease produce the same noxious results.

Nothing further has transpired respecting the alledged attempt on the Duke of WELLINGTON, unless we are to look upon the explosion of a sentinel's musket as a commentary upon it. It is believed that this man's firing was a trick to get rewarded, on pretence of having shot at another assassin; but it is believed also by some, that one explosion was as good as the other. The French papers say little about the matter, and the Dutch are very mysterious. The Austrian Observer, after great praise of his Grace, asks, whether it is "wished to attack in his person the cause which he defends;" and adds, that if so, "hundreds of thousands would rise and maintain the cause of all." Perhaps they would; but the cause of all would not be the cause of mere imitators of usurpation, of seizers of Poland and Lombardy, of Anti-American conspirators, of promise-breaking despots,—in short, of the few. But the Austrian Court seems to use this sort of language occasionally, out of a kind of fright of appearing to patronize the family of BONAPARTE.

The Courier suspects that Spain and the United States will soon go to war; and a suspicion so openly expressed by the government journal looks very like a knowledge of the fact. We should wonder at it nevertheless, poor creature as we think FERDINAND the Embroiderer; for what better method could he possibly take of losing all his American possessions, South as well as North? But for Heaven's sake let him draw out his scissors, if he will.

The violence of the winds of late has made a great impression on the Continent as well as in England: awful presages from the Poets are quoted; subterraneous explosions heard, or thought to be heard; and anticipations made of disasters "new hatched to the woeful time." These terrors, as we observed before respecting the spots in the sun, are natural to all times, but particularly to periods of political convulsion. On the night when CROMWELL died, there was a tremendous storm, and the same supernatural ideas were connected with it. Some thought it a compliment of the elements to CROMWELL, and a natural accompaniment to the ascent of his "great spirit" to heaven;—others believed that it was the devil come to take him below. What makes people look the more about them on these occasions is a venerable personage, who contrives to be in almost every town and village at once, and is known by the name of "the oldest inhabitant in the place." This ancient (which is, to be sure, very odd in so old a man) always has a memory which cannot recollect so dreadful a season; and so people take it for granted that "there never was such a thing," though perhaps with a little exercise of their younger memories, they might recollect a worse. We do not say that the earth is not undergoing some commotion, or may not undergo more; especially as the needle has been returning towards the pole; but that alteration, in particular, has a promising aspect, if we are to judge by the more warm and genial times which accompanied its greater rectitude; and these appearances of things have, at all events, happened over and over again. We wish the political world were half as good and secure as the physical.

We ought to mention in a conspicuous part of our Paper, that the further and very proper reprieve of the lads KELLY and SPICER is said to have been owing to the particular intercession of the Duke of CUMBERLAND.

The Paris Papers of Thursday and Wednesday arrived yesterday morning.—The conferences between the Duke of WELLINGTON, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Foreign Ambassadors resident at Paris, are frequent. A slight indisposition prevented his Grace from being at the King's levee last Monday. It is said that he will quit Paris on the 26th, and proceed first to Cambrai, from whence he will repair to London, before he goes to the Congress, which, it is said, will be opened on the 1st of August.

"The rumours as to the cause or motive of the attempted assassination of the Duke of WELLINGTON are by no means favourable to an opinion of his Grace's continency; but though the rumour is general amongst the English, who have any correspondence with Belgium, we attach no importance to it at present."—Sun.

On the 6th inst. Mr. ST. The people here are petitioning for reform by twenties. It is likely this plan will be generally adopted, and long followed: it combines many advantages; it enables the petitioners to dispense with large meetings, long harangues, and violent resolutions. It makes it much more difficult to deceive the nation with hired spies and informers, green bags, and secret committees; and it will show the Legislature the serious wish of the people, calmly, unequivocally, and individually expressed.—Glasgow Chronicle.

We have been this morning informed that the murderers of Mr. BIRD, and his female servant, at Greenwich, have been found to be three Gentlemen's servants in the neighbourhood, all of whom are in custody; they have been examined before the Magistrates, and one of them has turned King's evidence. The watches and property stolen have been discovered. They have been committed to Maidstone Gaol for trial at the ensuing Assizes.—Sun-Saturday.

HIS DEPARTED LOVE TO PRINCE LEOPOLD.

SET TO MUSIC BY VINCENT NOVELLO.

(A female voice is heard, issuing forth softly and tenderly.)

My widowed Love!

(Recitative of another voice, a man's.)

Hark, princely mourner! 'tis the voice of her
You loved on earth, that with her favourite strings
Comes mingling thus, like smiling dreams that stir
The lips of day-sweet Patience. Hark! She sings!

(The voice returns.)

Look up, look up, and weep not so,

My Leopold! My love!

Thou touchest me with such a woe,

As should not be above.

Pray be, as thou wast all along,

Affectionate and sweet, but strong.

I know, dear love, thou canst not see

The face that looks on thine;

Thou canst not touch or come to me,

But all this power is mine;

And I can touch that bosom still;

And now I do so, by that thrill!

The night I passed thee from my clay,

And kissed thy brow's despair,

I met upon my moonlight way

A hundred spirits fair,—

A hundred brides, who all, like me,

Died in that first sweet agony.

And we inhabit wondrous bowers,

Which though they cannot fade,

Have sympathy with the sweet powers

Of those our smiles obeyed;

For as on earth ye spread delight,

The leaves are thick and flowers grow bright.

Then turn thee to thy wonted will,

Dry thine and others tears;

And we will build our palace still,

With tops above the spheres;

And when thou too art fancied dead,

There, there shall be our bridal bed.

From a mere glimpse into the work, we hail with pleasure the complete appearance of Mr. CARY's Translation of Dante, and hope shortly to say something further upon it.

A MONSTER.—On Thursday night, a young Lady, named MATHILDA EMERY, was walking along Piccadilly, on her way home, when a man with the appearance of a Gentleman, accosted her with—"How do you do my dear?" she walked on without making any reply; he continued to follow her, and a second time addressed her—"How are you, love?" and pushed against her very violently, which caused her to reel some distance, and before she could recover herself, the villain ran a sharp instrument into her side; she screamed very loud, and fell on the ground; he ran off the moment he had perpetrated the diabolical act. Her exclamation of "Oh! I'm stabbed," brought several persons to her assistance, and they pursued him; but he had gained too great a distance to be overtaken. The female was assisted to St. George's Hospital. The surgeons examined the wound; none of the vitals were injured, but the wound is considered dangerous.—Daily Papers.

The Duke of CAMBRIDGE will be married early in April, at Cassel, and is expected to arrive in this country, with his bride, before the end of the month. Numerous workmen are constantly employed in the necessary decorations and repairs.—Herald.

Mr. WATMAN's friends met on Thursday, when resolutions were entered into and plans adopted for bringing him into Parliament. It is needless to say, that Mr. WATMAN has been one of the most consistent and earnest advocates for Reform that the City ever produced. His public conduct is before the Livery—and so is that of CURTIS, SHAW, and ATKINS. Let them reflect and choose accordingly.

COVENT-GARDEN.

ANOTHER Play founded upon a new and popular novel was produced here last Monday, called Rob Roy Macgregor, or Auld Lang Syne. We need not detail the plot, which, together with the better parts of the dialogue, is to be found in that work. It is sufficient to mention, that Rob Roy was the Scottish Robin Hood, though with more uncomfortable features about his history, than that "gentlest of thieves," and an air altogether not so sylvan and romantic. ROBIN was the very ALFRED of banditti; and had a finer principle in his lawlessness, than the inferior robbers who have generally ruled mankind have had in their legitimacy. His segregation of himself and fellows, was rather a departure from a worse state of society, than from a truly lawful one; and he went upon two grounds, at least, diametrically opposite to two of the worst in ordinary communities; which were,—the love of nature,—and the taxation of the rich for the sake of the poor. His memory is a standing defiance to sophistications. He had more right to fleece the super-abundant than they had to drain the poor; and at least as much right to hunt fat Abbots, as fat Abbots the deer. He was a sort of bird among men; free, healthy, leisurely, active, carolling with his plumed elegance in "the green-wood shade."*

The piece at Covent-garden is not well done, as far as the manufacturer is concerned. It is ill put together, and falls off every act. Yet the workman has not only fully availed himself of the original, but compiled the vocal part out of BURNS, WORDSWORTH, and even Mr. LEE LEWIS. It was curious to hear WORDSWORTH on the stage. It seemed a great though strange triumph for his eremitical genius. There is something very striking and self-possessed in the air of one of the verses:—

And while Rob Roy is free to rove
In summer's heat and winter's snow,
The eagle he is lord above,
And Rob is lord below.

These compilations and the story itself cannot fail of giving an interest to the drama; and it is not uninteresting, nor unlikely to succeed. The songs too are set to popular Scotch airs, among which we recognised Roy's Wife, Duncan Gray, the White Cockade, the Lass of Patie's Mill, and the delightful one of Auld Lang Syne; though indeed there is hardly a Scotch air that is not beautiful. It is a pity however, we think, that the Adieu sung by Miss STEPHENS was not written for the divine air of Lochaber, which would have exactly suited the sentiment.

Miss STEPHENS did not seem to us to be at her best on

* We are happy, by the way, to inform our readers, that ROBIN is the hero of a work which has been taken in hand by a friend of ours, quite able, both from the sylvan turn of his genius and from an amiable philosophy, to do him justice.

Thursday night. Her voice was as clear and sweet as usual; but she appeared unusually careless; and the honour of her best performance was shared by SINCLAIR in a duet, made by harmonizing the air of Roy's Wife to a very slow movement. It held the house in attentive silence, and was like a couple of flutes.

There are a multitude of actors in the piece, but little need of criticism! LISTON performs the part of old Jarvie, the Baillie of Glasgow; and with proper allowance for his sometimes speaking English, sometimes Scotch, and sometimes neither one nor the other, he does it very well and anciently, and varies the old joke of a cant phrase with great effect. "My conscience!" is the present successor to "Prodigious!" The part of Rob Roy is performed very well also by MACREADY,—an actor of whom we ought to have taken notice in the Slave. He appeared to us then much too loud and declamatory, though he had some good elements in him, especially in touches of feeling. He has lessened his faults, we think, and increased his merits, and by study may do a great deal more. His voice is uncommonly fine,—full, clear, soft, and powerful.

The eagerness with which the Managers of the theatres pounce upon a new work of any popularity in order to turn it to account, is a striking instance of the dearth of dramatic talent. However it is at least a proof that they are aware of the deficiency, and willing to mend it. But will none of all the literary men of the day help to get society and manners out of their monotony, and revive the drama? To write a play now-a-days,—to set the comic or tragic muse fairly up again,—is a task so tempting, we should think, to any one's ambition, that one is almost provoked to exclaim like old Absolute in the play,—"I'll marry the girl myself!"

FINE ARTS.

THE ARTS AT PLYMOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I am anxious to rectify a mistake into which your Correspondent, Mr. HAYDON, appears to have been led, in announcing the intended erection of a Building at Plymouth, designed exclusively for an Academy of Art. It is not because I should object to such an Establishment as Mr. HAYDON describes, that I step forward to correct his erroneous impression of the objects of the intended Building; such an Academy was indeed contemplated at Plymouth about three years ago, but the times were unfavourable, and difficulties presented themselves, which appeared to render the scheme (however well designed and zealously supported by a few individuals) impracticable. The effort was not however entirely abortive—an Exhibition of Pictures in the autumn of 1815 was the result. This Exhibition consisted not only of the works of living Artists, but included also many fine Pictures of the old Masters, lent for this purpose by Gentlemen of Plymouth and its vicinity. Among the contributors to this Exhibition, the Earl of Morley's name appears as the proprietor of four Pictures, sent from his seat of Saltram. The attempt was attended with all the success which so laudable an undertaking merited; it did not fail to attract a very general attention, and excite the emulation of resident Artists. This Exhibition was followed by a second in 1816, and a third last year, which were attended with similar success; so that the Exhibition of Pictures at Plymouth may be considered as annual.

I may perhaps be permitted to remark here, that, through the liberality of the Earl of Mulgrave, the second Exhibition contained an early Picture, painted by your Correspondent, Mr. HAYDON, which does him great honour. These Exhibitions all took place in a hired room, very ill adapted to such a purpose; and it has long been held in contemplation to erect a Building more suitable to the object and more worthy of the Arts. This desideratum is on the point of being realized. The proposed Building is intended for the joint purposes of the Plymouth Institution (the Sessions of which take place in the winter months, where Lectures are delivered by its Members once a week on the Arts, Sciences, and general Literature), and for the Annual Exhibition of Pictures. However honourable it would be to Plymouth to step forward boldly, and open a Provincial Academy of Art, such a design is not contemplated at present. I trust however the day is not far distant when it may be revived with better prospects.

The design of the intended Edifice is very honourable to the talents of Mr. FOULSTON, the Architect;—it will be a Doric Building in the purest Greek taste, and worthy of the object to which it is destined.—I am happy also to confirm Mr. HAYDON's report, that the money for the purpose is all subscribed. N.

[The Communication on this subject to Mr. HAYDON expressly stated, that an Academy was to be founded at Plymouth.—Examiner.]

CRIMINAL LAWS.

To Sir S. Romilly, Mr. Bannet, and the rest of the Members of the House of Commons, who have contributed to the amelioration of our Criminal Laws.

GENTLEMEN,—The public spirited and most intelligent portion of your countrymen keep a steady and diligent eye on your Parliamentary exertions. While by this they enlarge their information on affairs of high public concern, and are gratified with the contrast you present to the selfishness and sophistications of those who, in fondly looking towards the Treasury, whom they represent, turn their backs upon the people, whom they ought to represent, they often derive to their minds, fevered with honest indignation at the servility of your adversaries, refreshment from the streams of public good flowing from your exertions and eloquence.

The object of this address, Gentlemen, is humbly to assist with a few hints in directing one of these streams along a particular district that is much in want of its fertilising power, notwithstanding what you have already effected. In so beneficial an undertaking, the idea of affording even a feeble helping hand is gratifying. It is therefore with an enlarged pleasure that your fellow countrymen observed Sir Samuel Romilly on Wednesday week last, entering into this express subject, the recent state of the administration of justice, and obtaining leave to bring in a Bill to remove enactments which took away the benefit of clergy from persons tried for stealing in dwelling-houses. They were much pleased with his, and Mr. T. Smith's recognition of "the strong feeling among the British People against the punishment of death for the crime of forgery, of the recent shocking and inischievous examples of it, of the suspension of the sentence against the two boys, and of the horrid exhibition at the interment of Hatch."

They see in these wise and feeling movements of the philanthropic few in Parliament, a promise of their being the means of further ameliorating the practice of our inadequate and cruel criminal administration, and have a bright hope, that with such polar stars of integrity and truth, the deeply injured people, demanding Reform in the fountain-head of their laws, will, in its eventual attainment, consummate their highest political wishes, and convey the shattered bark of the State from the turbid ocean of evil on which it is now tost. I observed, Gentlemen, in the debate above alluded to, that Sir Samuel Romilly animatedly urged three of the reasons advanced in my last Letter; the inadequacy of the present punishments, their encouragement of crime and cruelty, their immense disproportion to the offences. There is another, and I think the most solemn, the want of comfort and instruction among the lower classes. I say this, notwithstanding the immense sums expended for the poor, and the encreased education that has been extended to them, on the judicious system of Messrs. Bell and Lancaster. Having introduced myself to your enlightened attention, I shall, Gentlemen, in my next, proceed to submit to it the particular arguments that have induced these several opinions in the minds of so many others, as well as of yours, very respectfully, AN ENGLISH CITIZEN.

THE NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH.

THE DOCTRINES OF THE NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH WHOLLY UNCONNECTED WITH THE CONDUCT OF HATCH, THE MURDERER.

Camden Town, March 2, 1818.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—In your Paper of yesterday (p. 138), when making some remarks respecting Hatch, the murderer, you insinuate that his atrocious conduct might have been in some measure the result of the doctrines he had been accustomed to hear at the New Jerusalem Chapel in Lislestreet. The surprise which this insinuation excited in some of your readers, was extreme; and, with respect to myself, was enhanced by the recollection, that I had formerly read in your Paper some remarks, under the signature, I think, of W. H., in which the purity and grandeur of sentiment that pervade the writings of Swedenborg, were spoken of in terms of admiration. Is then the insinuation alluded to, to be attributed to your not being aware, that those once-commended sentiments are those which are maintained by the members of the New Jerusalem Church, and preached at the above-named chapel? Or are we to conclude, that you have forgotten the remarks of your correspondent, and are yourself wholly unacquainted with the subject? In either case, as a misrepresentation has gone forth, it is but just that it should be corrected. Permit me, therefore, to say, that it is impossible for you or any man to regard as more mischievous than we do, "the notions" that are sometimes "inculcated, about the rottenness of works and the importance of a saving faith;"—when such faith is supposed capable of existence independently of charity and a life of usefulness. According to the doctrines of the New Jerusalem Church, charity and faith are regarded as the two essentials of religion,—charity being considered as holding the first place, and faith the second; and they teach further, that neither charity nor faith have any real existence in the mind, unless they become operative, when opportunity is afforded, in good works. Where such sentiments are cherished in the heart, how can the hands be guilty of acts of enormity?

Allow me to observe further, that the disgust you express at the sentiments contained in the last letter of the wretched assassin, is also felt, quite as deeply, by the members of the New Jerusalem Church. The mention of sacred names and things, in connection with deeds so atrocious, is regarded by them as horrible in the extreme. Indeed that hideous composition in general exhibits, in their estimation, a striking picture of the false persuasions which spring, as naturally as a stream from its fountain, from such diabolical lusts as its author had cherished in his breast; which, when once they are permitted to reign without controul, soon blind and subjugate the intellectual faculty, and compel it to find reasons to excuse and justify the most outrageous acts of violence and cruelty.

But it is needless to trespass much further on your pafience, as a pamphlet will have been published, before this can meet the eye of your readers, in which the doctrines of the New Jerusalem Church are explicitly stated, and the history of the wretched culprit, so far as is connected with his flagitious deeds, is correctly detailed. It will there be seen, that he had only intruded himself for a year or two past, into the congregation meeting at the Chapel in Lisle-street, for the purpose of prosecuting his design on his deluded victim, who had long been a regular attendant. But had even his attendance been of longer duration, and commenced under less questionable circumstances, where would be the justice of censuring the religious sentiments he exteriorly professed, merely because they were flagrantly violated by his conduct? Would it not be just as reasonable to impute the atrocities of Nero to the lessons of Seneca, or to libel the great author of Christianity because one of his disciples was a Judas?

Permit me to conclude with a general remark. Many extravagant misrepresentations have been long in circulation respecting Swedenborg and his writings, which, though they must have been originally invented by malignity, are frequently propagated by well-meaning ignorance. The prejudices thus infused into the minds of the majority are very strong, yet the cases are numerous in which they have been compelled to yield to the force of truth that reigns in the pages of this author;—of which the individual who now addresses you affords one instance among many. Let, then, those who have too much probity wilfully to deal in misplaced ridicule, or to disseminate unfounded calumny, read before they judge;—and they who have already made the experiment can entertain no apprehensions as to the general result.—I am, Sir, your's respectfully,

AN ADMIRER OF THE DOCTRINES OF THE NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH.

CHARGE against the REV. WEEDEN BUTLER.

The Post-Office is at its dirty work again. The other day it deprived a respectable tradesman in Wardour-street of his office as receiver of letters, because, as a newsman, he sold reform publications; and now again, it has done the same thing by another respectable man in Sloane-street, Mr. Rogers, for aiding in forwarding to Parliament Petitions in favour of Reform, and the redress of national grievances. This petty conduct of the Post-Office is worthless enough; but what terms are to be used to mark that of the person who has been the chief cause of this wretched interference? Mr. Rogers, in his Petitions to Parliament, avers that "the Rev. Weedon Butler, alternate Preacher at Brompton Chapel, and at Charlotte Chapel, Buckingham-gate, expressly told him (Mr. Rogers), that he knew many of his customers, and would do all in his power to deprive him of them; and that the Post-Office should be taken away from a Jacobin like him."

The Reverend Gentleman, it should seem, made no idle threat, but, like his worthy brother informer, Mr. Oliver, took care to see it duly executed; and the consequence has been, that so far as he could deprive an honest man and his family of six or seven young children (that, we believe, is the number) of their means of existence, he has succeeded.—This Reverend Divine doubtless chuses to maintain his own political opinions, whatever they may be, but he will not allow in another that which he is determined to enjoy himself. This is his toleration and his sense of justice! "Love one another," may have been his frequent text; and his practical comment upon it is, to denounce his neighbour, to call him opprobrious names, to aid in depriving him and his little children of bread! This is his meekness and his charity!

Taking these statements of Mr. Rogers as true (and we see no sort of reason for doubting their truth), no language that we can use can express our disgust at this Reverend Person's conduct. Mr. Butler may possibly imagine that by such doings he may recommend himself to those who have the good things of this world in their gift: he may dream of comfortable rectories or snug deaneries, and believe he has discovered a brief road to them.—a sort of short-cut,—by these political manoeuvres. Be this as it may, we know what considerate and just people must think of such conduct; and whatever other nuisances may prevail in the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, the greatest of all, in our opinion, is that of a vulgar, and violent, and persecuting Priest.

PITT v. HUSKISSON, &c.

MR. EXAMINER,—I was much pleased with your short observations upon the report of the trial of Alexander Milne and others for a conspiracy. I was present during part of the trial, and was very much surprised to see the cause treated in a way which I had always been given to understand was not such as could be allowed by the Court on a criminal prosecution. I shall therefore feel particularly obliged by your allowing the following queries to appear in your paper, in order that some of your legal leaders may furnish answers which may remove the new impression upon my mind, as to what is allowed to be proved by a Defendant in such cases:—

Can the Defendants attempt to prove a justification by cross-examination of witnesses or otherwise, upon being tried under an indictment for a conspiracy.

Can the Defendants set up, as a justification, a circumstance which occurred 12 months after the conspiracy for which they are tried?

If an acquittal takes place under such circumstance, and it be shewn by affidavits, will the Court grant a new trial?

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Thursday Robert Hill was brought up under the following mysterious circumstances:—A watchman in Moorfields, about half-past two o'clock on Tuesday morning, heard groans issuing from an old stable. The door was fastened on the inside, and, after a lapse of a few minutes, it was opened by the prisoner, who appeared much intoxicated. By the light of his lantern he saw a man on the ground, weltering in blood, which was flowing from several wounds in his head and body. The watchman interrogated the prisoner as to the cause of the dreadful spectacle, but he seemed too drunk to give any explanation. In about a quarter of an hour, however, he became sufficiently sober to assist in carrying the wounded man to a house, where medical aid was procured. On examining the body, it was discovered that three of the ribs and the jaw of the unfortunate man were broken, and several severe wounds, inflicted apparently by some heavy blunt instrument, appeared in various parts. A day and night elapsed, when the man appearing to get worse, the prisoner was apprehended. Hill gave the following account of the transaction:—On Monday night, himself and the wounded man, whose name was Davis, and with whom he had been intimate many years, went to a public-house, where they got very tipsy. They came out about twelve, and parted. Hill having the key of an old stable, went there, and lay down upon some straw. He had been there but a short time, when Davis knocked at the door, and he let him in. The latter, who appeared to be very ill, said he had been knocked down, beaten, and robbed by three men.—Hill persuaded him to lie down, and soon went to sleep himself. He heard nothing more until he was awake by the watchman.—The LORD MAYOR observed, that the whole affair was inexplicable, and although there was no evidence which went directly to criminate the prisoner, he must be detained until further inquiry should be made.

HATTON-GARDEN.

On Saturday week, T. Dawson, C. Goodwill, S. Renton, and T. Bollen, were charged with mixing poison in some porter, and giving it to Sarah Morgan, Sarah Woodham, Betsey Fox, Jane Griffiths, and Jane Tucker.—Mr. Riley stated, that he was the landlord of the Greyhound public-house, Henrietta-street, Brunswick-square, and also a brush-manufacturer; that the young women worked for him in an adjoining Mews; that the two first prisoners were gentlemen's servants, and the others journeymen brush-makers, working in the same place. One of the two first-named came to his house for the beer, which he drew out into a clean pot, and Renton carried it to the women. They then returned and took some refreshment; but before they had been long there, he heard that the girls were in the agonies of death. He went and found one of them in convulsions, another speechless, and three in excessive pain. Dr. Darling, and afterwards three other medical men, were called in, who all agreed that they were labouring under the effects of some deadly poison. He caused the prisoners to be taken into custody.—Renton said, he drank of the beer before he gave it to the women, and found himself so affected as to be unable to work.—A Gentleman, who was present at their apprehension, said he heard Renton say to his companion, "Tush—not a word—keep close and they can do nothing."—The Magistrate remanded them until the Doctors made their report. In the evening Mr. Riley and the Surgeon attended, and Mr. R. said the women were better. The Surgeon was of opinion that some violent stimulant had been infused into the beer, and that Betsey Fox and Jane Griffiths were still in great danger.

On Monday the prisoners were again brought up and witnesses examined.—Sarah Battie deposed, that she was at work in the manufactory when Dawson brought in the beer. He handed it first to Mary Ann Woodham and witness, who refused it, but the five girls drank. Sarah Woodham threw the dregs on the ground, and then on looking into the pot, they observed things which looked like seeds. Witness refused to drink, because she suspected something, as she had never seen beer brought to them before. Witness saw Renton, but she did not see Dawson offer him any beer, or drink any himself.—Mr. Riley, in addition to his former information, stated, that he had passed through the workshop directly after the beer had been drunk, but he neither observed that the girls were ill, or that there was any thing in the pot, which however he did not closely examine.—Dawson said, beer had been brought to the girls several times before.—The prisoners were remanded.

On Wednesday a final examination took place. The evidence of the women and landlord produced nothing new in addition to their former examinations. A man of the name of Patrick McKee, who was in the public-house, heard Renton make use of some suspicious words to Dawson, when they were going to be taken into custody. Being brought forward, and sworn, he said, "I heard Renton say to Dawson, 'be staunch, and say nothing about it.' Dawson answered, 'to be sure, as no one knows any thing about it.' The words made a strong impression on my mind; the servants were not present at the time; I am positive those words were what they made use of."—The Magistrates, after consulting together for some time, were of opinion that the charge of a malicious or felonious intention was not proved against any of the prisoners, and as on analysing the substance which Betsey Fox had vomited, nothing of a poisonous nature was discovered, it could not be clearly ascertained that it was poison that was administered to them: those circumstances, connected with Doctor Darling's certificate, declaring Betsey Fox out of danger, which had been delivered in, induced them to take bail for the prisoners, themselves in 50*l.* each, and the sureties in 25*l.* each.

UNION-HALL.

Robert Loft, a hackney-coachman, and Robert Holford, were charged by Mrs. Caroline Jones, of Artillery-street, St. George's, with assaulting, and otherwise ill using her.—Mrs. Jones stated, that on Monday night last she was going along Blackfriars-road, when defendant Loft invited her to ride in his coach, saying at the same time that he was going to drive the same way that she was walking; she consented, and entered the coach; a few minutes afterwards he stopped, and admitted the other defendant, Holford, into the vehicle. He had not been there many minutes before he commenced an attack upon her, attended with circumstances of indecency which delicacy forbade her to detail to the magistrate. He did not succeed in his attempt. She screamed violently, but the more she screamed the more furiously Loft drove on his horses. He at length stopped at the Marsh-turnpike-gate, when Holford alighted, and made his escape, and Loft struck her several blows on the head.—Ordered to find sureties for their appearance at the Quarter Sessions to answer the charge.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Charles Finney, the person charged with having entrapped Kelly and Spicer into the crime of uttering forged notes, is in custody. Mr. Parsons apprehended him near Shrewsbury: he was brought to London, where he arrived on Wednesday week, and was lodged in the House of Correction. While in the custody of Mr. Parsons, he said, "I am determined to blow Limbrick. It was all his doing. I was brought into it by him; he told me he knew I was concerned with Kelly and Spicer in passing forged notes, and if I did not get him those two, he would hang us all three. I told him he could not hurt me, as he could not prove I had ever passed one. To which he replied, 'Oh, don't that, there are people who will swear any thing.'—He also admitted to Mr. Parsons that he got the notes for the boys to pass, and said, "I had them from a man who brings up a thousand at a time; he has married the daughter of the man that makes them, and he has a brother who was transported for the same thing." And Finney likewise said, that Limbrick told him Mr. Westwood wanted him, and if he did not go out of the way, he would surely be taken and hanged.—The Hon. H. G. Bennet and Mr. Alderman Wood went to the House of Correction, and had a long examination of Finney, in which he stated to the same effect as he had done to Mr. Parsons; but he persisted that Kelly and Spicer had been engaged in smashing notes before he was concerned with them, and mentioned some particulars, which induced these gentlemen to go to Newgate, and question the lady, who, however, still persist in their former story.—On Friday, Finney was taken to Marlborough-street Office, and examined, but nothing was suffered to transpire.

DIED THROUGH WANT.—On Monday last, in Stainland, aged 78, James Rainsley. His death was awfully sudden;—after eating a crust of bread, and drinking a little balm tea for breakfast, he felt himself rather poorly, and in attempting to go to the door, he fell across the threshold, and expired immediately. A few months ago he summoned the overseers of Deanhead to appear before the Magistrates of Huddersfield, in order to get parochial relief; the overseer said he would give Rainsley 1*s.* 6*d.* per week, if he chose to accept of it; if not, he would find him work in a woollen-mill, in Deanhead. He was to be in the mill at seven in the morning, and not leave it before eight, or sometimes nine in the evening. The dread of going to work in the mill at his age, not being accustomed to such employment, and considering it little better than being shut up in a dungeon the remainder of his life, he agreed to take the 1*s.* 6*d.* per week. The overseer's house is nearly three miles from where the old man lived, and being lame, he was obliged to get a person to go for it, which cost him 3*d.* per week. Fire, house-room, and washing, reduced his income that he had to live upon to about 8*d.* per week. Old age, infirmities, and this scanty pittance, soon shrivelled up his stomach; and had it not been for assistance from the neighbours, he would most probably have perished sooner. An inquest was held.—Verdict—Died through want. Leeds Mercury.

MARRIAGE.

Friday week, at St. Pancras Church, by the Rev. Dr. Moore, Mr. Wm. Kemp, of Serles-place, Carey-street, to Miss Hannah Maria Kennerley, of Seymour-place, Euston-square.

"OBSERVATIONS ON LORD BATHURST'S SPEECH."

We gave our opinion on the subject of this Pamphlet some time ago, in remarks on the Parliamentary discussion of it. The Reader is also well acquainted with our opinion of the French Emperor, of his military education and habits, of the excuses for the more royal part of his conduct arising from that education, of his better tastes and actions, of the assistance he was giving though not always in the best manner to the progress of liberal opinion, of his great talents, of his ultimate rashness, of his physical overthrow, and of his most ill-requited generosity to the envious and small-minded Princes whom he had overthrown again and again.

But we think it our duty, as Englishmen interested in the real glory of our country, and as Englishmen (mark!) who think the vital principle of its existence to be something clear, generous, and even daring, not polluted, and mean, and locking-up,—to express ourselves on this subject, whenever it comes before us, as the true spirit of our ancestors and a defiance of petty qualities would have us.

The Pamphlet is chiefly occupied with observations upon the memorable and magnanimous Speech of Lord BATHURST, in which that Minister joked upon the distresses of great prisoners, as his brother statesman Mr. CANNING delighteth to do on small ones. Lord BATHURST and his fellow-ministers, having locked up NAPOLEON in an island on the other side of the globe, proceeded to meet his complaints, one after the other, with a remark equally summary and high-minded—"It is not true;" and by way of finishing the goodness of their arguments, they begged the question in their own favour, under pretence of saying that the advantage was on the side of NAPOLEON. They pretended, that he had the advantage of them, because he was both inclined and able to make a complaint of every thing; and they, innocent and tied-up souls, could not make it appear otherwise, do what they would. But how much more right has the prisoner to say, that let them do what they will to him, he is under the disadvantage to all real purposes?—that he has scarcely an advocate under the Borough-monger system to speak for him in England; and nobody but his own jailer, let him be treated as he may, to refer to in St. Helena? As to the impossibility that English Ministers or their agents, especially jailer-agents, can act upon vindictive or other petty principles, nothing but the most disgusting and hypocritical national egotism can pretend such a thing. There are one or two shrewd men among the Ministers; Lord BATHURST himself is one; but there are no great men, no men above the ordinary pitch of humanity; and what common individuals, educated in angry times, are liable to, they are liable to. Look at their paltry political dislike, and more than dislike, of some of the most deserving individuals in public service;—look at the spirit of their arrests and indemnity bills;—look at their three days hammering upon one of the imitators of their own parodies;—and look at their miserable and undisguised revenge of a contribution to him in their late studied mortification of the Duke of BEDFORD. Look again at their hireling publication the Quarterly Review;—see its low and teeth-gnashing abuse of NAPOLEON himself, and its still more disgusting tirades against women; and then say, whether men of this cast of mind and temper are not only likely, but the most likely persons in the world, to wreak the instinctive irritability of their own pettiness on a great and fallen enemy?

The contradictions given to the assertions of Lord BATHURST are of two sorts; first, as to mere matters of fact, such as he and every body else can judge of; and second, as to the sentiment which renders some apparent matters of fact very different things, and which it is not very likely he and his agents can understand.

Among the former contradictions given, NAPOLEON, or the Writer of the Pamphlet under his sanction, asserts, 1stly, That Sir HUDSON LOWE has not confined himself as Lord BATHURST said, to "executive measures," but made restrictions of his own;—2dly, That all the communications of Government to St. Helena have not been to the advantage of the persons detained, those who remain being ill-lodged and fed, and others having been sent in a most vexatious and round-about manner to Europe, not even permitted to set foot on the English shore;—3dly, That a complaint was not made of its being impossible to write to a banker,—the subject on which his Lordship was so particularly facetious;—4thly, That there had not been a change of opinion respecting the inconvenience of the house at Longwood;—5thly, That there has not been an attempt to establish a correspondence by means of the Journals,—the pretext for not letting the EMPEROR see any papers but those which abuse him;—6thly, That NAPOLEON did not declare, as another Minister (CASTLEREAGH) asserted at a Meeting in Ireland, that he had never made peace with England but to deceive, to surprise, and to destroy her;—7thly, That the attachment of the French army to him was not owing, as the same Minister asserted in the House of Commons, to his giving the daughters of the richest families to his soldiers,—of which, says the statement, "it would be difficult to cite a single example." These and other counter-assertions amount in all to twenty-two, twenty of which are in reply to "twenty erroneous assertions" in Lord BATHURST's speech, "to each of which," says the writer, "might be applied the favourite formula of it is not true." NAPOLEON well understands the spirit of his Lordship's speech, his jokes about the banker, &c. and has sanctioned a bitter comment on it, natural to a soldier who thinks himself a proof how far it can be carried. "The orator," says the Pamphlet, "is pleased to agitate in public certain matters which have in their nature something mean, and tending to the ridiculous. What a contemptuous expression in the tone and general manner of the Hon. Minister! This is observable also in the part of his correspondence, of which a communication has been received. In fifteen or twenty generations, on reading the speech and the orders of Lord BATHURST, his descendants will disown being of the same blood with him, who, by a mixture of savage hatred and ridiculous pusillanimity, tarnished the moral character of the English people at a time when their triumphant flag covered the globe."

The other class of counter-assertions is connected with the spirit of two of the general restrictions. The four great restrictions of which NAPOLEON complains as contrary to the Law of Nations, to magnanimity, real necessity, and to the whole proper spirit of such a case, are—

- "1. The detention at St. Helena.
- "2. The name imposed of General Bonaparte.
- "3. The prohibition from going abroad, upon the rock of St. Helena, otherwise than accompanied by an officer.
- "4. The obligation, first, of writing none but open Letters, to be transmitted to the Officer appointed to guard St. Helena; and, secondly, of receiving none but opened Letters which have passed under the eye of the Minister."

The first, he says, is utterly barbarous and unnecessary:

"If the security of the detention had been the only object in view, there was no want of castles or of houses in England; but it was the devouring climate of the tropic which was required."

On the second, he makes one of those unanswerable observations, to which the "legitimate" in these days have so laid themselves open. "The second restriction," says his writer, "has not any relation to the security of the detention; it has the effect of aggravating the condition of this Prince. Prisoners of war, when they fall into the power of the enemy, are legitimated by the title which they bore at home. But the Bourbons ceased not to reign in France; the republic, and the fourth dynasty, were not legitimate Governments. On what are these new principles founded? If the English Government acknowledge that the BOURBONS reigned in France at the time of the peace of Amiens in 1802, they acknowledge that Cardinal YORK reigned in England at the treaty of Paris in 1763: that CHARLES XIII. does not reign in Sweden." We need not repeat our contempt of this particular restriction. It is one of the greatest proofs of the petty and vindictive feeling that inspired it. Common courtesy towards a man who had fallen from so high a station, to say nothing of the guarantee of his titles to him by all the other Powers, would have suggested to any persons of real spirit a proceeding less mean and palatable. How does it betray too their profound sense of the very name of worldly rank and power!

To the third and fourth restrictions (which are those we alluded to) he answers thus:—

"It is well known that the Emperor ought not, could not, and never would avail himself of the condition contained in the third restriction. Therefore, it was calculated that he would not go out of an unwholesome dwelling. What relation could this restriction have to the security of the detention, on a precipitous rock, six hundred leagues from any continent, around which several brigs are cruising; where there is only a single anchorage, and the circumference of which may, moreover, be guarded by ten or twelve posts of infantry.

"It was equally well known, that in order not to submit to the humiliation prescribed by the fourth restriction, he would not receive or write any letter. The correspondence between this remote Island and Europe, may take place at most twice a year; eight or nine months must elapse before any answer arrives; how can a correspondence of this kind have any influence on the security of the detention, or the tranquillity of Europe? But it takes away all moral consolation. It is to the soul what this frightful climate is to the body. The end in view is approached by two ways at once."

Now Lord BATHURST and the agents of Government may say, that BONAPARTE may go out if he will, and receive letters if he will. BONAPARTE says he can do neither: that is, he means to say, that to his spirit, under all the circumstances of his past life, and with due and natural regard to the pitch of being to which he thinks he has raised himself, a submission to such humiliation is impossible; and therefore renders the restriction as complete in every available respect, as it is acknowledged to be in that which is unavailable. This, it is clear, is a question of sentiment and conscious dignity; and such as the Ministers may reasonably affect not to know any thing about; but NAPOLEON regards them as of that class of persons, which any one who has provoked falsehood, and petty treatment, and revenge, by the reverse qualities, will know well enough to exist;—we mean those, who having no delicacy themselves, know just enough of it in theory, to see how far they can trespass upon and turn it to account in others.

The whole principle of NAPOLEON's detention, especially of the manner of it, is the wretched mistake of weak and small-minded men. He is confined in the bleakest as well as hottest, and of course the unwholesomest spot in the island; he is ill lodged and ill fed; he is under the control of a man, who is without control, except at long intervals and partial employers; he is not allowed to walk without a petty officer at his side, to enter a single house, to speak with any one whom he meets on the road, nay, not even to be found listening to any one, of course even for a minute, or the sentries may fire at him. The consequence is, according to the statement of a follower, whose noble and inflexible attachment is above all suspicion, that in September last his legs were beginning to swell, his gums were attacked with a painful scurvy, and it was thought he could not live long. The Governor or Jailer (the word has the same meaning now-a-days) asked Count BERTRAND, why he did not ride. The Count answered in a letter (which together with the whole publication we earnestly recommend to our readers),—"if you do not re-establish things as they were in the time of the Admiral (Cockburn), the Emperor cannot go out. He considers, and will consider, that determination as a willingness on your part to occasion his death. You make him die of sickness; you can make him die of hunger;—it would be a benefit if you would make him die by musket-shot.

"If you assemble the military and naval officers of this place, and the principal officers of health, there is not one of them but will tell you that your restrictions are disgraceful, and that a man of honour should sooner die than acknowledge them; that they are of no avail to the security of the detention; that they are illegal. The text of the Bill, and the speech of your Minister, cannot leave any kind of doubt on this point. The medical officers will tell you that there is no more time to be lost: that in three or four weeks perhaps it will be too late; and although this great Prince be abandoned by fortune, and there is an open field for calumnies and libels in Europe, yet a cry of indignation will be raised among all people; for there are here several hundreds of persons, French, English and foreigners, who will bear witness to all that has been done to put an end to the life of this great man.

"I have, Sir, always spoken to you to this effect, more or less forcibly. I shall speak to you of it no more, for denials, subtleties and arguments are very useless.

"The question lies in two words: do you or do you not wish to kill the Emperor? If you persist in your conduct, you will yourself have answered in the affirmative; and, unhappily, the object will probably be attained after some months of agony."

The Count says again on this subject:—"This great man is dying upon a rock; he is dying a death sufficiently slow to be apparently natural,—an excess of cruelty hitherto unknown among nations." NAPOLEON himself writing a letter, in his own person, to Count LAS CASAS, which is to be found in the Appendix, and in which he says that there had been a German botanist six months in St. Helena, who had seen his wife and child at Schoenbrunn, and who was not suffered to give him any intelligence of them, concludes thus:—

"My body is in the power of the hatred of my enemies; they forget nothing which can glut their vengeance; but the insalubrity of this devoting climate, the want of every thing that sustains life, will, I feel, put a speedy end to this existence, the last moments of which will be an opprobrium on the English character; and Europe will one day signalize with horror that crafty and wicked man, whom true Englishmen will disown as a Briton."

We finish for the present with two more passages from the Pamphlet, one of them alluding to the treatment of HANNIBAL by the Romans. The hirelings of Government, who have a talent for missing all the sentiment of a thing, and finding out only the common-place reverse of it, will undoubtedly say, as they have said before, that such allusions are puerile. The reader however will feel that they are very manly when truly felt, and that they could not possibly be more in place than in the mouth of a man like NAPOLEON:—

"The Romans pursued Hannibal to the farther end of Bithynia; Flaminius obtained from King Prusias the death of that great man. But even at Rome, Flaminius was accused of having acted thus for the satisfaction of his private hatred. In vain did he allege that Hannibal, still in the vigour of his age, might be dangerous; that his destruction was useful. A thousand voices answered, that what is unjust and ungenerous can never be advantageous to a great nation; that such pleas would justify assassination, poison, and every crime! Succeeding generations reproached this cowardice in their ancestors; they would willingly have effaced such a stain from their history. Since the revival of letters among modern nations, not a generation has arisen which has not concurred in the imprecations which Hannibal, when about to swallow the hemlock, pronounced against Rome, who, at a time when her fleets and legions covered Europe, Asia and Africa, wreaked her wrath on a single unarmed man, whom she dreaded, or pretended to dread. But the Romans never violated hospitality. Sylla found refuge in the house of Marius. Flaminius, before he proscribed Hannibal, did not receive him on board his ship; he did not declare to him that he had orders to bid him welcome; the Roman fleet did not carry him to the port of Ostia, paying him all the honours due to his rank."

The other is sufficient, we should think, to make the PRINCE REGENT think seriously a little on the situation to which he, as well as the subjects of a constitutional monarchy, are reduced by the want of Reform,—a want, to which by the way (so endless and intaleculable are the effects of diminished liberty), NAPOLEON himself, who was provoked by ambition and his enemies to trifle with freedom, owes his present gross ill-usage. Lord BATHURST said to the House, that he did not know how Sir HUDSON LOWE could discharge his duty, if he did not make himself acquainted with the nature of any communication to this country;—on which the pamphlet remarks:—

"An assurance has been asked of the Commandant of this place, that a Letter to the Sovereign would be sent sealed to England. It was well known that he could not answer for what would be done with it in London. If the King of England were not able to receive Letters till the Ministers had read them, ENGLAND WOULD NOT BE A MONARCHY. At Venice, at Ragusa, at Lucca, the Doges, and the Gonfaloniers, were never subject to such a humiliation. It is probable that if a Minister opened a Letter addressed to the Prince, without being sanctioned by a general or special authority for so doing, the Prince would withdraw from him his confidence. The English Constitution has not tarnished with such a stain the Crown of Edward and Elizabeth; it would have been a stain on the nation itself. If Ministers are responsible before the Tribunals, Kings are responsible before God and the People. How could the Monarch be informed of the faults of his Ministers; admonish them, or dismiss them? They are not responsible for what the Prince knows, hears, or reads, but for the orders which he gives, for the measures which he takes; then they ought to know every thing, in order that they may be able to advise the throne, with full cognizance of the case."

So much at present for the treatment of this illustrious and as it appears, still envied soldier; and so much for those, who with reason may still envy him.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 14.—The Duke of Wellington has entirely recovered from his indisposition.—The day after the attempt to assassinate the Duke of Wellington, information was received that an individual, named Quin, was in haste to leave Paris, after having cut off his mustaches. He was instantly pursued and arrested near Lyons. He was brought into Paris on the 11th inst.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, MARCH 1.—Yesterday afternoon a report was spread all on a sudden that Jerome Bonaparte had been murdered near his estate of Schonau. Upon inquiry, the affair was found to be as follows:—Jerome was gone out a-hunting; his horse became restive, and threatened to throw him, when one of his attendants galloped up to his assistance. The latter fell from his horse, and wounded himself so severely, that he was carried from the field half dead. Several peasants at work having seen this accident from a distance, spread the above report, which died away in as short a time as it had been spread.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

SALISBURY.—LEWIS v. HAMMOND.—In this case it appeared that the plaintiff, a farmer at Foxhanger, near Devizes, attended regularly a congregation of Independent Dissenters in that town, and in passing through a turnpike gate on Sundays, he claimed from the defendant an exemption from the toll of ten-pence, because he was going to his proper place of religious worship, and that such claim being rejected, and the toll enforced, the action was brought, in his name, by the society for the protection of the religious liberty of Dissenters, to recover back the amount of the toll so obtained.—For the defendant it was contended, that under the particular words of the act the plaintiff was not entitled to the exemption, because he went out of his own parish to attend at a place of public worship, and because there was in such parish a dissenting place of worship.—Mr. Justice HOLROYD determined that the plaintiff was entitled to the exemption.—The Jury accordingly returned a verdict for plaintiff.—Damages 10*d*. and costs.

THE KING v. REV. WILLIAM EASTON, JAMES JERRARD, AND EIGHT OTHER PERSONS.—The following were the facts of this case. The Rev. William Hopkins, a Dissenting Minister at Tisbury, was invited to preach at Anstey, an adjoining parish. Of that parish the Rev. William Easton was perpetual curate, and James Jerrard was tythingman. A dwelling-house belonging to James Butt was the place of meeting of the Dissenters. Hopkins first attended in Nov. 1816; he repeated his visits, and noises were made without the house, which interrupted the worship, until the 31st of Dec. 1816. On that evening he went about six o'clock to preach, when 70 persons were assembled without the house. Among the persons assembled were the several defendants, and also Mr. Easton (the clergyman), and Jerrard. The mob were supplied with cow-horns, large bells, and various discordant instruments; and encouraged by the clergyman and peace-officer, made a most clamorous and terrific noise. They paraded about nine yards from the house; and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the high-constable, and other respectable persons, they persevered in their disturbance, until the minister was compelled abruptly to discontinue the religious service. On the return of Mr. Hopkins, he was followed by the same mob, amidst execrations, noises, and their horrible music, for half a mile, to the boundaries of the parish of Anstey.—The Jury returned a verdict of—Guilty of the riot against the Rev. Wm. Easton, James Jerrard, and seven other defendants.

A trial which excited very considerable interest took place on Wednesday morning. It was that of Mr. Thomas Bellworthy, an Overseer of Farnborough, Hants, charged with the wilful murder of a pauper named Henry Miles. The prisoner had a prepossessing appearance, being a man of mild features, about 40 years of age. The indictment charged him with maliciously causing the death of the deceased, by removing him to his parish in a state of extreme sickness, and by exposing him during such removal to the inclemency of the weather.

Mr. CASELLE detailed the particulars of this interesting case. The deceased, he said, was a parishioner of New Sarum, and was brought to the workhouse at Farnborough in December last, in a very bad state of health, and almost perishing with cold. After remaining there about a month, he was taken by the prisoner in an open cart to a meeting of the Magistrates at Odiham, being a distance of about twelve miles; and the prisoner there received from the Magistrates an order for the pauper's removal to his parish. He was accordingly taken by the prisoner the same day to Basingstoke, and on the following morning removed from thence, under the charge of a man hired by the prisoner, in another open cart to New Sarum (a distance of thirty-six miles) with no other covering than some straw and a sack. The prisoner arrived at New Sarum in a few minutes after the deceased, and had him taken the same evening to the parish hospital at Bugmore. Here he was put for the night in the "dead house," a place with a brick floor, attached to the hospital; after lying all night upon a hurdle with some straw and a blanket, he was examined next morning by a surgeon, who ordered every requisite attention to be paid to him; but this was too late, for death closed the unfortunate man's sufferings on the following morning. It was the duty of Overseers to see that paupers are fit to be removed; and the question in the present case was, whether the prisoner was fully aware of the state of the deceased's health, and whether by timely care before his removal, his life might not have been saved.

Luke Smith was hired by Mr. Bellworthy to take the deceased from Basingstoke to Salisbury; Mr. B. said, alluding to the deceased, "God bless the man, let him have what nourishment you possibly can, and I will pay for it." He accordingly had refreshment four times on the road, ate part of a warm rabbit pye, and drank warm beer and gin on the road. He much wished to get home that night. On arriving at the Coach and Horses, Salisbury, in the evening, witness asked him how he was, and he answered "tolerably;" witness then gave him part of a cake, and some more warm beer and gin when Mr. Bellworthy arrived, and they took him in the cart to the Hospital.

Thomas Mark Wilnot, surgeon, deposed, that the deceased died of a mortification, and his death was hastened by his journey; but had he remained at Farnborough, the probability was that he would have died.

The Rev. Thomas Selwyn, a Magistrate of Hants, examined the pauper at Odiham, and signed the order for his removal. On going to him in the cart, witness said, "Friend, are you able to go to Salisbury?" to which he replied, "Yes, Sir, and I wish it." He declared this cheerfully, and made no complaint whatever. Witness here addressed the Judge, declaring that he had acted under the impression that the pauper was the best judge of his own situation; for had he been aware of his real state, he would have suspended the order. The Judge said, "I believe you, Sir."

Two witnesses gave the prisoner a good character for humanity of disposition. The Learned Judge then summed up the evidence to the Jury, who instantly returned a verdict of Not Guilty.—A burst of applause followed from all parts of the Court, but it was checked by the Judge.

HORSHAM, MARCH 9.—This morning the Court was excessively crowded, to hear the trial of Maria Walton, alias Maria Wilkins, on a charge of Bigamy. She was dressed in white, with a light coloured pelisse, and wore a round black hat, with feathers, and a black veil. Her countenance was exceedingly prepossessing, notwithstanding the natural anxiety of her feelings upon the situation in which she was placed.—Mr. GURNEY stated, that the prisoner was the daughter of a respectable tradesman, and was married very young to a Mr. Cox, at Bombay, where he died in 1809. The following year she was married to Mr. Wilkins, at Bombay, when they shortly afterwards returned to England. For a considerable time the prisoner lived at Brighton, upon their separation, where Mr. Walton became acquainted with the prisoner, and was so captivated with her, that they were married at Lewes in 1816. Mr. Walton had been thrown into gaol in consequence of debts contracted before marriage. He was a young man who had acquired glory by his bravery in the memorable battle of Waterloo. The prosecution was carried on by the mother of Mr. Walton.

The Rev. Mr. Burroughs stated, that the prisoner was married to James Thomas Hacket Wilkins, by him, on the 26th of January, 1810. They left Bombay soon afterwards. Witness had not seen the prisoner until he had an interview with her in Bristol gaol, where she was confined for want of sureties to keep the peace against Mr. Walton's mother. This was about three weeks ago.

Mr. Winter, the parish clerk of St. Peter's, Lewes, produced the register of the marriage at that parish church, namely, "Robert Baron Walton, of the parish of Brighton, and Maria Cox, of the parish of Lewes, by license, 28th May, 1816."

Mr. Bamfield, surgeon, of Bedford-street, Covent-garden, knew the prisoner, and her deceased husband, Mr. Cox, in Bombay, and subsequently her second husband, Mr. Wilkins, who introduced the prisoner to him as his wife.

Mr. NOLAN urged a variety of objections as to the validity of her marriage with Mr. Wilkins, but the Judge over-ruled them.

The Prisoner in her defence stated, that she was married to Mr. Wilkins in India, and that on their arrival in England he became involved in his circumstances. A separation ensued with mutual consent, and an agreement to that effect was entered into; that when Mr. Walton paid his addresses to her, she told him of her circumstances, and also, that by the opinion of her professional advisers, she was repeatedly told that her marriage with Mr. Wilkins was illegal, owing to there being no witnesses present at the solemnization. She declared her innocence of having inveigled her second husband to a marriage, and for a long time resisted his importunities.

The Rev. Robert James Carr stated, that Mr. Walton had made applications to him for a license. On Mr. Walton's second application, the witness declined granting a license, and begged of him to recollect the unhappiness he would give to his mother by marrying this lady.

The Jury, after a short consultation, returned the verdict of Guilty, but recommended the prisoner to mercy.

Mr. Baron GRAHAM, in passing sentence, observed to the prisoner, that from the frank and open manner in which she declared her situation to Mr. Walton, as being previously married, and which was partly proved in evidence, the crime with which she was charged was much extenuated, and that she would be visited with the least punishment the law in such cases had provided. The sentence was six months' confinement in the House of Correction at Lewes, and that it should be attended with as gentle treatment as was suitable to her situation.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 16.

WINDOW TAX.

The Marquis of DOWNSHIRE presented two Petitions praying for the repeal of the Window Tax, one from Dublin and the other from Belfast. He observed, that the tax had been imposed by the Irish Parliament merely as a war tax, and as such had been continued by the United Parliament. It had too been increased at one time 50 per cent., and at another 25. The people of Ireland considered the continuance of the tax as a grievance, and several meetings had been held to petition against it.—Laid on the table.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, March 17.

The royal assent was given by commission to all the public and private Bills on the table, which had passed both houses, 33 in number; the public Bills were the Habeas Corpus Suspension Indemnity Bill, the Mutiny Bill, the Mutiny Act Mistake Bill, the West India Indemnity Bill, the Offices' Indemnity Bill, the Marine Mutiny Bill, the Madder Duty Bill, and the Kilmainham Hospital Bill.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 18.

STATE OF THE COINAGE.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE moved for an account of the silver issued from the Mint since the new coinage, distinguishing the different kinds of shillings, sixpences, crowns, and half-crowns. He moved for this, as he had already done for other papers, preparatory to a motion which he intended to submit at an early day after the recess, on the general state of the circulation of the country. He did not now mean to enter into the question of the depreciation of Bank-notes; but if even it should appear that there was no depreciation of that paper, still such was the state of our silver coinage, of which only 42*l.* was a legal tender, it appeared to him impossible gold should circulate in the country. It would then be a question for their Lordships' consideration, whether, if the Bank opened for payment in specie, it would be practicable to keep up the circulation of gold. If it should be found to be the case that the state of the coinage did not admit of the measure being carried into full effect, it would be committing a great evil to adopt a measure which would call upon bankers to circulate gold at a time when its circulation with silver would be impracticable. Ordered.—Adjourned.

Thursday, March 19.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Greenland Fisheries Oaths' Bill, the Bank Tokens' Bill, the Scotch Aquavitæ Bill, and five private Bills.

A person from the Privy Council presented an account of the number of resident Clergy, Churches, Chapels, &c. in England and Wales, and other papers relative to the state of the Church.

A person from the office of the Chamberlain of the City of London presented an account of the receipts and expenditure of the Orphans' Fund and other papers, which had been ordered to be laid before the House.

The Bath Gas-lights' Bill was passed.—Adjourned to this day fortnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 16.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES—MR. WILBERFORCE.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Sir G. WARRENDER, after some observations respecting the state of the Navy, which, he said, would be found in perfect order, if circumstances called for it, moved, that 2,480,000*l.* should be granted for its service.

Sir M. W. RIDLEY moved, as an amendment, for the reduction of 2,800*l.* the allowance to the two junior Lords of the Admiralty. When he had formerly moved for the reduction of the two Lords the defence set up was, that the places were necessary for the accommodation of the Ministers' Friends, and as a school for young statesmen. Now if there must be such a school, he hoped they would pay for their own education, and that 2,000*l.*

would not be taken from the country for the education of two young gentlemen, ambitious of becoming statesmen.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that the defence was not wanted been stated, but the great benefits derived from the constitution of the Board, which had existed a long time without increase of alteration.

On a division, the amendment was rejected by a majority of 27.

After the gallery was cleared for a division, and just as the tellers were proceeding to count, Mr. Wilberforce popped in at one of the doors, but immediately retreated. The tellers, however, having seen him, followed and brought him in; when he was asked by the Chairman of the Committee, whether he had heard the question put? To which he replied in the negative. The Chairman then ordered the question to be read to him, which was done, and then asked him which way he voted? Mr. Wilberforce replied, for the Ayes, but took his seat among the Noes.

Mr. LYTTELTON then observed, that he saw a Member among the Noes, who had declared he meant to vote with the Ayes; and contended that he ought not, therefore, to be told in his present situation.

Mr. WILBERFORCE admitted that he had for a moment neglected his duty; and coming into the House when the Committee was on the point of dividing, without even knowing the subject of the debate, he had endeavoured to withdraw, but had been followed by the tellers, one of whom had dragged him from the place to which he had retreated, and that in his confusion he had declared he should vote with the Ayes, when he really meant to vote with the Noes, being determined to vote in the opposite side to the individual who had brought him forward against his will, in order to prevent his being treated so in future.

The CHAIRMAN stated, that he conceived the Hon. Member was perfectly justified in changing his mind, and voting one way, after declaring his intention to vote another. (Hear, hear!)

Lord FOLKESTONE called the attention of the House to the declaration of the Hon. Member, that, without regard to principle or the merits of the case, he voted from the sole motive of disappointing the teller who had brought him into the house; and was proceeding to contend, that it was the duty of both the tellers to bring in any Member, whom they found in that situation, when he was interrupted by a call of order; and the CHAIRMAN repeated, that the Hon. Member had a right to retract any declaration of his intentions made in error; and he was accordingly counted among the Noes.

The sum of 1,787,181*l.* was next voted for building, &c. of ships of war, and other extra works.

Two or three sums were voted for different services.

On the motion of Mr. MARSH, 800*l.* were voted to indemnify the High Bailiff of Westminster for the expenses which were incurred by Parliament to be borne by the candidates.

NEW CHURCHES AND CHAPELS—TYTHE BILL.

The SPEAKER having read that part of the Royal Speech, which recommended the building of more Churches, and the House being resolved into a Committee,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that considering the great increase of the population, nothing but the long wars we had been engaged in, and the great expense we had been at, could have justified the long delay of the measure now proposed. In the course of the last century it was probable that our population had been nearly doubled, and it had become concentrated in the metropolis and other districts, so that the accommodation afforded by many parishes for public worship, was very inadequate to the wants of the inhabitants. He might rest the case of the great want of places of public worship on general notoriety, without entering into any details; but it might not be improper to mention a few particulars. It appeared that there were 27 parishes, in which the excess of population, above those who could be accommodated, exceeded 20,000 souls. In St. Martin-in-the-Fields there were 26,000, in Marylebone 24,000, in Liverpool 23,000. In Manchester only 11,000 could be accommodated. In the next class, there were four parishes, in which the excess of population was about 40,000. In the third class, about 30,000. In the 4th class, 20,000. He did not mean to say that churches were to be built to contain all these; if a church could contain one-third of the inhabitants, at any one time, it was as much as might be required. It appeared, by a work published by Mr. Yates, that the population of London and its vicinity amounted to 1,129,000 souls, of which 977,000 were unprovided for. In the city of London, the accommodation of the churches far exceeded what the inhabitants required, as was the case in all our ancient cities. He had therefore to propose, that 1,000,000L sterling should be raised as occasion might require, to be settled by Commissioners, in the same manner as was adopted for the encouragement of public works. This plan would enable the Commissioners to carry the great work into execution with more effect than could be done by an annual vote; and it would enable the people to ascertain the sum to which they might ultimately look. The grant might be exhausted in four or five years, or probably less; and he proposed that it should be issued in Exchequer Bills, to be charged on the aids of particular years. The present grant would enable the Commissioners to build a great number of churches in any district in which they might be wanted; but, as far as was possible, they were only to lend their assistance in furtherance of every fair exertion of the parishes. It might be right to vest in his Majesty in Council, the power of dividing the parishes for ecclesiastical purposes; but it would be only with the consent of the patron that the parish should be divided; the income of the present incumbent would be held sacred. In many cases the consent of the patron might not be obtained, and authority would be given to the King and Council to take under the care of a spiritual pastor some part of the parish in which a church might not be built. Where a chapel of ease was erected, the curate should not be liable to be removed without the consent of the Bishop. In the 27 parishes which he had mentioned, it could not be estimated that less than 77 large churches would be sufficient to furnish any additional accommodation; and, in that case, only one-third of the population of those parishes could be accommodated at once. He had made no deduction for that portion of the inhabitants who were not of the Established Church; for, without any disparagement to the exertions of those who dissented from it, he thought that the public were bound to find accommodation for all, and he thought that many did not now attend the Established Church merely because the church could not find accommodation for them—(Hear, hear!)—A very respectable society had been formed, and from their contributions he anticipated great assistance. A prodigious number of parishes would remain that would afford accommodation only in a small proportion of their inhabitants; and, therefore, in the Bill, he intended to admit of subscriptions and briefs. In all places in which churches were built, it was intended that the patronage should follow the present patronage.

A resolution, authorizing the issue of one million Exchequer Bills, under certain regulations, was then moved.

Sir C. MONCK thought nothing could be better devised for the destruction of heresy—he meant by that, dissenting. Yet he might ask, whether public morals had been advanced in those places where there was a sufficiency of churches? In Norwich there was, he believed, 39 churches and only 33,000 inhabitants. Was Norwich famous for its moral habits? Durham had many churches, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne only four or five; but he had never heard that there was more morality in Durham than in Newcastle. Churches were formerly kept open, and people could go in when they liked, which he thought a better plan. On the question of voting the sum proposed, he might ask what were the many endowments that were made, and whether there was not a very large sum applied in a manner just the very contrary to the spirit of that motion?—(Hear, hear!)—Great part of that, he thought, no very becoming expenditure; and when application was made to Parliament for money for building of churches, those things ought to be considered and revised.—He would have had Commissioners appointed in each county to make proper representation to Parliament of the want of churches, and to provide for erecting others, rather than that the money should be raised from the whole nation, as it could only be applied to a particular part.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, it was provided that the service should be read three times a day in the new churches; and it might be advisable to have the service read oftener in the present ones.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to know, whether it was intended to make any regulations with regard to Scotland. There were some parishes so large, that the people at one end could not attend the church at the other. He had had applications himself from a part of Scotland, in which complaints were made that it was impossible to attend divine service. There were parishes in that country very nearly, if not quite, forty miles in length.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, it was impossible to extend the present measure to Scotland; but a similar one might be separately submitted to the House.—The resolution was agreed to.

On the motion for the second reading of the Tithe Laws Amendment Bill, it was rejected by a majority of 23.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, March 17

Mr. LAMBERTON presented a Petition from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, praying for abolition of sinecures and extravagant pensions, and for a parliamentary reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from Rochdale, praying for parliamentary reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT presented 20 or 30 Petitions for parliamentary reform, from St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Ashton-under-Lyne, Halifax, and various places in Staffordshire, Middlesex, &c.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into a Committee on Aids relative to Auctions. Alderman ATKINS moved some resolutions, which were agreed to: Sir F. BURDETT gave a notice respecting School Petition.

MAGISTRATES VISITING GAOLS.

Lord FOLKESTONE made various remarks respecting the right of Magistrates to visit the jails; and alluding to the late trial at Reading, he said, there appeared a partiality in the Judge (not a personal one, but to a particular side of the question) during the whole trial. His Lordship stated his view of the law on the subject; and the inference he deduced was, that unless usage could be shown to be hostile to his interpretation of the Act, which he was confident it could not, Magistrates were entitled to visit state prisoners. In order to make this doctrine indisputable, he moved for leave to bring in a Bill to remove doubts, whether 36th Geo. III. ch. 40. extended to common or county gaols.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL expressed his astonishment at the serious charge brought against the Learned Judge, who had, during the whole trial, given all the proceedings the most impartial attention, and had not even stated the law so strongly as he was entitled to state it.—The Attorney-General, after stating his view of the law on the subject, observed, that the Noble Lord's object was, to effect, by a vote of Parliament, a most detrimental purpose—to entitle Magistrates to visit prisoners confined on suspicion of treason. He had all respect for the Magistrates; but he could not consent that, because they were in the commission of the peace, they should destroy the prerogative of the Crown and the right of the Sheriff. Parliament never ought and never would give Magistrates such a power. He should, therefore oppose the introduction of the Noble Lord's Bill,—first, upon the ground that it was unnecessary, with reference to the meaning of the Act of Parliament; and, secondly, that if adopted, it would be highly detrimental to the best interests of the country.

Sir F. BURDETT, among other remarks, observed, that if by "close custody" was meant solitary confinement, he would assert that it was totally unknown to the ancient law. It had been argued, that because the common gaols were the King's gaols, neither Sheriffs nor Magistrates had a right to visit persons confined in them on charges of high treason. They were called the King's gaols in the same manner as the high roads were said to belong to the King, and meant no more than that they were used for a public purpose. If, however, there were doubts on the legal question, it was necessary that they should be immediately set at rest. Although the Hon. and Learned Gentleman had no doubt on the subject, other gentlemen of the profession, equally learned, might entertain very considerable doubts.

After some further conversation, Lord Folkestone withdrew his motion.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BROUGHAM brought up the report of the Committee upon the Education of the Poor, and moved for leave to bring in a Bill for appointing Commissioners to inquire into the abuses in charities connected with education.—Leave given.

ASSESSED TAXES, &c.

Mr. BROUGHAM said that he should feel it his duty, at a very early day after the holidays, to bring the subject of the Assessed Taxes and of defaulters before the House. In the mean time he wished to state the great hardship of persons having to pay the taxes twice over, after the money had been embezzled by a defaulter, over whose appointment they had no controul, and yet were liable for his defaults. A person in the Ordnance Department had recently made default in the sum of 24,000L, and the half-pay officers, as well in the civil as in the military branches, were liable to pay the taxes over again. How that person came to have so large a balance in his hands he could not say; but he hoped that in these cases, no favour was shown. He would now merely call the compassionate attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the situation in which those half-pay officers were placed.

SAVINGS' BANKS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved for leave to bring in "a Bill to amend the Act for the encouragement of Savings Banks." He stated, that the object of the Bill was merely to remove some technical difficulties in the Act of last Session, and observed, that the present prosperity of these establishments had far exceeded the most sanguine expectations. How much would the framers of these Bills have been delighted, had he lived to witness the success of his efforts! From the 26th of August to the 7th of March, no less a sum than 675,000*l.* had been invested in the Bank of England by different savings' banks. The Right Hon. Gentleman most sincerely hoped that they would continue to prosper, as he considered them intimately connected with the morals, frugality, and industry of the people.—(Hear.)

Mr. BARRINGTON thought it was highly reprehensible to see rich people taking advantage of such institutions, and putting money into funds that ought to be kept sacred to the lower orders. He thought the Right Hon. Gentleman would be perfectly right in taking some steps to prevent such transactions.

Mr. THOMPSON was of the same opinion. Such institutions would be abused, if measures were not taken to counteract their abuse, against which he hoped the Right Hon. Gentleman would endeavour to provide if possible.—Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved "that there be laid before the House an account of the sums vested in savings' banks, up to the 11th March, 1818."—Ordered.

NAVY ESTIMATES.—HALF-PAY OFFICERS.

Mr. BROGDEN brought up the report of the Committee of Supply.

Mr. FORBES made some observations on the case of wounded Officers of the Navy, who were not on the same footing with those of the same class in the Army. He alluded to those pensioned for the loss of limbs, for the loss of an eye, or equivalent wounds. It would be found, on examination, that there were many Officers bearing corresponding rank with others in the Army, who had had wounds equivalent to the loss of a limb, and who had 50*l.* less than those of the Army. He thought that required examination. He might ask what good reason there was for such a proceeding? There were many Post-captains too who had the rank corresponding with that of Colonel in the Army, who ought to have 300*l.* and had not more than 250*l.* He had had a number of letters on the subject, and he could state that many were in great suspense with regard to their claims, whose names he might mention if he would, and whose wounds had been declared by the surgeons to be equal to the loss of a limb. There was another subject which it was necessary to mention. Many persons who had been in the service eleven years and upwards had been turned adrift without support of any description. The persons to whom he alluded were Purser's Clerks, who had risen to that situation from the rank of midshipmen. There were a number of Pursers who had had their ships taken from them, and all the half-pay they were allowed was not more than 3*s.* per diem. About 200 had 5*s.*, and about 200 or 300 a shilling less.

Mr. CROKER, though he acquitted the Honourable Gentleman of any mischievous intention, thought it was not necessary for him to come down and give a false colouring to facts, which were very likely to prove mischievous. The Lieutenant-colonels, it was true, had sixpence more in half-pay than the young Post-captains. But the latter went on in his rank till he arrived at the degree corresponding with full Colonel, in which he got higher pay. There had been two hundred Post-captains when the alteration in the pay was made in 1814, and eleven hundred Lieutenant-colonels who had the same rate of pay. Not one of the Post-captains but had the Colonel's pay, and not one of the Lieutenant-colonels had been advanced a farthing. The Lieutenant-colonel of the Navy, if he might so call them, had been promoted, and had a shilling a day more than those whose pay had formerly exceeded theirs by 6*d.* per diem. Such a proceeding as that of the Hon. Member would be productive of perpetual discontent.—[Mr. Forbes—"The Pursers.""]—The Hon. Gentleman was sick of the Post-captains, and he had no doubt he would soon be sick of the Pursers also. With respect to the Pursers, who had been mentioned as being without ships, he might observe, that if those the Hon. Member alluded to had ships, the remainder, whom he would be obliged to leave unprovided for, would be reduced to a state of starvation. Upon his principle 400 would have a ship, and 500 would be houseless and penniless. From the consideration which the Finance Committee had given that subject, it had been decided that, in future, no more Pursers should be employed than those for whom there were ships. The Hon. Member had then proceeded to make some statements relative to what he had called Purser's Clerks. On that subject he had been guilty of a bunch of blunders.—(Hear, hear!)—A Clerk was inferior to a Midshipman, and therefore the latter could not be promoted to the office of the former. There was no such office in the Navy as a Purser's Clerk. The Hon. Member meant a Captain's Clerk. A Captain's Clerk was the same thing to a Captain as he (Mr. Croker) was to the Lord High Admiral—he kept his books, &c.; but the Purser delivered out the cheese and butter, &c. A Captain might discharge his Clerk when he liked, though it was true that it had been contemplated to promote meritorious Captain's Clerks to the rank of Purser. He was prepared to meet the statements of the Hon. Gentleman, and to show that the Admiralty within the last ten years had made improvements that were most important, beneficial, and national. They had done more in that way within the last five or six years than had been done within 15 or 20 years before.

Mr. MONEY said, the object of his Hon. Friend (Mr. Forbes) seemed to have been misapprehended. It was not his intention, he believed, to throw any imputation upon the conduct of the Admiralty, but simply to submit the fact to the notice of the House, that a great difference did exist in the rate of providing for the Officers of the Army and Navy.

Mr. HUSKISSON said, that no such distinction existed in the rate of compensation to the Army and Navy as he had been led to think; or, if it did, that it was easily to be accounted for from the nature and circumstances of the different services. In the Army, the opportunities which an Officer had of improving his fortune by prize-money did not often occur; and when they did occur, it was for the most part but to an inconsiderable amount. In the Navy such opportunities were frequent. With respect to the compensation for wounds, he believed there was not that difference which the Hon. Gentleman supposed. If an Officer of the Navy lost a limb, he had a compensation as in the Army; but with this difference, that in the Army, should an Officer sustain a very severe wound, if it was not equal to the loss of a limb, he received no compensation at all; but in the Navy, when the wound was found to be very severe, though it might not be equal to the loss of a limb, it was taken into consideration, and a compensation allowed accordingly.

Mr. FORBES said, the Hon. Gentleman (the Secretary to the Admiralty) might have saved their ears and his own lungs, by sparing much of what had fallen from him on this question. The sum of 2 or 3000*l.* would have put both the services on the same footing; and he was sure the country would not grudge such a sum. For himself he was a plain man, and could not bring so much eloquence to the subject as the Hon. Secretary; but then he required no pay for exerting his voice on this question, which he should continue to do every session. The general sentiment in the Navy was, that it was not so well provided for as it ought to be.

Mr. CROKER said, he should be ready and happy to meet the Hon. Member at any proper opportunity, or on any individual case, and would do so then, but thought it improper in the thin state of the House.

The various estimates were then agreed to.

NEW CHURCHES.

On the report of the Bill for building New Churches being brought up,

M. BROWN objected to the clause depriving the Rector of the power of removing the Curate, and confiding that power in the Bishop.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated, that the law was in most cases nearly the same as at present.

Mr. GRANT was happy to hear that the measure would be extended to Scotland.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, there was no indisposition to extend the measure to Scotland, and that the subject would be taken into immediate consideration. A misconception had taken place that the Bill was not to be applied to parishes of less than 10,000 inhabitants. It was not intended to confine its operation, but to do all that could be done.

Mr. WILBERFORCE said, that justice as well as policy required the extension of this measure to Scotland; there was no better way of spending the public money.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 18.

Mr. BIRCH presented three Petitions in favour of Parliamentary Reform: one from Harrington prayed for the elective franchise to all who pay taxes; one from Liverpool, and another from Drydges-square, in Nottingham, which prayed for radical reform. He was a friend to reform, on moderate principles.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The Longitude Bill was read a third time and passed. Lord LASCELLES observed, that he had presented a Petition from Halifax, complaining of the way in which assessments for Assessed Taxes were made on shops connected with dwelling-houses, and expressed a wish to know the intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that there was considerable inconvenience in making the separation between the rating of shops, and houses connected with them.

Lord LASCELLES said, he would call attention to it after the recess.

SPANISH CLAIMANTS.

Dr. PHILLIMORE said, the House were aware that by a late treaty 400,000*l.* were given to the Spanish Government for the purpose of compensation. He was free to admit that the King of Spain had power to act respecting his own subjects; but he wished to confine himself to Spanish claimants who had got sentences for restitution. Other parties, besides the King of Spain, were concerned in this question; and the credit and character of our own tribunals were interested, as the parties conceived they were a pledge of the repossession of their property. As the matter now stands, the parties in possession of sentences of restitution had little more in their hands than waste paper; a merely nominal restitution. Dr. Phillimore concluded by moving, that an humble address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying that steps may be taken to secure full restoration of their property to the several Spanish subjects who have obtained judgment in favour of their claims in the Admiralty Courts of this country.

Lord CASTLEREAGH opposed the motion, contending that the claimants by going to the King of Spain with judgments obtained in this country, would have an additional claim for justice, and an impediment against injustice. But if individual cases had been specially stipulated for in the treaty, it would be incumbered with much obscurity. The King of Spain had taken upon himself to make satisfaction for all losses sustained by his subjects.

After some discussion, the motion was negatived without a division.—Various Bills were then forwarded, and the House adjourned.

Thursday, March 18.

General THOMSON adverted to a notice he had given of a motion for suppressing public Masquerades; but as he did not find he should meet with support, he should withdraw it.

The Bill for regulating Mock Auctions was read a 1st and 2d time.

Sergeant ONSLOW postponed his motion on the Usury Laws from the 16th to the 21st of April.—Adjourned till the 2d April.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

In pursuance of the directions of an Act passed in the 37th year of the reign of his present Majesty King George the Third, intitled "An Act for confirming, and continuing, for a limited time, the restriction contained in the Minute of Council of the 26th of February, 1797, on payments of cash by the Bank," and also of the several Acts since passed, for continuing and amending the same.

I do hereby direct, that there be inserted forthwith in the London Gazette, the following notice from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, dated the 12th day of March, 1818; namely,

"That on and after the 15th day of March instant, the Bank will be ready to issue to each of the bankers in London, current silver coin of the realm to the amount of 20,000*l.* in exchange for Bank Notes, provided application be made for the same before the 5th day of July next."

Proper attention will be paid to the Sermon that has been sent us. Several Articles, intended for this Day's Paper, will be inserted in our next.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MARCH 22.

THE Duke of WELLINGTON, it seems, has been ill, but has got well again; and is busily occupied in discussing with other Ministers the arrangements relative to the payment of the French contribution. The Emperor of Russia, who with the usurped Polish sceptre in one hand, and the Act of the "Holy Alliance" in the other, piques himself on dispensing all sorts of justice, has undertaken to be a sort of arbiter on this occasion; and recommends that the alleged pecuniary inability on the part of France should first be enquired into, and then such allowances made as may be reasonable. The arrangements are said to be near their conclusion, together with those relative to the occupation of the country by foreign troops; and it is "now supposed," says the Courier, that the armies will withdraw in November. We doubt it; or at least, if it should turn out true, there is one thing else which we hold to be certain.

The Bourbons (we may well imagine with what distaste and legitimate shrugs of the shoulders) have officially recognized the new King of SWEDEN. This final success of BERNADOTTE's, who has crept so cautiously into possession of the throne, (like a fox as he looks) must be a very perplexing thing to the Allies. It is certain they do not wish him where he is. With the exception of the point of time at which they particularly wanted his services against his old master, and cherished his ingratitude for the Holy Alliance's sake, they have treated him but coldly and distantly. Their journals (if we are to judge from our own ministerial ones) threw out as many hints and expressions of surprise as they could during the late reign, in order to obstruct his succession; but now, suspecting that the people of Sweden are with him, and loth to find themselves confronted with the popular will under all the circumstances, they are officially very glad, and happy, and so forth. But the contradiction to their own avowed principles must make the "Amen stick in their throats." If BERNADOTTE has a right to the Swedish throne while the "legitimate" family are living, then the Bourbons upon hereditary grounds have none to the throne of France: and if he has no right to the Swedish throne, then the BRUNSWICK Succession has no right to that of England, while there is a kinsman of the family of the STUARTS. The King of SARDINIA, instead of occupying himself at a distance with doing what he can to shut up BONAPARTE's improvements, ought to be enabled to have a taper procession down Bond-street, singing "The Lord hath given me mine inheritance."

It is well remembered by our Readers, that mention was made the other day, in the House of Commons, of a respectable gentleman who had seen Oliver attempting to inflame a riotous disposition in the Park;—that some of the Ministerial Journals, habituated to the direct assertion of falsehoods for political purposes, unluckily ventured upon pronouncing this one, and upon calling for the name of the gentleman;—and finally, that it was offered to produce the gentleman at the bar of the House of Commons, but offered in vain. A Correspondent, whose writing we have been accustomed to see, and whom we believe, from what we have seen of his correspondence, to be equally respectable and intelligent, has communicated his name to us as the person in question. They say that this pet scoundrel, Oliver, is busying himself in Norfolk at elections!

The Courier, in its clumsy defences of Mr. CANNING's pleasantry upon an afflicting bodily infirmity, has brought forward a letter which unluckily proves too much. It is written by the poor man Ogden to the Keeper of the Surrey Jail, and is as follows:—

"SIR—I sent you an account of the usage I received from you during a confinement of near nine months, I was under your care; the treatment was such as calls forth my utmost respect. Your general urbanity was conspicuous throughout my whole confinement, but particularly so during the time of the dreadful surgical operation I had to undergo when in Surrey Gaol, occasioned by the ponderous irons I was loaded with at Manchester, and my life has been preserved only by the great skill and attention paid to me by the Surgeons, particularly Mr. Dixon and yourself, to whom tender my most respectful regard. While memory holds her seat, my gratitude will never be effaced, and the name of Walter be ever dear to your obedient and thankful

"WM. OGDEN.

"26, Wood-street, Manchester, Nov. 26."

Now it was insinuated that Ogden had been well treated through the whole of his imprisonment,—the imprisonment at Manchester having been confounded with that in Surrey. The truth has here slipped manifestly out of the sheath, and cut the ministers' fingers. At a time when keepers of prisons are still less in favour with the public than usual, such of them as possess kindly qualities ought to be doubly mentioned; and it is with great pleasure that the Editor of this paper can bear testimony, from his own experience while in prison, to the civility and good disposition of Mr. WALTER, who succeeded to the office during the latter part of the time. With still greater pleasure too, he takes this opportunity of publicly calling to mind the very gentlemanly and amiable conduct of Mr. DIXON, the surgeon; nor should he by any means omit especial remembrance of a very genuine heart in a rough outside,—Mr. CAVE, the under-jailer,—in whom he found a respectful kindness, and even a generosity and delicacy, which he certainly never thought to witness in a jailer, except on the stage. But it is well worth knowing, what good effects an acquaintance with the real causes of crime and misery can have on a good natural disposition. The present writer has sometimes said to this man, on the arrival of some new and desperate criminal,—"What another, Mr. CAVE!"—"Aye, Sir,—a poor ignorant wretch."—We should have adverted to these prison recollections before; but we intended, and still do some day, to make an article or two upon them that might be useful as well as interesting. As to Mr. CANNING's pleasantries, they have certainly created a good deal of disgust, whatever political feeling may have been mixed with the circumstance, either by accusers or defenders. The infirmity he chose to bring so unnecessarily forward in the midst of his ridicule, happens to be not only a very painful one, but one to which the labouring poor are particularly liable, and which, we have heard it affirmed, is shared, more or less, by a most extraordinary number of persons in this country;—it has even been said, by one person in ten, to a slight degree,—a circumstance extremely worth the attention of the medical philosopher. Mr. CANNING is a man of wit, and the feather in the cap of the present dull-headed Administration; but he is nothing more;—he has nothing in particular of sentiment, or what is emphatically called in philosophy, humanity; nothing which redeems wit from mere ridicule and cold-bloodedness, and renders it the ornament of sensibility and true wisdom.

The following, says the Times, is a copy of the letter which the PRINCE REGENT wrote to the Duke of WELLINGTON, on the occasion of the late attack on his person:—

"Carlton-house, Feb. 14.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—I cannot deny myself the pleasure of writing you a few lines, for the purpose of expressing to you both the happiness which I feel at the news which has just reached me of your escape, thanks to Divine Providence, from a base attempt formed against you, and the sentiments of horror and indignation with which I was filled at the infamy and baseness of such an atrocious attack. I can only, in common with the rest of the nation, offer up thanksgiving to the supreme goodness of Divine Providence, for having protected a life as important to the great interests of our own country, as for the preservation of the general tranquillity of Europe. That you may long continue to enjoy a life so precious to us all, is the most ardent wish of your sincere and affectionate friend, "GEORGE, P.R."

By an account of the net produce of the Revenue of Great Britain and Ireland, it appears that the total revenue for Great Britain and Ireland was, in 1817, 61,675,327*l.* 1*s.* 9½*d.*, and in 1818, 51,629,609*l.* 14*s.* 8½*d.* The separate revenue of Ireland was, in 1817, 4,314,600*l.* 14*s.* 2½*d.*, and in 1818, 4,352,130*l.* 16*s.*, being an excess of revenue in the last year of 38,000*l.* beyond the revenue of the preceding year. The year 1818 comprehends the Income Tax.

POOR LAWS.—Another Report has been presented from the Select Committee on the Poor Laws. It gives the assessment for the relief of the poor in 1748, 1749, and 1750, by which it appears that on the average of those three years about 690,000*l.* per annum was applied to the relief of the poor; in the year 1776, the sum of 1,531,000*l.* was expended in 1783, 4, and 5, the sum of 2,000,000*l.* per annum; in 1803, 4,268,000*l.*; and in 1813, 14, and 15, the average sum of about 6,130,000*l.* per annum. But the sums raised by Poor's Rates and any other rate or rates in these years was, in 1813, 8,651,438*l.*; in 1814, 8,392,728*l.*; in 1815, 7,460,855*l.* The number of paupers relieved in 1813, was 971,913; in 1814, 953,995; in 1815, 895,973. The total of the Money raised by Poor's Rates, or other Rates, appears to have averaged, for the last three years, the sum of 8,168,340*l.* 13*s.* 9½*d.* being at the rate of 16*s.* 1*d.* per head on the population, or 3*s.* 1½*d.* in the pound, of the total amount of the sum of 51,898,423*l.* 12*s.* 6½*d.* as assessed to the Property Tax in the year 1815.

As the silence of this paper respecting the reports of an immediate dissolution of Parliament may be construed into a confirmation of them, it is necessary to repeat that we believe them to be groundless. Parliament will probably be dissolved at the usual time, the expiration of six years, which will happen in October next. Reports to the contrary are only raised by election jobbers. Why should the present Ministry desire the dissolution of Parliament? They cannot wish a new one to be more friendly to their measures.—Courier.

REFORM.—There is to be a Meeting to-morrow, in Palace-yard, of the Electors of Westminster, for the purpose of "considering how best to accelerate the obtaining of that only certain safeguard to liberty and property,—a full, equal, and constitutional Representation of the People in Parliament."—Sir F. BURDETT, we learn, will preside, and we shall then have an additional proof of the truth of Mr. COBBETT's impudent assertion, that the Hon. Baronet has abandoned the great cause of Reform!

A letter has been received from ADKINS, the officer, who set off on Saturday for Buxton, in pursuit of Hussey, the supposed murderer of Mr. BIRD and his housekeeper, stating, that up to Monday night he had not received any direct information of the assassin. The officer was, however, in sanguine hope of final success in his search.

John Fawcett, who stands charged with the murder of his son, was to have been examined yesterday. The evidence was in waiting, and the prisoner, strongly ironed, in an anti-room attached to the Office. No return, however, having been received from the Coroner, the prisoner stands committed till Tuesday.—A letter was received from the Overseers of Keswick, in Yorkshire, by Fawcett's landlord, stating that he had left a former wife (now living) about 24 years ago; and that since that period she had cohabited with another man, by whom she had had three children. But that Fawcett having been, during that interval, several times to visit her, had rendered himself amenable to the parish of Keswick for their support. It was upon this intelligence, added to his continual violence (as Mrs. Fawcett says) that she withdrew from him.—The young man shot was the son by the second marriage, and had in fact left his situation, where he was employed as a baker, in order to avoid the violence of his father, who had threatened his life for being attached to his mother.

POETRY.

[From "the Nymphs," one of the Poems contained in the Volume just published entitled "FOLIAGE," by LEIGH HUNT.]

THE DRYADS.

THERE are the fair-limbed Nymphs o' the woods, (look ye, Whom kindred fancies have brought after me,)
There are the fair-limbed Dryads, who love nooks
In the dry depth of oaks;
Or feel the air in groves, or pull green dresses
For their glad heads in leafy wildernesses;
Or on the golden turf, o'er the dark lines
Which the sun makes when he declines,
Bend their white dances in and out the pines.
They tend all forests old, and meeting trees,
Wood, copse, or queach, or slippery dell o'erhung
With firs and with their dusty apples strewn;
And let the visiting beams the bows among,
And bless the trunks from clings of disease,
And wasted hearts that to the night-winds groan.
They screen the cuckoo when he sings; and teach
The mother blackbird how to lead astray
The unfarmed spirit of the foolish boy
From thick to thick, from hedge to layery beech,
When he would steal the huddled nest away
Of yellow bills, up-gaping for their food,
And spoil the song of the free solitude.
And they, at the sound of the brute, insolent horn,
Hurry the deer out of the dewy morn;
And take into their sudden laps with joy
The startled hare that did but peep abroad;
And from the trodden road
Help the bruised hedgehog: But when tired, they love
The back-turned pheasant, hanging from the tree
His sunny drapery;
And handy squirrel, nibbling hastily;
And fragrant-living bee,
So happy, that he will not move, not he,
Without a song; and hidden, amorous dove,
With his deep breath; and bird of wakeful glow,
Whose louder song is like the voice of life
Triumphant o'er death's image; but whose deep,
Low, lovelier note is like a gentle wife,
A poor, a pensive, yet a happy one,
Stealing, when day-light's common tasks are done,
An hour for mother's work; and singing low,
While her tired husband and her children sleep.

We hear that Mr. WAITHMAN has been actively canvassing during the last week, assisted by Mr. Alderman SMITH, Mr. KIRBY, (the late Sheriff) and other friends. We are happy to learn that the public feeling is universally in his favour.

Mr. FORBES, it will be seen, has again brought the Claims of the Navy before the House, and has expressed his determination to urge them again and again, notwithstanding Mr. CROKER's bare-faced denials. It is notorious that the Navy have cause for complaint; and if Mr. FORBES obtains nothing else by his honourable exertions, he will at least receive the hearty thanks of many an ill-used veteran.

EXAMINATION OF FINNEY.—This prisoner was brought up from Coldbath-fields yesterday, for examination. Several Members of Parliament were present. There, however, was not a solitary charge of uttering against the prisoner, but he was remanded, in order to give the Bank an opportunity of ascertaining if any evidence could be had to connect him with uttering; and he was informed, that no lenity would be shown, if a case could be proved.

As Sir J. LEICESTER is about to open to the public his beautiful Gallery of Paintings, we shall give occasional critical notices of them, in furtherance of that most beneficial attachment to the Arts, which prompts the tasteful and the wealthy to employ the native talent of their country. Sir JOHN'S Gallery is exclusively British.

IMPROMPTU

ON HEARING A GENTLEMAN EXCLAIM, THAT MR. CANNING WAS DEAD TO ALL SENSE OF FEELING.

Oh! say not so, for tho' death-pangs
May serve for him to scoff and mock at,
Yet he, kind soul! oft deeply feels—

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Princess of WALES lately filed a bill against the Earl of LIVERPOOL and Count MUNSTER, the Executors of the late Duke of BRUNSWICK, her brother, claiming the repayment of 15,000*l.* sterling, stated to have been lent by her to her brother in the month of August, 1814, and to have been secured by three different written engagements from the Duke (two of the engagements being deposited at Mr. COUTTS'S office). Lord LIVERPOOL and Count MUNSTER made an application to the LORD CHANCELLOR, that the Princess of WALES should be compelled to produce the third instrument before they answered the bill. The LORD CHANCELLOR called upon Count MUNSTER to make an affidavit, stating his reasons why this instrument should be produced before the bill was answered; and, in consequence of the affidavit made by Count MUNSTER, the LORD CHANCELLOR, on Tuesday, made an order that the Princess of WALES should produce the instrument.

Count MUNSTER'S affidavit was not suffered to be read openly in Court, for what good reason we are yet to learn. A copy, however, has got abroad; and as the reasons urged by Count MUNSTER are very singular, and may give rise to important considerations, and perhaps important proceedings, we give it at length, with this one remark, that under the peculiar circumstances in which the PRINCESS is placed, every thing advanced concerning her should be examined with infinite caution.

IN CHANCERY,

Between her Royal Highness Caroline Augusta Princess of Wales, by Anthony Butler St. Leger, her next Friend, Plaintiff; and Robert Banks Earl of Liverpool, and Ernest Frederick Herbert Count Munster, Defendants.

Ernest Frederick Herbert Count Munster, of Grosvenor-place, in the county of Middlesex, one of the above-named defendants, maketh oath, and saith, that he hath been informed and believes that in or about the latter end of the year 1816 her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales sent to the Right Hon. George Canning, one of the executors named in the will of the late Duke of Brunswick (but who hath not proved the will), two instruments in writing, one in the German language and one in the French language, both dated on the 24th day of August, 1814, purporting to be to the same effect, and to be engagements on the part of the late Duke of Brunswick, to repay to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, in two years, with interest, the sum of 15,000*l.* sterling, therein stated to be lent by her Royal Highness to the Duke of Brunswick; and this deponent further saith, he hath been informed and believes that the said two instruments were deposited by Mr. Canning with Messrs. Coutts and Co. bankers, in the Strand; and this deponent saith, that on the 7th day of February, 1818, this deponent attended the said Messrs. Coutts and Co. and there were then present Mr. Canning and Mr. Le Blanc, the solicitor of this deponent, and the Earl of Liverpool, a party in this suit, and also Mr. Brougham, and several other Gentlemen, who appeared to this deponent to attend with him, but who are not known to this deponent. And this deponent saith, that Mr. Coutts then produced the said two written instruments, and that they were on that occasion inspected by this deponent, and several of the other persons present. And this deponent saith, that he had, for many years previous to the late Duke of Brunwick's death been honoured with his confidence, and had been in habits of continued correspondence with him, and was intimately acquainted with his manner of writing, both in the German and in the French language, and has in his possession a great number of letters and other papers in both languages, written by the said late Duke; and this deponent took with him to the said meeting at Mr. Coutts's, one German letter and one French letter, written by the said late Duke, for the purpose of comparing them with the said instruments. And this deponent further saith, that the said instrument in the German language appeared to this deponent, upon the comparison with the said German letter, written by the said late Duke, to be an imperfect resemblance of the hand-writing of the said letter, and that neither the spelling nor the construction of the said written instrument were equal to the manner of the said late Duke, who well understood and wrote the German language, which was his own vernacular language, and especially that there were certain expressions in the said written instrument which were unmeaning, and absurd in the German language, and which appeared to this deponent to be borrowed from the English idiom—Thus: the German word "auf" is used in the said instrument as equivalent to the English word "of," which has nearly the same sound; whereas the German word "auf" signifies "upon;" and thus instead of speaking of a sum "of" 15,000*l.*, the instrument when translated speaks of a sum "upon" 15,000*l.*; and instead "of" Duke of Brunswick, it speaks of Duke "upon" Brunswick; and instead of the month "of" August, speaks of the month "upon" August; and the Christian name of the late Duke in the signature is mis-spelt, and different from his habit of writing, being "Willehelm" instead of "Wilhelm;" and the same is signed Brunswick et D'Oels, which signature, or the signature Brunswick Oels, the late Duke did adopt during the time he was dispossessed of his dominions by the French, but this deponent believes he did not use after his return to his dominions in the autumn of the year 1813. And this deponent further saith, that the said written instrument in the French language appeared to this deponent upon comparison with the French letter of the said Duke to be also an imperfect resemblance of the hand-writing of the said letter, and that the construction of the said written instrument did not appear to be equal to the manner of the said late Duke of Brunswick in writing French; and that the signature of the said instrument was also Brunswick et D'Oels, which this deponent believes, as aforesaid, the late Duke was not in the habit of using when the said instruments bear date; and this deponent further saith, that her said Royal Highness hath in her said bill filed against the Earl of Liverpool and this deponent, founded her claim upon the said written instrument in the French language for the repayment of 15,000*l.* sterling; and also upon another instrument in the French language of the same date for the repayment of 15,000 Louis de France; and this deponent is informed and believes, that in the month of April, 1817, her Royal Highness caused the said latter instrument to be produced for payment in Brunswick; and this deponent is advised and verily believes, that previous to putting in his answer to the said bill it is necessary, in order that his answer may fully meet the case, that he should have the inspection of the said last-mentioned instrument.

Sworn at my Chambers, Southampton-buildings, the 13th of March, 1818, before me—S. Harvey.

MUNSTER.

THE PRINCE AND THE PROVOST.

"It is well known (says a Correspondent) that the Dean and Canons of Windsor have been turned out of their stalls for their gross violation of etiquette, in admitting the pages of Prince LEOPOLD into the choir of St. George's Chapel, at the funeral of our late lamented Princess, to the exclusion of some of the menial servants of the PRINCE REGENT. The Provost of Eton, who is also a Canon of Windsor, was once distinguished by the favour of an illustrious Personage; but it must be in the recollection of our readers, that at the last Eton Montem, when the PRINCE REGENT was seized by a common soldier who had been stationed to keep off the crowd, that Reverend Gentleman had the indiscretion to laugh. The offence, we presume, has not been forgiven, for at the late levee, the Provost of Eton, who was accompanied by the Honourable and Reverend the Dean of Windsor, was for a long time unnoticed. He was at length however accosted with the following exquisite piece of railery:—"You have been long in the habit of turning others upon their seats, and you are now turned off your's."—To comprehend the full pith and delicacy of the allusion, our readers must not only recollect that the Provost was Master of Eton, but they must call in aid the beautiful image of a celebrated political posture-master, who, in expatiating upon the ignorant impatience of the people, lamented that they should "turn their backs upon themselves."—Louis the Fourteenth once, and once only, made an effort to be facetious: the solitary joke is upon record, and, as far as the wit of that Monarch is concerned, posterity is grateful for his frugality. It would not be candid to place the facetious sally, which we have just cited, in the same class with that of the French Monarch.—In the first place, it may not be unique; at all events, as time is necessary to the development of fancy, we think it pretty well for a beginning. There are other circumstances, such as rank and title, which are said to be of singular efficacy in promoting the maturity of wit; and as the poet has cautioned us against pronouncing upon a man's prosperity till he is fairly dead and buried, we should observe a similar reserve in respect to his wit, till we see whether he inherits the estate. The Master of the Mint has, with a laudable discrimination, distinguished some of our coin by the title of Half-Sovereigns; and with a due regard for so respectable an authority, we think the facetious effusion, which we have recorded for the astonishment of our readers, may, with great propriety, be denominated half-witted."

Rumour says, that at the interview which the Duke of CLARENCE had with Ministers on the subject of his marriage with Miss WICKHAM, they stated the objection that there was to the Royal Assent; but intimated, that to an union with a Royal Princess of a Foreign Protestant House the assent of his Royal Highness the PRINCE REGENT in Council would be given. The Duke of CLARENCE consented to this arrangement, and an offer of an alliance with a youthful Princess of Hesse has been transmitted by a special Messenger.—Morning Chronicle.

We noticed, last week, a report which had just reached us, that the Duke of CUMBERLAND had interceded in behalf of Kelly and Spicer. We are now enabled to state positively, that as soon as his Royal Highness was informed of the doubts which had arisen respecting the guilt of the two lads, he humanely expressed his willingness to contribute his assistance towards attaining the object of the Committee who had investigated the subject, and, with a zeal and promptitude which do honour to his feelings, represented the circumstances of the case so strongly to Lord SIDMOUTH, as to induce his Lordship to grant a respite, in order to afford time for further investigation. Such exertions in the cause of justice and humanity will always be justly appreciated by the people of this country. For our own parts, we have always commented with severity upon the conduct of men who possess the power of doing good and neglect to use it; and upon the same principle of justice, we gladly seize the opportunity of bestowing praise, where praise is due.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 315.

An Opera, entitled The Barber of Seville (Il Barbiere di Siviglia), from the pen of Signor ROSSINI, a young living composer at Rome, has been produced here for the first time in this country. High expectations were entertained of it, especially as it had been performed with great success at various theatres in Italy; but we were among those who thought, that the author's having taken up an opera to set to music, which had been already composed by so fine a master as PAESIELLO, was not a piece of ambition in the best taste, or a very promising symptom of excellence. We expected that we should find little genius exhibited, at least on the score of sentiment; and we conceive that we were not disappointed.

The great excellence of the Italian school (which with all our admiration of MOZART appears to us to be much undervalued now-a-days, partly owing to undoubted merit in the German school, and partly to a court fashion for that school) consists in fine melody and expression. They take up one passion after another, and give you the genuine elementary feeling of it, as if they were undergoing and totally occupied with it themselves. PAESIELLO's compositions are special instances of this power of expression. His melodies are exquisitely graceful, touching, and original; and his recitatives always appear to us so extremely to the purpose, as to be superior even to those of that delightful German by nation, and Italian by nature, MOZART.

In neither of these main qualities, will Signor ROSSINI's Opera, in our opinion, bear any comparison. We should be loth to speak so decidedly, after only one hearing; but what renders an Opera most delightful, and makes one recur to it over and over again and grow fonder on acquaintance, is a succession of beautiful airs; and of these the new Barbiere di Siviglia appears to us to be destitute. We do not recollect one. The passages most resembling them struck us as being traceable to HAYDN, MOZART, and to PAESIELLO himself; and the recitative is singularly bald and common-place. You might always know the comment which the fiddle-bow was going to make. An intelligent daily critic notices, we observe, the resemblance to HAYDN of Zitti, zitti, piano, piano, the most favourite passage in the Opera. On the other hand, the piece is not destitute of merit, or even, considering the author's youth, of great promise, though not on the higher sides of genius. Its good qualities are a sort of sprightly vehemence, and a talent for expressing oddities of character. We have unfortunately lost our copy of the book; but we have a strong recollection of the most striking passages. Some of them fairly beat it into us. They were the more hurried parts in general, the entrance of the Count in the disguise of a singing master, the groans of old Bartolo, and the scene where Figaro and his master have so much difficulty in getting rid of a set of fellows, who have a prodigious pertinacity. We never met with a composer who gave us such an harmonious sense of discord,—who set to music with such vivacity what is vulgarly called a row. The rest of the opera is of a piece with this kind of talent, not good in the graver, more sentimental, and graceful parts; but exceedingly promising in the ardent, vehement, and more obviously comic. The general effect is raw and inconsistent. Sometimes, for instance, there is hardly any accompaniment, sometimes a numerous one; sometimes the stage is all in a bustle, and sometimes unaccountably quiet. One feature is particularly worth notice; which is, that the young author, in a sort of conscious despair of a proper quantity of ideas, dashes his crotchets about, as it were, at random: and among a number of grotesque effects, gives now and then a fine hit. He resembles, in the latter respect, the ancient painter, who in a fit of impatience at not being able to express foam at the mouth of a hound, dashed his sponge against the animal's jaws, and produced the very thing he despaired of.

We have taken it for granted all this while that Signor ROSSINI is young, as reported. If not, he will hardly become eminent; but if he is, he undoubtedly may be so; provided he is not as noisy and vehement as his music, and does not get his wild head broken some day, for some over-vivacious serenade.

FINE ARTS.

THE ARTS AT PLYMOUTH.

Extract from a Letter Mr. HAYDON received from Plymouth, relating to the Academy, &c.

"More than two years since I told you of the probability there was of our having an Exhibition Room and Academy in your native town." * * * * *

"A building is immediately to be erected, and ground is already purchased; sufficient money is subscribed for the undertaking; the design has been furnished by Mr. Foulstone:—it is a pure Greek Temple; and as provision is to be made for Casts in the Architectural arrangements, will you inform the Committee in what way you can assist us? * * * * *

I write by their express desire," &c.

Now surely, Sir, this Gentleman's assertions are likely to be as correct as N.'s! Perhaps N. is a Lecturer on Literature, and therefore declares, with a laudable jealousy, for its interests and honour, that the building is not exclusively an Academy of Painting, and the Correspondent is an Artist, and equally alive to the dignity of the Art.—N. is requested to answer the following questions:—Was not application made relating to the Casts from the Elgin Marbles? If so (as application was made), were Casts from the Elgin Marbles for young men to draw from, or for Lectures on Literature? If Casts were for young men to draw from, as they most undoubtedly were, and Architectural arrangements were to be made for their reception, as to light, &c. how could Lectures on Literature, once a week during the winter only, prevent young men drawing there every other day in the week, winter and summer too? And how can an Exhibition for two months in the year hinder study for the remaining eight?

If a building is to be erected in which an Exhibition of Paintings is to take place every year—if Architectural arrangements are to be made for the reception of Casts—if Elgin Casts are to be had, and they are intended for young men to study from—if young men can study and draw from them eight months out of the twelve, and Lectures on Literature, &c. are only to be given once a week during winter, for what purpose ought the building to be considered, rather as referring to an Institution for the general purposes of literature, in which Art was a secondary consideration, or an Academy for the purposes of Art, in which science and literature were admitted now and then for recreation?

B. R. H.

MR. CANNING'S WIT.

Sir,—Mr. Canning is a very witty gentleman; when his wit, however, delights to expatiate upon the sufferings of an old man under the tortures of an operation for hernia, there are few human beings who will envy him his possession of that faculty. For my part, although I have been accustomed to the performance of such operations, I never thought them to be fit subjects for a joke; but Mr. Canning is a man of taste,—a very peculiar taste perhaps,—but de gustibus non disputandum.

After this display of wit and taste, I shall expect to hear of his receiving the appointment of Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of Spain. As Ferdinand is at home, he may there find something to do for his money. He would win the heart of that beloved Monarch. No one could ridicule with so much success the sufferings of the Patriots whom his gracious Majesty may be pleased to put to the torture.

Mr. Canning may also be a very clever Gentleman; but upon one subject, at least, I can prove him to be "mainly ignorant." I know nothing of Ogden or of his petition, but I do know, that when Mr. Canning talked of his having had a rupture for twenty-four years, and of his having taken the opportunity, which his imprisonment afforded him, of having it cured at the public expense—I do know, that when Mr. Canning talked thus, he talked like a blockhead. A man may have a rupture for fifty years, and may die of old age, without having suffered considerably in consequence of it. No one under such circumstances would be mad enough to submit to a painful and dangerous operation, nor would any surgeon be mad enough to perform it. The operation is not intended to cure the disease, in Mr. Canning's acceptance of the term, nor when it is performed does it always produce that effect. The circumstances then which call for an operation remain to be explained, and I will endeavour to do this in as plain a dialect as possible.

A man, as I said before, may have had rupture for many years. It may not have been alarming or even very inconvenient to him, but at length something may occur by which the rupture may become strangulated, or incarcerated—inflammation then takes place, and generally speaking, the passage through the bowels becomes obstructed. His sufferings are dreadful, and if the evil is not remedied it must inevitably terminate in mortification or death. It is under these circumstances that the operation is called for, and if performed in time, it generally saves the life of the patient, and sometimes, but not constantly, prevents the recurrence of the rupture.

Now, Sir, this might have been the case of the poor old man, whose sufferings have been the theme of Mr. Canning's wit, and these sufferings may all have been occasioned, and his life of course endangered, by the weight of his fetters, by jolting in carts, by exposure to cold, or by some other hardships of which I suppose he complained. I stated before, that I knew nothing of Ogden or of his petition: it may have been false, and he may have been an impostor; but this has not been proved, and indeed nothing is proved by Mr. Canning's witty speech but his own hard-heartedness and ignorance.

As Mr. Canning is not a surgeon, it was not necessary that he should know what I have stated above; but it is, I think, necessary that he should refrain from talking upon subjects that he does not understand, and, I may add, from talking unfeelingly upon any subject.—I am, your obedient servant,

A SURGEON.

TREATMENT OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

Sir,—Some time since you inserted a cautionary letter to nurses, on the dreadful risk they run of suffocating infants by covering their mouths, and thus preventing any accession of air; for every animal destroys the air it breathes. An infant requires the circulation of at least a gallon of air every minute, in the room of that which his breathing has deprived of its elasticity, otherwise the air refuses its help to the flagging lungs; nature labours in horrible agony; in vain the little wretch gasps unseen, till death puts an end to his sufferings. It is only a week since this afflicting description was realized; A poor woman, walking in the storm of wind and sleet from Hunsdon to Ware, sheltered her baby so effectually with her cloak, that, dreadful to tell, when she arrived, the poor child which she fancied asleep was dead.

The cases of actual death from suffocation perhaps but rarely occur; but the daily misery of a child so covered in his cradle is frightful, particularly when he acquires sense enough to know the cause of his suffering, and has an horror of the smothering he is about to undergo. I have seen such an one fight against the bed clothes with strength and perseverance almost incredible in a little helpless infant, and the cruel kindness of his fond but stupid mother finally secure him. Will not the patriot, who pants for liberty, pity and aid these little folks in their struggles for freedom? The atmosphere of a prison is free compared to that of the child's downy dungeon. Every enlightened man should use his influence to put an end to this practice of ignorant women, the worst of which is, that the torment is repeated daily, unless death puts an end to their charge at once, a consummation, I had almost said, devoutly to be wished.

FORGED NOTES.

A General Half-yearly Meeting of the Proprietors of Bank Stock was held on Thursday, when the CHAIRMAN announced that the approaching dividend should be 5 per cent. for the half-year ending on the 6th of April-next. This declaration was immediately sanctioned by the vote of the Proprietors.

The question of adjournment was then put.

Mr. B. SHAW rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the Court to the subject of the manufacture of bank-notes. The circumstances almost daily represented in the newspapers had deeply impressed his mind with the necessity of considering whether the existing evil did not admit of remedy. It was impossible not to see and admit the great disproportion between the present severity of punishment and the facility of committing the crime. What he wished to suggest was the propriety of some public notification, holding out encouragements to Artists, with a view of discovering some mode of rendering bank-notes less capable of imitation. He was induced to think that this was by no means an impracticable object, having seen some plans devised for the purpose, and also from what he had himself seen in Newgate, as well as from what he had learned in conversation from that exemplary woman, Mrs. Fry.

Mr. THOMSON declared, that without meaning the slightest reflection on the Directors, he thought it a duty they owed to the lower classes of society to adopt every practicable means of diminishing the facility with which the forgery of their notes was committed. As an additional precaution, he would recommend the withdrawing all one and two-pound notes from circulation, and substituting a metallic currency in their place.

The Chairman (Mr. HARMAN) observed, that the two Hon. Members had done the Directors no more than justice in supposing that they were anxious to adopt any practicable remedy to the evil in question. It required but common humanity in them to be so disposed, and he trusted that no proprietor would think them deficient in that quality. The Court might rely upon it that this was an object which they had very near at heart.—(Hear, hear.)—They might also be assured, that the subject, instead of having been taken up within a few days, had engaged their attention for 20 years; and that a Committee had sat regularly for 15 years, for the purpose of devising some mode of manufacturing notes which might render forgery less frequent; but the difficulties were much greater than was generally imagined: still it did not become him to say that a remedy was impossible, and he could assure the Proprietors, that no endeavours would be wanting on the part of the Directors to accomplish so desirable an object. He could have wished, indeed, that the topic had not been introduced, because it might be the cause of sending forth an erroneous impression among the public. As to the suggestion with regard to the withdrawing small notes from circulation, it must be obvious that this was a subject that was intimately connected with a general question of too great importance to be discussed on this occasion. He begged to repeat his assurance, that the discovery of some mode of checking the facility with which forgeries were now committed was a subject that occupied the attention of the Directors night and day, and that every possible endeavour for that purpose should continue to be used.—(Hear, hear.)

The Court then adjourned.

LAW.

JURY COURT, SCOTLAND.

On Thursday week the Court proceeded to try the issue in the cause in which Gen. Matthew Baillie, of Cranbroe, was pursuer, and James Bryson, surgeon, in Hamilton, was defender. This was the second action of crim. con. ever tried before a Scottish Jury. The issue sent by the Second Division of the Court of Session to be tried was—"Whether the defender did, on the 1st day of January, 1812, seduce and maintain an adulterous connection, and did commit adultery, with Mrs. Elizabeth Cross, or Boys, then the wife of the pursuer, at the pursuer's house at Cranbroe, or in the neighbourhood thereof?"—The damages were laid at 10,000*l*.

The nature of the evidence in this case prevents us from giving any account of it. Ill usage of the Lady, and introducing into the house four natural children of the pursuer's, was dwelt upon as matters of aggravation and alleviation of damages. The act of adultery was positively denied, and rested solely upon circumstantial proof. A great number of witnesses were examined for both parties, and the Jury were charged by Mr. John Clerk, for the defender, and by Mr. Jeffery, for the pursuer, in reply.

The LORD CHIEF COMMISSIONER summed up; and the Jury having retired, returned in half an hour, finding the charges in the issue Not Proven.—The verdict of the Jury was hailed, by a crowded Court, with the greatest applause.

The defender is married to the sister of the pursuer's wife.

MURDERS AT GREENWICH.

On Monday an examination took place before W. Smith, Esq., and a number of Magistrates, at the office at Greenwich, when the following witnesses were examined, charging William Hazledon on suspicion of being accessory to the murder of Mr. George Bird and Mrs. Mary Simmons, and Charles Hussey (not yet in custody) with being the actual perpetrator of the said murders.

Mrs. Godwin, of Peckham, said she was the sister of Hussey. About a week after the murders, her brother came to her house and said that he was going to Basingstoke. He went to a box under her bed, and took something out; she supposed it was money, for he had 67*l*. left him four days after the murders were committed, by a sister (who cut her throat). He informed her that he (Hussey) should return in one week, but he did not return until Tuesday. She then said to him, "Oh, Charles, I have been so uneasy during your absence, I have had such frightful dreams." He replied, "Why, what could cause you to dream?" and appeared agitated. He went out. After he was gone, she said to her husband, "I think there is something in Charles's box there that should not be." His behaviour caused her to say so. She unlocked the box, and found the two watches then before the Magistrates. She did not examine further, but mentioned the circumstance to her husband; he advised they should be taken to Greenwich; for it occurred to him they were Mr. Bird's property. Their suspicion was further confirmed from Charles not returning.

Mr. Bird, son of the late Mr. G. Bird, identified both watches as his late father's property.

Mrs. Goddard, of Deptford, stated, that she was aunt to Charles Hussey's wife. About a week after the murders, a trunk was brought to her house by a man named Sutton, who said that Charles had sent it. Charles Hussey did not come near her house after the trunk was left, and daily enquiries were made after him, which caused her to suspect that all was not right. Curiosity induced her and her husband, on Wednesday last, to open the trunk. She found a silver ladle, and several other articles of silver plate; also some bloody clothes. She suspected that Charles had not come honestly by the property, and went over to Peckham, to inform his sister, where she learned the discovery she had made.

Richard Hodges stated that he and his brother constable went to Mrs. Goddard's, where they searched a trunk, and found a silver wine strainer, a soup-spoon, two shirts, three pair of sheets, a white Jane jacket, stained with blood in several places, especially about the right hand pocket; a pair of gaiters, made of drab cloth, with blood upon the buttons of them; a piece of new shirting, which was very bloody, and a glazed hat.—After finding these things, he went to Mrs. Godwin's, and searched the box there belonging to Hussey, and found five one-pound Bank of England notes, and two two-pound Bank of England. One of the two-pound notes was endorsed "February 13th, 1817. Nims 2*no*."

Mr. Nimmo, tallow-chandler, said, that the two-pound note, endorsed "Feb. 13, 1817, Nimmo," he believed was the property of the late Mr. Bird. He believed that he paid it to him on the day mentioned on the note. The endorsement was his handwriting.

Mrs. Bell, washerwoman to the deceased Mr. Bird for 18 years, knew the linen very well. One of the three pair of sheets produced she could positively swear were the property of the late Mr. Bird, and also the two shirts.

Mrs. Sutton stated, that the jacket and gaiters found in Hussey's box were the apparel she had seen him wear.

Mr. Hussey, brother of Charles Hussey, resided at Peckham; Charles was to have dined with him on the day the murders were discovered, but did not come until night. He asked him how it was that he had not kept his word? and he replied, "Why, have you not heard of the most shocking murders that have been committed? why, Greenwich has been all day like a fair;" and then informed him of the particulars. He noticed that he looked very unwell. He said, "I have drank some beer, and that has made me very sick." He appeared much agitated. On Tuesday last, Charles Hussey went into Tottenham-court-road, to see his brother, and never returned. His wife said something preyed upon her mind, and particularly wished him to open Charles's box: he told her it was all folly; and she went and opened it herself; the moment he saw the watches, the Greenwich murder occurred to him, and finding that Charles did not return, he sent his wife to the church-wardens. He thought it probable that Charles Hussey was gone to see his wife, who was lying in at her friends at Burton, in Dorsetshire.

Hazeldon stated, that he had no knowledge of the murder whatever. He felt himself very much hurt at the reports which had appeared in the Newspapers, charging him with being concerned in such a transaction.

MAGISTRATE.—You know that you were drinking with him until six o'clock the night the murders were committed, and you were his companion always drinking together; and you being a servant out of place, must get money by some means to be able to live that way.

Prisoner.—I acknowledge that I was with him on the Saturday; I drank with him at the Tiger's Head, and afterwards we went to the Ship and Biller, on the Woolwich-road, where we parted, and I went to my father's, where I slept that night. I hope you will take bail, as I am innocent.

MAGISTRATE.—There is such evidence against you as warrants me to detain you. I do not say you were concerned, but you were the last person with the man who I am satisfied did commit the murders. He probably will be in custody to-morrow, and circumstances then may occur that will cause me to hold you to bail.

On Wednesday another examination took place, when Mr. John Luton, cooper, said, he knew Charles Hussey from his living with Mr. Stevenson. About a fortnight before Christmas Hussey informed him that he had left Mr. Stevenson; he brought a box, and requested him (Mr. L.) to allow him to deposit it in his house until he got a situation. While it was in his house, he frequently came and took out changes of linen and other things. Hussey was very lively in spirits both before and after the murders were committed. About a week before the murders, Hussey came into his house and cleaned his shoes, and his pantaloon with pipe-clay. He did not see him after that time until Sunday (the day after the murders), in the afternoon. He did not enter any apartment, but said he wanted to go to the privy. He came out of the yard in about a quarter of an hour, and sat by the fire; the murders had been then discovered only a few hours. Hussey was rather intoxicated. When he came in he had a small bundle, and he went to his box with it. He (witness) spoke to him about the dreadful murders; he replied, "It is a most shocking affair," and turned the conversation by saying that he had promised to go to his brother's, at Peckham, to dine; but he had disappointed him. About three weeks ago, he came and asked Mrs. Luton if she knew any one who could carry the box to Deptford. Mrs. Luton asked him (the witness) if he would carry it, he said yes; he carried it, and Hussey paid him one shilling for it. About a fortnight before the murder, he was using a cooper's hammer, and missed it about three o'clock in the afternoon, and never could find it afterwards. It was a hammer of that description which might have been used by Hussey to commit the murders. He believed Hussey was at his house when he lost his hammer.—Hazeldon used to sit in his apartments while Hussey was cleaning himself and changing his linen. He believed they were nearly always together.

Mr. Sainlaw, the landlord of the Tiger's head, stated that Hussey had lodged at his house occasionally for nine weeks. On the Saturday night the murders were committed, Hussey was at his house at ten o'clock at night. He believed that Hussey did not go out of the house after that time; he could not be certain; he was positive that he slept at his house that night. He got up next morning, and had his breakfast at his house. There might be something different in Hussey's behaviour after the murders, but he never noticed it, as he was, above all others, the last man he should have suspected, from his general mildness and simplicity of manners.

The vessels in the river have been searched, but no person answering Hussey's description found. On Tuesday week he was seen in London by many persons, and some think it probable that he has concealed himself in town. From Hussey being such a remarkable person, it is not likely he can long secrete himself; he has an impediment in his speech, is very fair, and pale faced. He does not look to be more than 24 years of age, and is most remarkable for having an extraordinary large hand and foot. His shoes measure between 13 and 14 inches from heel to toe. No other examination will take place until Hussey is in custody.

The will of Mr. Bird, of Greenwich, was proved on Wednesday: the amount of personal property was sworn under £8,000L, the bulk of which is settled on his son, and his son's children; there is no legacy to the unfortunate person who lived with him as housekeeper.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

Robert Hill, who was remanded from a former day, upon suspicion of being concerned in robbing and attempting to murder Robert Davies, in the neighbourhood of Moorfields, on Tuesday underwent another examination. Thomas Ward and Charles Wheeler, who had been apprehended subsequently to the former investigation, were also put to the bar. The investigation, though long, left the transaction as obscure as before. Hill was discharged, and the other two were remanded.

UNION-HALL.

On Friday se'nnight, about nine o'clock, in Tooley-street, in the Borough, a man was seen pursued by several others, who exclaimed, "Stop him; that is the murderer!" The man was stopped, and taken to the house of one Bush, where it was said he had murdered his own son. The man charged with the murder said, that his name was Fawcett. It appears that his son, a youth between 19 and 20 years of age, lodged at Mr. Bush's house; that the wife also of Fawcett lived with Bush. Fawcett had been confined in Whitecross-street prison, together with Bush; but the latter took the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and got his liberty before the former. Ever since that period, Fawcett has endeavoured to persuade his wife to return to him; but she refused, and he in a state of mind bordering on distraction, on Friday week, went to Bush's house in Joiner-street, with a loaded pistol. When he arrived, he asked Bush's daughter if Mr. Bush was at home? She replied "Yes," and called "Father." Bush, who was in the first floor, along with Fawcett's wife and son, said, "coming," and sent the son down stairs. When the youth got into the shop, Fawcett presented the pistol, and fired it at his son. The pistol was loaded with large slugs. The contents entered his bowels. He immediately fell, and his father ran away. After he was secured he was taken to St. Olave's watch-house; the wounded young man was taken to St. Thomas's Hospital.—On Saturday, Fawcett was brought to Union-hall Police-office.—Mr. W. Speck, solicitor, stated, that he was coming along Tooley-street; heard a loud report, and saw a man run out of a shop with a pistol in his hand; he and his brother, with several others, took him to the watch-house. He had some conversation with the prisoner, who informed him that his wife lived with Bush, and that she had plundered him of his property while in prison to support Bush.—William Bush, potatoe-dealer, stated, that he was up stairs with the prisoner's wife, who has been his housekeeper for some time; the prisoner's son was also with him, and his little girl was down stairs, when the prisoner came into the shop and inquired of her if her father was at home? She called up the stairs "Father," and instead of his going down, the prisoner's son went down. He heard the report of fire-arms, and he immediately called out "Murder," and soon afterwards heard that the prisoner was taken.—J. Hoddinott stated, that he knew the prisoner very well, who always behaved very outrageously, and carried pistols about him, threatening to shoot people who offended him; when he lived with his wife, she took out warrants against him for assaulting her; he was continually beating her. He did not that time think the prisoner was insane.—Jane Cummings saw the prisoner walk towards the bottom of the stairs, and in a moment heard the report of a pistol. The son clapped his hands to his side, and seemed in great agony. The prisoner looked at him very piteously, and with great surprise, as if he had mistaken his man. He did not run away immediately, but expressed sorrow for what he had done. His son fell on his knees, and clasped those of the prisoner's; she also took hold of the prisoner, and said, "You have been committing murder." He made no answer, but turned from her, forced himself out of her grasp, and ran with the pistol in his hand out of the shop.—The surgeon of St. Thomas's Hospital entered at the close of the evidence, and informed the Magistrate that the young man had just expired.—The Prisoner was asked if he had any observations to make. He replied that he had nothing to say at that time. He was committed.

An Inquest sat on Monday on the body of young Fawcett. Nothing new transpired, except the certainty that Bush and Fawcett's wife lived together, and that the son adhered to them instead of living with his father, who is represented as having been perfectly infuriated by this double desertion.—The verdict was Wilful Murder against the father.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MYSTERIOUS CASE OF MURDER!—On Wednesday midnight the body of a young woman, apparently about 26 years of age, was discovered floating in the Medway, at East Barming. It was taken out a shocking spectacle. On the following day an Inquest was held, when the body was inspected by the Jury and Surgeon, who were all of opinion that the deceased had been wilfully murdered. It was supposed that she had been in the water nearly a fortnight. The deceased had no pockets on; nor any thing about her to denote who she was, or from whence she came.—Verdict.—Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown. From the dress and appearance of the deceased, it is thought that she had been a servant in a respectable family. Upon the right temple was a most severe wound, apparently inflicted by a hammer, or some blunt instrument; there were also other bruises on various parts of the body.—Mainstone Gazette.

Monday evening, between seven and eight o'clock, at Mr. Waters, of the Commercial Docks, Rotherhithe, was passing along the Kent-road, near the Blue Anchor, he was attacked by three men; one of them having passed him, suddenly turned round, and placed his hands tight over Mr. Waters's eyes; the others immediately laid hold of him, and with horrid threats and imprecations demanded his watch and money. He hesitated to deliver up his property, when they threw him down, and kicked and beat him in a most inhuman manner. They finally succeeded in robbing him of his watch, 18s. and his hat, with which they effected their escape.

On Tuesday, as a horse and gig were passing into the Haymarket, the horse took fright and ran upon the pavement, sweeping down several persons who were walking along. Of these, one lady and gentleman were severely hurt, but were recovered sufficiently so as to be removed home in a hackney coach. Another gentleman, Mr. Hill Darley, was so severely hurt, having a large and deep wound inflicted in the head by being driven against the iron railing, that he expired in less than half an hour afterwards, whilst his wound was dressing.

Thursday evening an Inquest was held in the New Prison, Clerkenwell, on the body of Frederick Rymell, a prisoner, who put an end to his own existence by cutting his throat on Tuesday morning last. The prisoner was committed for carrying off a hat from the Vice-Chancellor's Court. When the prisoner was searched, 65 guineas in gold, and 30l. in Bank notes were found upon him. He said his name was Fred. Rymell, but refused to tell what he was, where he resided, or who his friends were. He was a mild, respectable looking man, about 66 years of age, with few words, and one of the last men, from his appearance, that could be suspected of a felonious act. The Jury returned a verdict of—Insanity. The body is not owned, consequently there is no person to claim his money. It is supposed he stole the hat in a fit of temporary insanity, and that shame afterwards prevented his giving his right name or residence.

In the beginning of last week, a farmer, near Stirling, having an altercation with his servant girl on account of her refusing to do what she was desired, he, in a rage, threw a pair of tongs at her, which missed his servant, but struck his own child, a girl about 14 years of age, on the head, of which she died soon after.

MARRIAGES.

On the 12th inst. James William Wallack, Esq. of the Theatre-royal, Drury-lane, to Georgiana Susanna, daughter of John Johnstone, Esq. of the same theatre.

On the 13th inst. at Glasgow, Wm. Stirling, Esq. Captain in the Dragoon Guards, youngest son of the late Wm. Stirling, Esq. of Kier, to Mary, second daughter of the late John Anderson, Esq. banker, of London.

On Saturday week, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Jeremiah Dickson, K.C.B. Assistant-Quarter-Master-General, to Jennima, youngest daughter of the late Thomas Langford Brooke, Esq. of Mere Hall, Cheshire.

DEATHS.

On Friday week, after a long and painful illness, aged 33, Emma Georgina Elizabeth, second daughter of the late Erasmus Darwin, M.D. of the Priory.

On Monday, at Hampton Lodge, near Farnham, Mary, the wife of Edward Beeston Long, Esq.

In Tavistock-place, on Monday, Ellen, youngest daughter of Frederic Parry, Esq.; she fell a victim to that fatal disorder the measles, after a most painful and lingering illness. She was a child (adds our Correspondent) of much promise, and bore her sufferings with a fortitude far surpassing her tender age, having just completed her 9th year.

On the 13th instant, at No. 94, Strand, Lieutenant Charles McLaren, late of the 42d Regiment, or Royal Highlanders, of a protracted illness from the wounds which he received at the battle of Toulouse. To a numerous and extended circle of friends, his premature death will be a subject of deep regret. His intrepid conduct, when at the head of the Grenadiers of that gallant Regiment, at the Pyrenees, Orthes, and Toulouse, will long live in the recollection of those who witnessed his undaunted courage. On Wednesday his remains were interred in St. Clement's Church-yard, attended by several of his brother Officers, who were in that Regiment with him during the war in the Peninsula.

On Tuesday week, aged 26, James Birkin, of Hood's-yard, Derby, one of the victims to the system of espionage and cruelty, which has been ascribed to "Oliver and the Government," leaving a wife and two small children wholly dependent on the parish for support. Previous to the 18th of June, 1817, the day of his apprehension, he was a strong healthy man, and apparently bid fair to live for many years; but according to a document in his own hand-writing, now lying before us, he was taken out of his bed on the 18th of June, in the middle of the night, and conveyed to the County Jail at Derby; on the following morning he was chained to Wm. Cliff, and taken to London. On the 21st he was brought before Lord Sidmouth, who sent him into close confinement in Coldbath-fields; on the 23d he was conveyed to Lincoln Castle, where he remained in solitary confinement until the 5th of December, and was then removed to Leicester, where he remained till the 23d, on which day he was discharged with a one pound note in his pocket, and in a very bad state of health. Thus his imprisonment, solitary imprisonment, lasted six months and five days.—In the written statement above referred to, he says, "After I had been in Lincoln Castle about two months, I was taken ill, owing to the dampness of my cell, which I felt afterwards increase very rapid, until the 4th of December, when I received an order to prepare for Leicester, which order gave me a great shock, and I was taken to Leicester in a very ill state of health; and after remaining in Leicester seventeen days, and my illness being represented to Lord Sidmouth, he sent me my discharge. At my return, not being able to work, I was obliged to apply to the parish for support, who allowed me nine shillings a week to support a wife and two children, which is all I have to depend on."—Birkin's silence since he was liberated has occasioned some surprise amongst those who knew him; but the mystery has been unravelled by the following statement, which we give in his own words:—"On my journey from Lincoln to Leicester, I staid at Derby one night, and was visited by Mr. Lockett, an attorney lately employed by Government, and Alderman Leaper, of Derby. I was then in a very ill state of health; and expected that a few weeks more solitary confinement would consign my body to the grave; they seeing my ill state of health, occasioned by imprisonment, promised to get me liberated on the following conditions;—me owning myself in fault, and giving them a paper to that effect; this I consider to be a barrier to my making my case public.—JAMES BIRKIN."—Nottingham Review.

ON THE EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN MANUFACTORIES.

We are happy in being able, from the recess of Parliament, to give publicity to the following letter immediately and entire. We shall turn our own first article into a preface to it; and our first observation is, that Mr. OWEN, on this occasion, is liable to none of the usual objections, either from practical men or speculative. He leaves, in all conscience, quite enough of the ordinary notions of profit to those whom money-getting has not absolutely brutalized; and what he recommends to the consideration of our modern legislators is strictly within their province. We shall say nothing at present, for obvious reasons, on what he is entitled to expect from the Ministers; or on what he himself may expect or otherwise; but as to the effect of his endeavours in general, to his most valuable and honourable enthusiasm, and so that very bad answer to it, "How is one man to make alterations in society?"—we refer to the whole course of history,—to the many great alterations, civil and religious, that have been made at various times in society, almost always traceable to some individual spirit,—and to the obvious conclusion, that if one alteration has been made, another may be so too. Novelty proves nothing but that the alteration has not yet been made, not that it cannot be; and the self-love is not on the side of him who has the courage to attempt or rather the perseverance to go on with it, but of those who, because they cannot alter things immediately, chuse to think that none can alter them at any time. It is not the impossibility of the achievement, but the failure of individual enthusiasm, that puts a stop to so many reforms, and furnishes hopeless arguments for those who are the perpetuators of hopelessness. Most people get worldly; others get merely tired, or irritated, or are borne down with envy and malice, or are disappointed in some particular personal object, or argue against endeavour from that very magnitude of the evil which is the greatest argument for it. Luckily, we see, there are some who do not; some of them have even succeeded in their objects, others are yet to do so; but it is at least clear, that if the former had halted in their enthusiasm, they would not have succeeded; and the intellect and conscious wants of the present age, as cannot be too often repeated, have two most formidable allies, which in no extensive sense of the words ever appeared in the world before,—the widely extended Press, and that new, acknowledged, and gigantic offspring of modern times, Public Opinion.

This question however has little to do with the immediate subject before us. An allusion to it is only a proper and not useless compliment to the dignity of a nature like Mr. OWEN's, for whom the very least that any of us can do, is to listen to him in matters like the present. He has treated the graspers at profit with sufficient tenderness,—a charity, for which we certainly do not quarrel with him; since they, as well as other mistaken and unhappy persons, who only attempt to bully themselves into a notion that they are otherwise, are victims of the same foolish system of things, though in a different way. But we really cannot help blushing for the degradation to which this grasping propensity has reduced our countrymen, when we hear this excellent person obliged to remonstrate with them in terms as profitable as he can use against the custom of making children from 7 to 12 years of age work incessantly for 12, 13, 14, and even 15 hours a day, and in heated atmospheres! Nay, if we did not believe that he had a philosophical purpose in proposing an amendment so gradual, we should almost suspect that habits of trade had left some check even upon his own noble disposition, when we hear him allowing as many hours for work as he dogs, especially when we consider how short the days are at some seasons in this country. But undoubtedly he has a hard task even in a matter thus obvious. So dreadful has been the mistake into which avarice has brought us! So little can we see profit or pleasure but in things diametrically opposite to all the profits and pleasures that nature lays forth for us,—turning ourselves from health, and reasonable industry, and kindness, and happy theories, and the deserted green fields, to disease, and toil, and discord, and superstition, and smoky cities! But individuals have begun the work of reformation; and let individuals persevere, and numbers will fall in with them. Blight the acorn, and no oak will arise; but let the acorn grow, and we should laugh at the ephemeral insect who pronounced it impossible that it should ever shadow us with a world of leaves.

We have ourselves been eye witnesses of the misery in manufacturing towns, great and small. We shall never forget the shoals of prematurely spoilt children in the one, vicious, impudent, and even care-worn; nor the dismal out-of-door silence in the other, which was nevertheless in one of the most luxuriant spots in England. Close to it was a little village of ragged and squalid tenantry, employed in the same manufacture; and close to that village, and fronting the whole town itself, was the extensive and finely-wooded domain of the brother of one of our ministers, of foreign and trading origin. We are silent just now respecting some remarkable particulars; but we are most sincerely of Mr. OWEN's opinion, that the extreme inequalities of society in some matters must either be better managed or will infallibly alter themselves; and as to the tendency to complaint so constantly alledged against the lower orders, it is in the first place not true, except in the most extremely wretched times; and in the second place, to complain is surely the least privilege that can be allowed to human beings steeped up to the lips in misery. The complaint against complaint is indeed one of the most disgusting features in the callousness produced by false wealth and luxury. We will affirm, that the suffering part of th people all over Europe, not excepting those of France, who in a manner went mad from previous ill-usage, have shewn themselves patient to a most extraordinary degree. No decent human being could deny it, who saw and knew what we have seen and known. And we gather from it this one consoling reflection, and as far as we are aware, not an old or unstriking one;—that the gentler qualities of human nature, which can be thus venerably quiet, and inclined to acquiescence and long-suffering, under evil systems, exhibit by this means a proof how consistent and lasting they could be if the human passions once got better direction under a good one.

The Italics in the following letter are of our own marking. They must not prevent our readers from paying great attention to the other passages; to which perhaps such distinctions do not do justice; but we could not help making them. We have read the letter ourselves twice over: and shall read it again:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF LIVERPOOL.

My Lord,—Permit me to address your Lordship in your capacity of Prime Minister of the British Empire, on a subject of national concern, which, though it has excited considerable interest in certain quarters, appears not to be understood or appreciated by the public at large in any degree commensurate with its real importance. A Bill on the employment of children in manufactures has been twice read in the House of Commons, passed through the Committee, had its blanks filled up, and is to be read a third time the first Monday in April. I noticed the debates which took place on its first and second reading, and have just received a copy of the Bill as amended by the Committee.

This Bill is opposed, it seems, by a number of active wealthy cotton-spinners, good men of business, several of whom are members of the House of Commons, and who are capable of forming a formidable opposition to any measure which they imagine will affect their interests. Its supporters are those who condemn the practices which at present prevail in our manufactories as many cases injurious to the children. The subject, however, seems to be taken up by both parties on very confined grounds. Its extensive bearings on the general interests of the nation have been very imperfectly, or hardly at all, considered; and its strong claims on the attention of Government and of the Country, in consequence, very feebly insisted upon. The manufacturers look at it simply as mercantile men, under an alarm that the regulations proposed may in some way or other diminish a fraction of their profits. The fear of loss of pecuniary gain to men trained in the principles of trade and manufactures is very natural. Their station in society, and, in many instances, their very subsistence, depends on success in their several occupations. Their labours and anxieties too are very great, and except in a few instances, which in consequence are always prominent, they are very inadequately remunerated for their toil and care. Under these circumstances, it is reasonable to conclude that every object must be viewed by them through the medium of mercantile calculation; and no one can justly blame them for, or be surprised at, the jealous activity which they exhibit on all occasions where their interests, real or imaginary, are attacked. For these and other reasons, the natural course of trade, manufactures, and commerce, should not be disturbed, except when it interferes with measures affecting the well being of the whole community, in which case minor considerations ought of course at all times to give way. The practices which prevail in our manufactories form, in a peculiar manner, one of these exceptions. They interfere essentially with the best interests of society, without benefit to any particular class, or to any individual; and very little explanation, I presume, will demonstrate to your Lordship the truth of this statement. Generally speaking, the occupation which manufactures under the existing arrangements afford, is more or less unhealthy to those employed in them; who are compelled to sacrifice their strength and substantial comforts for the sake of a few pence, and not unfrequently for the benefit of a few others. The number thus employed now constitute an enormous part of the population—so great indeed, as necessarily to be a source of great evil effects of the practices which obtain in every corner of the empire.

These practices are, 1st, The employment of children before they possess sufficient strength for their work,—before they can be initiated in their necessary domestic duties,—and before they can acquire any fixed moral habits or knowledge that may render them useful, or not injurious, members of the community. And 2d y, The employment of adults, both male and female, in situations unfavourable to health for an excessive and unreasonable number of hours per day. The Bill before the House of Commons is intended to apply to the former evil only, and to remedy which it is surely very inadequate. It permits children to be employed at nine years of age for twelve hours and a half per day, allowing them only an hour and a half during this period for meals and for exercise in the open air. Experience proves that men may be habituated by early practice to consider the most inhuman and barbarous customs, not only with indifference, but as amusements from which they derive exquisite enjoyment. Even the best natural dispositions may be trained with ease to delight in cannibalism. It would be clearly unjust, therefore, to blame manufacturers for practices with which they have been familiar from childhood; or to suppose that they have less humanity than any other class of men. Those practices, however, to which they have been familiarised from early life, are nevertheless unjust in the extreme to their fellow creatures, and peculiarly injurious to the best interests of the country. To detail all their consequences would exceed the limits of a letter; and it is presumed that a sketch of the outline of them will be sufficient at once to disclose to your Lordship the high importance of the subject, and to establish its claim to the immediate attention of Government.

To govern well and justly, is to form arrangements by which the greatest benefits that circumstances admit shall be given to the inhabitants of the country governed; and by which, especially, the most helpless part of the population shall be protected from unnecessary oppression. Allow me, my Lord, to apply these principles to the subject of this letter. From causes which it is unnecessary here to explain, the value of mere manual labour has been so much reduced, that the working man in this and other countries is now placed under circumstances far more unfavourable to his happiness than the serf or villain was under the feudal system, or than the slave was in any of the nations of antiquity. I have myself, within the last three years, been but too often obliged to refuse the services of men willing to exert their strength to the very uttermost, when those services were offered and urged upon me by entreaties most distressing to decline; at wages which could not afford the applicant for himself and family the most bare and common necessities of life. With the small pittance they asked, they could in fact only gradually starve, amidst wretchedness of which the wealthy can form no adequate conception. Under these circumstances, the working man and his family are now truly become, even in this country, pitiable objects. Yet it is from this class the wealthy derive all which they hold. The rich wallow in an excess of luxuries injurious to themselves, solely by the labour of men who are debarred from acquiring for their own use a sufficiency even of the indispensable articles of life,—much less any of those numberless comforts which they see around them. And yet, if their capabilities were permitted to be brought into action, they could multiply these in such abundance as would not only afford themselves a participation in them, but would yield to the higher classes a still larger proportion of wealth than the latter can possibly obtain under existing circumstances. Such being the facts, my Lord, which at any time I can prove to the satisfaction of every intelligent reflecting mind, surely the working man and his family have a fair and just claim for some aid and protection from the legislature of their country. In a majority of cases, he is now, whenever required, compelled by dire necessity to labour 14, 16, or even 18 hours per day, in employments from which often every idea of comfort must be banished, which are frequently very unhealthy, and sometimes revolting to human nature; but, my Lord, his sons and his daughters, and even his children, male and female, of a tender age, are now subjected to the same necessity: they must all thus labour, when they can procure work even of this wretched description, to support a bare existence. To effect more than this many of them never hope, but live in perpetual fear, should sickness overtake them, that they must sooner or later be compelled to accept even this, in the degrading capacity of parish paupers.

You will, I am sure, my Lord, readily grant that this state of things cannot last; that its continuance will annihilate every proper feeling between the governed and their rulers; and that confusion and misery must go on increasing. If you ask me where is the remedy? or say, as modern politicians are apt to do, that the evil in time will cure itself? I contend that there are remedies; and I deny that the evil, if unchecked, will cure itself in any other way than by perpetually increasing the necessity for the adoption of those remedies. A truly enlightened statesman will avert, by wise ameliorating measures, those increasing evils, which, if permitted to proceed unremedied, will inevitably derange the social system which it is his duty to direct and control. PAST HISTORY EXHIBITS NO COMBINATION OF CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH BEARS ANY ANALOGY TO THE PRESENT CRISIS: THE TIME NEVER EXISTED WHEN KNOWLEDGE AND MISERY WERE SO CLOSELY AND EXTENSIVELY UNITED*. That such an union can be of long duration, is impossible; one or other must prevail; and no mind competent to look into futurity can be at any loss to conjecture which must yield to the other. The only safe course which governments can now pursue is, not to oppose, but to lead and direct, knowledge. Those governments which will not or cannot act thus, will have increasing difficulties to encounter, which no artificial power opposed to the permanent well being of the people whom they govern, can long withstand. I trust, my Lord, the British Government is not destined to be one of these. I feel confident that there is too much good intention and intelligence afloat amongst us to permit this evil to be inflicted on a nation so willing to sacrifice its temporary interests to the security of its future liberty and happiness. It is these considerations, which induce me to bring before your Lordship those natural remedies for existing evils which can be alone effectual. Security can now be found only in that system of policy which regards the proper training, education, and advantageous employment of the working classes, as the primary objects of government. Every other remedy which may be attempted will prove a mere palliative, and now a very short-lived palliative. But, my Lord, how utterly vain must it be to attempt these objects, while so large a part of the population as I have described—while not adults only of either sex, but even children of a tender age, are compelled to labour in unhealthy occupations for 14 or 15 hours per day? Such a practice has arisen from the blind efforts of ignorance, that, in its eagerness to grasp at immediate wealth, destroys the only sure means of securing its permanence and its benefits. The opposers of the ameliorations proposed, would be themselves great gainers by their adoption. Let the subject be viewed fairly even as one of mere gain or pecuniary profit only, and it would be easy to prove to the satisfaction of every one who has not been trained to become a mere manufacturer, or whose mind has not been too deeply imbued with the prejudices of trade, that all parties interested must necessarily be gainers under the regulations which ought now to be adopted—that is, that more wealth shall be created for all, at a less cost, and with more comfort, to each. But I need not occupy your Lordship's time with the details of an argument, necessary only to those whose ideas have been confined within the limits of a certain class, and who are consequently incompetent to any process of reasoning, in which it is necessary to view society as a whole, and not in little detached and unconnected portions.

The question is now before the legislature and the country, where I have long wished to see it, that its principles might be fairly and fully discussed by statesmen who have no interest, either real or imaginary, in the present destruction of the health, morals, and happiness of their fellow-creatures, whose only resource afterwards is parish relief. I regret, however, to see that the ameliorating clauses which the Bill before me contains in its present form are inadequate to remedy the evils which now exist, and which long ago ought to have been prevented. Its enactments limit its intended ameliorations to Cotton Mills only, and permit children at nine years old to be employed in them from that period to 16 years of age, 12 hours and a half per day, allowing only one hour and a half for meals and exercise in the open air. I have no doubt the Honourable Member with whom this Bill originated, and who has devoted so much time to the subject, is aware that these enactments are very inadequate to meet the existing evils. He was probably afraid to ask more, lest he should increase the opposition of those, who think themselves interested in perpetuating an oppression on their fellow-creatures, worse than any slavery of the same extent with which the human race has been hitherto afflicted. WE ARE UNACQUAINTED WITH ANY NATION, ANCIENT OR MODERN, that has suffered its hundreds of thousands of children, of 7 to 12 years of age, to work incessantly for 15 hours per day in an overheated unhealthy atmosphere, allowing them only 40 minutes out of that time for dinner and change of air, which they breathe often in damp cellars or in garrets, in confined narrow streets or dirty lanes. And this system of oppression will be sanctioned by the British Legislature, if the Bill proposed shall be allowed to pass in its present state; for it is in evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to investigate the subject, that such practices prevail in other manufactories as unhealthy as the cotton. It cannot for a moment be supposed that the Legislature will now compromise its character by giving its countenance to such abuses. Far better would it be that the evil should remain in its full extent, than that the poor sufferer should be mocked by enactments which merely hold out a petty, paltry relief to those employed in one branch of our manufactures, while thousands and hundreds of thousands in other situations are left to experience all the oppression and slavery of which I now complain.

* This new fact in history, for such it is, is particularly worthy the attention of all those who are inclined to argue from the past against the present, and to confound experience with imagination.—Exam.

My Lord, I do hope that this important subject will be taken up and defended by the Ministers of the Crown on its broad and true principles; I trust they will prove to the country at large that revolution or violent reformation is not necessary to compel them to protect the oppressed and the helpless; and that they are willing of themselves to begin the work of gradual reformation, at that point from which alone any beneficial reformation can ever commence—that is, by attending well to the proper training and education of the rising generation. Let this point be adopted as the polar star of the domestic policy of Great Britain, and it may safely be predicted that her past fleeting prosperity and success will become as shadows when contrasted with her future permanent strength and glory. A fortunate opportunity at the proper moment now presents itself to begin this admirable work, and let us hope it will be seized with avidity by our most enlightened statesmen, who discarding the ignorant and degrading feelings of party, will unite all their efforts in a cause in which all have a common interest, and by the adoption of timely preventive measures, founded on principles leading to union and good-will among mankind, will overcome those evils in the social system, which now in every direction threaten forcibly to dissolve all existing governments and institutions. But, my Lord, and I put the question to you as a practical statesman, can the habits of the rising generation be well and properly formed while they continue to be immured almost from infancy within our demoralizing and unhealthy manufactories for 14 or 15 hours per day? Or rather, my Lord, could the greatest enemy to human nature devise more effectual means by which to blight every hope of improvement or happiness to man? Could such a being, in the plenitude of his cunning and hatred, so surely settle in any other way a blasting curse on human beings, or so certainly inflict upon them every form and degree of misery to which their nature is liable? To advance one step beyond a mere pretence to ameliorate the wretched condition of the working classes,—the sole instruments by which our necessities, our comforts and our luxuries are produced, they must be protected from that oppression to which they are now exposed, and their children must be placed under circumstances in which they may be trained in habits useful to themselves and to society. If the Bill now before the Legislature secure not these objects, it will not effect any thing that had not much better be left undone. Instead of confining the provisions of the Act to Cotton Mills only, they should extend to all manufactures whatever not carried on in private houses. Instead of children being admitted at nine years of age to work in Cotton Mills twelve and a half hours per day, with only an hour and a half for meals and recreation, no child should be admitted to work in any manufactory before ten years of age, and not for more than six hours per day until he is twelve years old. And no manufacturer should be permitted to employ either young or old for a longer period than twelve hours per day, allowing them out of that time one hour for breakfast and another for dinner, leaving ten hours for full and constant work, which is one more than our ancestors thought beneficial; and I doubt whether nine hours of regular and active employment, established as the measure of daily labour to be required from the working classes, would not be still more economical and profitable for the country.

I am fully aware of the clamour which these propositions will at first call forth from the blind avarice of commerce; for commerce, my Lord, trains her children to see only their immediate or apparent interest; their ideas are too contracted to carry them beyond the passing week, month, or year at the utmost.

* This is an excellent argument to all but the supine and the selfish; and what does that very fact say to the wilful unhappiness and demoralism of their creed?—Exam.

They have been taught, my Lord, to consider it to be the essence of wisdom to expend millions of capital, and years of extraordinary scientific application, as well as to sacrifice the health, morals, and comforts of the great mass of the subjects of a mighty empire, that they may uselessly improve the manufacture of, and increase the demand for PINS, NEEDLES, AND THREADS;—that they may have the singular satisfaction, after immense care, labour, and anxiety on their own parts, to destroy the real wealth and strength of their country by gradually undermining the morals and physical vigour of its inhabitants, for the sole end of relieving other nations of their due share of this enviable process of PIN, NEEDLE, AND THREAD MAKING. I trust, my Lord, it is not by such men that our great national concerns are henceforward to be directed. If their voice is to predominate in our councils, the vital interests of the country must soon be utterly sacrificed to the grossest political errors. It is the creed of this class, that no effort or expense should be spared to improve those trifling baubles and luxuries, which when perfected, are of no intrinsic value whatever, which cannot add a particle of strength or comfort to the empire; while any attempts to ameliorate the condition of human beings are derided as unnecessary and visionary, as travelling out of the proper business of life, which to them is solely and exclusively to accumulate wealth—wealth, which is not only acquired at the expense of every thing that is truly great or valuable in the character of a nation, but which, WHEN ACQUIRED, IS USELESS, NAY, IN THE HIGHEST DEGREE INJURIOUS TO THEMSELVES AND OTHERS. It is, my Lord, to such kind of influence as I have now described, that the best interests of the country have been sacrificed for years, and if the government cannot proceed without such aid, it is not difficult to see to what it will speedily lead.*

Should it be urged upon you, my Lord, that these and other ameliorating measures will give such a stimulus to population, that the world will soon be too small for its inhabitants, I cannot imagine that your Lordship will contemplate such an argument with any alarm. I intend to take an early opportunity of showing that this dread of an excess of population has no better foundation than exists for the nursery terrors of ghosts and hobgoblins: that at this moment the earth is a comparative desert; that all its present inhabitants are suffering for the want of a much more extended population; and that when the subject comes to be properly understood, no real evil will ever be apprehended from this source.

Being strongly impressed with this view of the subject, I have felt it a duty imperative upon me, thus publicly to recommend to your Lordship, as Prime Minister of the country, to adopt, by means of the Bill now under the consideration of the legislature, a declared principle of gradually and systematically reforming the growing evils of the country, by well and properly forming the habits of the rising generation. It is obviously a necessary preliminary to this work of reformation, that the manufacturer should relinquish the premature and oppressive employment of children. The importance of the subject of this letter renders it unnecessary to apologise for having thus occupied so much of your Lordship's time. Be assured that, with every proper feeling of respect for the long sacrifice which you have made of your private comforts, in the discharge of public duties, I remain, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

New Lanark, March 20, 1816.

* No real advantage has occurred from enabling our fashionable females to purchase fine lace muslins at one fourth of the former prices; but to produce them at this price, many thousands of our population have existed amidst disease and wretchedness, and been carried prematurely to their graves.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 21.—Yesterday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, some time after the rehearsal of a piece, a fire broke out in the theatre of the Odeon. The flame reached the decorations, and extended with a frightful rapidity. Before four many of the staircases were already in flames. At the first news of this event, assistance was sent from all quarters. The Chancellor of France and the Grand Referendary of the Chamber of Peers went to the spot, and remained there with all the persons attached to the service of the Chamber as long as the burning continued. His Royal Highness the Duke of Berri hastened likewise to the spot, and did not cease, by his presence and by his words, to excite the zeal of the workmen. His Excellency the Minister of General Police and the Prefect of Police exerted their most active and efficacious labours. In spite, however, of the ample means of assistance, it was not possible to save the interior of the building. At a quarter before 3 o'clock, the roof of this vast edifice fell in with a great crash. Happily the weather being calm and rainy, the sparks did not extend to the neighbouring houses. The roof fell entirely into the interior, and as soon as that happened, the centre of the conflagration was circumscribed, and all alarm ceased. By 10 o'clock the fire had been entirely got under, and no burning was observed but some remains of the wood-work. The individuals attached to the theatre, and who lived in it, lost indeed all their effects, but their persons were saved. Several citizens were observed going to the top to rescue the women and children. Among other instances of such heroic zeal, one individual was remarked, who had the boldness to venture on a parapet inclined like a roof, to snatch a child from destruction, descending afterwards safe and sound with his precious burden. The soldiers of the guard were particularly distinguished by their zeal and their adventurous boldness. All the by-standers admired a non-commissioned officer, who saved two women, at the peril of his own life. Every one asked his name; they learned that he was called Berquin, corporal of grenadiers. It will be recollected, that this theatre experienced the same disaster on the 23d of March, 18 years ago.

MARCH 22.—At the Bourbon palace, a funeral mass was solemnized for the repose of the soul of the Duke D'Enghien.

Yesterday, at two o'clock in the afternoon, the fire remaining in the ruins of the Odeon was entirely extinguished. Many of the effects of the theatre, as well as of the actors and others, have been saved. The grand centre and several apartments remain untouched. The shops under the peristyle have not been reached; even the Venetian blinds in some of the windows remain entire; but the whole of the interior, formed by the corridors, the boxes, the pit, the stage, and the decorations, presents only a mass of ashes. The internal walls must be a little cracked, but the external have not suffered the least damage. It was in the orchestra, and under the boards of the stage, that the smoke was first perceived at half-past two, when the actors were on the stage at a general rehearsal. It appears that the fire immediately reached the decorations. M. Clozel, an actor at the Odeon, saved the manager, M. Valville, who happened to be asleep in one of the boxes. None of the firemen perished: they were all present at the muster this morning. A grenadier of the Royal Guard is the only individual whose fate is not yet known. The value of the theatrical property lost is estimated at 500,000 francs. The Duke and Duchess of Berri have sent 2,000 francs to be distributed among the firemen and soldiers who distinguished themselves. Madame Catalani, who did not intend to sing again in Paris, has undertaken to give a concert for the benefit of the sufferers by the fire. Many robberies were attempted during the confusion of the conflagration. One of the robbers who had got a bag of money, and was pursued by the soldiers, threw himself into the flames, and was seen no more.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, MARCH 17.—The number of vessels that perished in the storms of the 4th and 6th of this month is estimated at 140, between the Helder and Calais only.—The following is an extract of a letter from Valenciennes, March 15:—"It is at length decided that the Army of Occupation will soon quit France. The following are the arrangements:—The Danish, Hanoverian, and Saxon contingents will commence their march home in May. The Russian and English corps will remain till September

At that time the English troops will go to Calais to embark there, and the Russians to Dunkirk. All the horses belonging to the Russian artillery, cavalry, and military train, will be ceded to France, which will spare the inconvenience of transporting them. Such is the news that circulates at the head-quarters of Cambray.

POLAND.

WARSAW, MARCH 2.—The benefit of a constitution is now about to be granted to us. This concession of the Sovereign is the noblest as well as the most worthy consolation which he can give us after so many misfortunes.

EAST INDIES.

It was in April and May last the first hostilities took place with the Peishwah. They were excited by an active partisan named Trimbukjee Dainglia, who, in consequence of his intrigues, had been confined in the fortress of Tannah, on the island of Salsette, which commands the passage between the island and the Mahratta territories in Aurungabad. From this fortress he contrived to escape, and, favoured secretly by the Peishwah, attempted to raise an army for the purpose of acting against us. He had sent information to Scindiah and Holkar for the purpose of engaging their co-operation. The British resident at Poonah, Mr. Elphinstone, obtained early intelligence of what was going on, and, before the plans of Trimbukjee were ripe, brought a strong military force into the field, surrounded Poonah, seized the person of the Peishwah, and compelled him to sign a treaty, ceding to us three of his fortresses. At the same time he issued a proclamation, declaring his disapprobation of Trimbukjee's conduct, and offering a large reward for his apprehension. But his real intentions with respect to this intriguing minister seem to have been very different. While he was openly disapproving his measures, he was secretly encouraging him to proceed. The proclamation was ineffectual, and Trimbukjee carried on his projects with great activity, and, as appears by the sequel, with success. Forty thousand men, under his command, marched straight towards Poonah, for the purpose of securing the person, and acting under the immediate orders of the Peishwah. They are said to have reached Poonah, before we had sent Col. Smith, with a force of about 4,000 men, against them. The first battle, on the 5th of November, was fought at some distance from Poonah, and the enemy were defeated, but not disheartened; for another battle was fought on the 17th, not far from Poonah. A good deal of blood was shed in the two battles. Capt. Preston, of the Bombay European Regiment, was wounded severely, and Lieut. Falconer, of the Bombay Native Infantry. Two brothers, of the name of Vaughan, who had been taken and carried to Poonah, after the first battle, were shot. After the second battle, Poonah surrendered, and the Peishwah with Trimbukjee fled to some fort to the southward. Shehnoor has been mentioned to us. Thither Colonel Smith was to move against him about the 20th of November. The final ruin of this head of the Mahratta empire may now be confidently anticipated. He will fall by the hands that restored and sustained him. The Peishwah's name is Bajeeerow, son of the famous, or rather infamous Ragoonauth Row, who murdered his nephew, the Peishwah Narrain Row, in 1773. But he failed in securing the firm possession of the dignity of Peishwah, and the son of Narrain Row was declared Peishwah. He died suddenly in 1795, and the two sons of Ragoonauth were alternately raised to the Musnud. At length one of them, Bajeeerow, was established in 1803, at Poonah, by General Wellesley, in consequence of his alliance with the British, concluded at Bassein on the 30th of December, 1802. He has ever since remained in undisturbed possession; and, till the year 1817, had been firmly attached to our Government, which assisted him to settle all his differences with the numerous Chiefs subordinate to the Poonah State. It is not unlikely that the Peishwah will now be dethroned, and his dignity restored to one of the descendants of Narrain Row, the former possessor of the Peishwahship, if any be yet living. But the new Prince will, in all probability, be shorn of the power and possessions which belonged to the present Peishwah, and will have little more than the name of King—"a barren sceptre in his gripe." If we may form a conjecture, Poonah and all the territories along the west coast will be added to our possessions; and if, as may be suspected, there is a secret understanding with Scindiah, he will probably have some portion of the Peishwah's territories for assisting our plans. —Courier.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

NORFOLK.—MUSKETT v. GURNEY.—This was an action for crim. con. and the damages were laid at 10,000*l.*—Mr. GURNEY said, that the plaintiff was compelled to resort to this action to obtain, in some degree, a compensation for one of the deepest injuries which it was possible for one man to commit against another. The plaintiff was the son of a Gentleman who had amassed a large fortune in the practice of agriculture; he had married the daughter of a respectable farmer, and a man of considerable property. The defendant was a man of very large fortune, and a member of a respectable family of the Society of Friends. After making many observations the Learned Counsel proceeded to evidence. The marriage was proved to have been solemnised on the 17th of March, 1812, the fruit of which was a daughter, now five years of age; and evidence was given to shew, that the plaintiff and his wife had continued to live on terms of affection until about six months ago.

Rebecca Ewen (Mrs. Musket's nurse maid) stated, that she had lived with Mrs. Musket, at Intwood Hall, about three miles from Norwich; that during the first year of her service Mrs. Musket always went to Norwich by the Eaton-road, but that she had since always gone the Swardston-road, which is further by half a mile, and which leads past Keswick, the residence of Mr. Gurney, his mother, and sister; there was no intimacy between the two families, but the defendant occasionally called at Intwood; that in last spring the defendant and Mrs. M. met two or three times a week near a dark green gate, in a lane running by the defendant's plantation; this lane is a public highway, but not much frequented; sometimes they were together an hour and a half, sometimes not so long. The witness was one day walking with her mistress and the child, when they saw the defendant leaning over the white gate, leading into the plantation. Defendant and Mrs. Musket walked together in the plantation to a straw hut; the witness walked near, but did not hear what they said; they remained there half an hour, the witness walking about in the meantime. These meetings were continued; they walked in the plantation three times afterwards; witness did not go in but once. She frequently attended Mrs. Musket to Norwich; defendant sometimes met them on the road, when Mrs. Musket used to get out of the donkey-cart and walk; Mr. Gurney being generally on horseback, he sometimes rode by her side till he reached his own house. At one time, being at Norwich with her mistress, she saw Mr. Gurney talking to some gentlemen, whom he immediately left; Mrs. Musket left the witness, and two hours afterwards she came to her at her mother's. The defendant called sometimes at Intwood when Mr. Musket was out; witness never let him in but once; she heard his voice in the keeping parlour twice; she might, if she had been disposed, have heard what she was saying. She never heard Mr. Musket accuse his wife of having ill-treated him. The plaintiff never walked out with his wife, who had always either walked or ridden every day, both before and after the meetings with Mr. Gurney. Mrs. M. never gave witness any orders to leave her; and she never saw defendant take any improper liberties with her mistress.

Mr. Serjeant VAUGHAN entered into many able arguments to shew that the evidence (even admitting that it might be all correct) was insufficient to establish the case, when indiscretion was the most which had been proved.

Judge DALLAS, after recapitulating the evidence, said, it was clear that the defendant had conducted himself with great impropriety—but great impropriety of conduct often takes place without the least act of familiarity. There were some suspicious circumstances in the case, but the Jury were to put all the facts together, and give a verdict accordingly.—The Jury, of whom eleven were special, almost immediately returned a verdict for the defendant.

DORCHESTER.—Mr. Baldwin, a farmer, recovered 190*l.* from the Earl of Digby, for damage sustained by him last July, when the plaintiff's meadows were flooded, and his hay washed away, through a servant of his Lordship's improperly drawing the hatches at the head of a fish-pond.

STAFFORD.—A case was tried of a curious nature:—A public meeting to petition for Parliamentary Reform having been held in the Petteries, a man named Deakin was employed to hawk about and obtain signatures to the petition, and he placed himself in the high road opposite to Mr. Spode's manufactory at Stoke, with the view of catching the men as they left work, and getting them to sign. On being observed, with a table before him, five persons within the manufactory brought out a water engine, with which they pursued Deakin along the road till he was thoroughly drenched, and their water exhausted. Deakin now indicted them for a riot and assault; he appeared very illiterate, had been a boatman, a carter, and a potseller, and it appeared was hired to obtain the signatures, at 3s. a day.—Mr DAUNCEY, in addressing the Jury for the defendants, said, Deakin went to set his inflammatory matter to work amongst Mr. Spode's men, and they took the readiest means to extinguish his flame—he excited a flame, and they put a little water on him, and extinguished it.—Judge BURROUGH considered the conduct of Deakin blameable, in placing himself before the manufactory, for the purpose of catching the men as they came out, but still a riot and assault had been committed, acts highly illegal.—The Jury brought in a verdict of Not Guilty!

YORK.—Mr. Justice BAYLEY passed sentence on the prisoners convicted in the course of the preceding week, when 25 prisoners received sentence of death. The bar being insufficient to contain so large a number, these unhappy men were brought up at three several times. Previous to his Lordship's departure, he respited all the prisoners, except Samuel Leatherland, convicted of passing, at Hull, forged Bank of England notes!

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MARCH 29.

Two reports have been made from the Committee on the French Budget, the one by M. Roi, the other by Count BEUGNOT. The deficiency, which is to be provided for by a loan, through the medium of alienating the rentes, amounts to 221,000,000 francs: and this loan is represented as not difficult of raising, the Contractors having made enormous profits on the former ones;—a very sufficient reason certainly, but not quite comfortable enough to hinder the Assembly from manifesting agitation. But the foreign claims on France are the great matter, and if the subject of internal revenue is enough to agitate the Deputies, we may conceive the feelings produced by the following declarations. M. Roi concluded his speech with the following words, which are said to have produced a "strong sensation":—

"In looking forwards, we are justly alarmed at the amazing augmentation of our expenses. Every thing is changed around us, and we go on as if nothing had been changed.

"The resignation of the country in these unfortunate times has been great and admirable; it originates in its affection for its King; but though its affection can experience no change, all its resources are exhausted, and we have to communicate to you THIS TERRIBLE TRUTH—that if the extraordinary charges which press upon the nation do not terminate with the present year, it will be impossible for you to create the Budget of 1819."

M. BEUGNOT, amidst a great many theatrical flourishes, in the ancient court style, about the Royal Family and the great merit of France in displaying such a "noble attitude in adversity," expresses the same alarm as M. Roi, though not in so candid a manner. He says that "the occupation of the territory cannot be continued for two years longer, without making France a prey to agitations menacing to Europe;" that she is even now exhausted; that "here must be the limit of her sacrifices, because it is the limit of her means;" that the Allies will doubtless consider the matter in this light; that the French may reckon upon the retirement of the foreign troops by the end of the present year; that the settlement of the claims is under negotiation, and there is reason to hope that the Deputies will be acquainted with the results before the end of the Session, "and an end put to the exaggerations which have a very serious effect upon the public credit;" but that it is necessary, at the same time, to provide the means for the current service, otherwise every thing will be compromised, even hope.

We do not know whether the Allies will take all this for granted; but this we are persuaded, that if they do not, the French will not care much longer about their delays and deliberations, but draw their swords to cut the Gordian knot at once.

There was a report blown about our streets on Friday; by those vociferous reprobates the News-horns, that BONAPARTE had suddenly died; but we believe it is not traceable to any thing besides the probability of such an event, owing to the lofty souls of the British Ministers. It is said in the French advices, that the assassin who attempted to turn his pistol into an Infernal Machine against the Duke of WELLINGTON, is at length discovered, and turns out to be a hired French refugee. We shall see;—and we shall also remember.

The French Government have at length resolved to do their best for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. Every ship and cargo engaged in it, in any manner, is to be confiscated; but the Chronicle justly observes, that "unless a right of search is mutually conceded, the subordinate agent of any one Power will, in spite of all laws, possess the means of carrying on the trade to a frightful extent." Lord CASTLEREAGH the other day in the House of Commons announced an agreement to this effect on the part of the Netherlands. That extremely Holy Ally, the King of SPAIN, whom we and the Russian snows helped into his father's throne, we were obliged to give douceurs to, before he would move his pretty delicate embroidering hand to such a plebeian work.—It is curious to see the "trumpet" which the French orators blow on this occasion—"before their good deeds." When NAPOLEON used to do any thing striking, and was flattered for it by these very same men, it was, "how slavish! how nauseous! how egotistical!"—but if LOUIS imitates him at all, how late soever, all is as it should be;—people can afford to let him;—he does not gall their self-love. The Minister of Marine, Count MOLE, in a tissue of truth, falsehood, and base inconsistency, thus addressed the Chamber of Deputies:—

"GENTLEMEN,—The most enlightened men of all nations during the last century, required the abolition of that barbarous traffic, known under the appellation of the Slave Trade; their voices had long been raised against it without effect; in vain religion and philosophy united their complaints and their efforts; it was reserved for us, to see this magnanimous resolution spring up in the minds of the inhabitants of every State, and in the breast of every King. It was reserved for us to witness the accomplishment of that desire recorded in the immortal work of Montesquieu. "Why," said he, "why do not the Potentates of Europe, who form so many useless conventions, make a general one in the cause of humanity and pity?" The Congress of Vienna, Gentlemen, have answered to the appeal of that great genius. History and humanity will record with gratitude the famous declaration of the 8th February 1815, in which all the Sovereigns, with a general and liberal regard, pleaded, as it were, the cause of morality and justice, with as much wisdom and force of argument as were ever displayed by the most eloquent men in all ages. A reform so salutary, but at the same time so contrary to divers interests, cannot result from the will of any Government, or from its efforts. It can only operate by universal consent, by that influence superior to all other—the inevitable sway of morality and of humanity.

"A single man, by his power and the delusion of his exploits, had arrested time in its course, and the human species in its perfection. But once his career concluded, the nature of things resumed its order, and the French Empire, reinstated by its legitimate Princes, occupies the first rank in the scale of nations. In this general progress of all people towards wisdom and civilization, it has to her been a source of noble consolation, in the midst of so many sufferings, to associate herself in the framing of that great act of morality and justice proclaimed by the Congress. In observing our Sovereign (scarcely seated on the throne of his ancestors) eager to pay this homage to the rights of humanity, it recalled to our minds, that from one century to another, the Princes of this same family not only swayed the sceptre with glory, but in the practice of the most exalted sentiments and the most generous virtues."

The translation of all this into plain matter of fact is as follows:—It was philosophy that first raised a cry against this diabolical traffic;—the divines were in it's favour at first, because, with their usual hopeful mode of arguing, they said it was evidently intended to exist, and that a curse was on the descendants of HAM. But philosophy gradually influenced superstition in this as in other matters; some excellent believers, among whom was GREGOIRE a revolutionary priest, and the immortal CLARKSON, had true piety enough to adopt what VOLTAIRE and MONTESQUIEU recommended. The latter in particular devoted his life and health to the task, though as he was no speaker and time-server, people heard very little about him, and a great deal about his declamatory follower Mr. WILBERFORCE. These men and others seized the opportunity of the success of the Allies to press the subject on their attention; but they were behaving in a very shilly-shally manner upon it, when BONAPARTE returned from Elba, and seeing what the age required of him, ordained the Abolition by one stroke of his pen. The battle of Waterloo succeeded, and the Abolition went slowly on again as we have seen, till it was thought fit, partly, we suppose, by way of not keeping promises with the Europeans, to do something at last for the Africans;—Louis agrees of course; and then M. MOLE, formerly Imperial Counsellor of State and Grand Judge, gets up and makes a speech, in which he contrives to mix up all the causes of the Abolition, good and indifferent, willing and unwilling,—abuses his old master, and compliments a whole line of legitimate despots and debauchees. Now let us hear a few sentences which the said M. MOLE, who abuses the "single man" and his hindrance of human perfection, uttered to his countrymen in the year 1813:—

"If a man of the age of the Medici, or of that of Louis the 14th, were to return to earth, and at the sight of so many wonders were to ask how many glorious reigns and ages of power had sufficed to produce them, you would reply,—A dozen years of war, and a single man." *

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, March 19.

I hasten to inform you that the man who, according to all probability, fired the pistol at the Duke of Wellington, has been just arrested at Paris. Thus it is that the French police replies to those who have accused it of bestowing too little pains and vigilance in searching for the criminal. The person arrested is named Cantillon, an ancient hussar, a man of the most blind devotedness, of extraordinary intrepidity, a true Sold, whom the intriguers of the Netherlands have but too well chosen with their views, to be the instrument of crime. The affair will soon be exposed in open day. It appears certain that the ramifications of the plot have not extended far beyond Belgium. It is an infernal conception of a very small number of French refugees, aided by some Belgians who participate in their dangerous principles, and who cannot accustom themselves to the repose which Europe is enjoying. The supposed assassin appears to be a Frenchman by birth. If he is so, all France disowns him, and feels the utmost horror at his crime. A Frenchman is more than all the world interested in his just and exemplary punishment. Damiens and Ravaisac were also Frenchmen: one villain, one sanguinary monster, may unhappily exist in a nation composed of 28,000,000 of men.—There is not the least doubt at present that the temptation to the crime has been most serious as well as abominable; and that it has only failed of its effect by circumstances independent of the will of the assassin.—Times.

Paris, March 21.

In addition to the details I communicated in my last concerning the apprehension of the person that fired at the Duke of Wellington, you may announce the following:—A subscription was collected at Brussels for the purpose of remunerating the person infamous enough to attempt the life of the Duke. Sixteen thousand francs were already deposited when the person presented himself. It was agreed on either side, that if he were unsuccessful, he was only to receive one half of the amount. He fled back to Brussels, after his ineffectual endeavour. Two persons walking in the park in that city were overheard by an agent of the police, exclaiming "that it was absurd to enrich a fellow who had not even grazed the pannets of the carriage." This, and the testimony of the assassin's mistress, are the principal circumstances which bear against the prisoner. The result of the interrogatories is unknown. It is assured, and I believe correctly, that one of the persons examined had confessed, in his examination, the day before yesterday, that the assassination list was presented to him, but that he refused any concern in it with horror.—Courier.

Paris, March 23.

Cantillon, after the affair of the firing of the pistol, had the extraordinary audacity to present himself, on the morning of the 11th, before the hotel of the Duke of Wellington, probably to learn the result of his attempt. This wretch was born at Paris; his father, a respectable old man, is a modeller; he himself was a jeweller by profession, but, accustomed to vagrancy, did not labour. He excited attention in his regiment less by brilliant actions than by deeds of cruelty towards his enemies. His fanaticism was so raised in Belgium by the French refugees, and others, he never spoke of foreigners, and especially of the English, without paroxysms of rage and fury. He has already been interrogated several times by the Comte Angles, Prefect of Police, and it is said that he persists in a system of absolute denial. Every thing announces that he will soon be brought before a Court of Assize.—Times.

One of the American Papers contains a curious article respecting BONAPARTE. It is stated, upon the authority of an "intelligent French Gentleman," that the French colonists on the Tombigbee, in Georgia, who are described as immensely rich, have been exploring the sea-coast to select a proper place for the erection of a ship-yard, where they intend to build a fleet of men of war of peculiar construction. This fleet, when finished, is to be manned with American seamen, and to sail for the rescue of BONAPARTE from St. Helena! The writer of the letter (BARTISTE PREROUX), celebrates himself upon the possibility of its success, and then, he adds, "most of the present rulers of Europe will, in a short time, be compelled to make room for others, and the founders of Demopolis, on the Tombigbee, again become the pride and glory of the French nation, and the terror of European tyrants."

An article in an Havana paper contains an official account of the execution of General MINA. The report is signed by a surgeon, who examined the body, and specifies the place and number of the wounds received.

Mr. CANNING has at last received his desert, in an animated letter just published by RICHWAY, every sentence of which will make him writhe in mind as much as poor OGDEN did in body when under the hand of the Surgeon.—We have not time for an extract this week.

On Easter Monday the LORD MAYOR gave the annual feast at the Mansion-house. The Ministers absented themselves this year, as they did the two preceding ones; but the Dukes of YORK and CUMBERLAND, and the Prince of HESSE HOMBURG, were present, as also the Austrian, Spanish, and French Ambassadors. There was a tolerable show of rank and fashion; but no person of very marked distinction. The dinner was handsome; and the brilliancy of the gas gave a splendour to the scene, which would have been a passport to a much less sumptuous entertainment. There was no particular feature in the songs or toasts. The dancing-room was, as usual, a scene of mere confusion; there was too great a crowd to admit even the semblance of a decent dance: but, as custom required that some such ceremony should be gone through, a proper number of persons were put upon the usual motions. The Prince ESTERHAZY (the Austrian Ambassador) opened the ball with Miss SMITH, the daughter of the LORD MAYOR. Three or four Bishops were at the dinner, but left before the ball began.

Finney was discharged from custody on Friday, there not being any person to prosecute for his alleged offence of uttering forged notes.

MASTER-SWEEPS.—The Master Chimney-Sweepers have put forth a "Case," in which they vehemently oppose the Bill for abolishing the employment of children. They say, that Parliamentary interference is not required;—and why? because, truly, neither the Masters nor the little boys have made any complaints! Yet they themselves admit, that "the chimney-sweeper's cancer is a terrible disease when it becomes virulent," and that "chimney-sweepers are liable to terrible and fatal accidents;" that is, that the poor little children, who have never complained to Parliament, are so liable!—These Master-sweeps seem to have taken a hint from Mr. CANNING, and appear to wish to excite a laugh in the House, by facetiously striking "a balance" (such is their phrase), between the "weak eyes" of their defenceless victims and their "clean teeth;" adding moreover, that soot "preserves their bodies from the itch;" that "the children of the poor must submit to many inconveniences, and that any thing is better than living in idleness upon a parish allowance."—Whether such reasoning will take with the House, we cannot say; but much as we dislike idleness and parish support, we cannot think that constant filth, disease, barbarity, and death by torture, are much better things.—There are no doubt some difficulties in the proposed change; but when humanity and justice demand it, every sacrifice should be made. These Master-sweeps must think the people at large are indeed "dolls and idiots," if they imagine they will be deceived by their exaggerated statements of expense, and their assertions about the depreciation of property and frequent conflagrations,—all which is to be caused by the non-employment of little wretched children!—We advise these Master-sweeps to hire Mr. CANNING to assist them in their labours: he will contrive to "convulse the House with laughter," by some delicate and tasteful description of the trembling agonies of a little sweep, on being forced up a crooked flue, from which he was dragged down a corpse,—and then persuade them that the case "is one which should be referred to the Cancer Society, not to the decision of Parliament." The Masters may rely upon it, that Mr. CANNING is the man for their money, and that among all the Right Honourables not one is better calculated to assist them in a foul job.

The first banquet given by Baron HUMBOLDT, lately accredited here as the Representative of the Court of Berlin, was held at the Ambassador's residence, in Portland-place, on Saturday evening. The PRINCE REGENT was in such excellent health and spirits, that after the cloth was removed, his Royal Highness sang two songs in the most pleasing and scientific style.—Courier.

WILD DOG.—A most destructive animal (supposed of the mastiff species) has for a considerable time past infested the neighbourhood of Rochester, and committed great ravages among the sheep and lambs of persons residing in and near that place; twenty belonging to Lord ELLENBOROUGH, eleven of Sir C. PRICE's, ten belonging to Mr. LEADER, and one of Mr. JONES's (the Marshal of the King's Bench), have been destroyed by this animal within the last three weeks. His attacks are always made in the night; he seizes his victim by the throat, mangles it terribly in that part, and sucks the blood: it does not appear that he eats any part of the flesh. The farmers and labourers of the neighbourhood are indefatigable in their endeavours to find out the haunt of the ferocious beast, but the efforts have hitherto proved unsuccessful.—Courier.

By information received on Friday, in a circular letter from a Magistrate in the west of England, Hussey is traced by a most accurate description, to have passed through that district—and, from the prompt measures which have been adopted, the public may expect hourly tidings of his being in custody.—Daily Paper.

THE LATE CARDINAL YORK.—The monument to the memory of the Cardinal YORK, the last of the race of the House of STUART, is now in progress, under the direction of CANOVA. It will be recollected, that by direction of the PRINCE REGENT, in 1815, the sum of 250,000 francs were placed by Lord CASTLEREAGH at the disposal of CANOVA, who was then at Paris, to be applied to defray the expense of carrying to Rome the works of art restored by France, of which sum 50,000 francs were directed to be appropriated towards the monument of the Cardinal YORK. It is now erecting in St. Peter's, where the monument of his father is placed, under the title of King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. It is said, that the Cardinal, by his will, directed that his name should be recorded on his tomb as Henry the Ninth. CANOVA has undertaken to execute a marble group to adorn and illustrate the monument.

THE NORTH POLE.—It is said that Lord COCHRANE has caused a steam-boat to be built, in which he intends to make a voyage to the North Pole, and from thence to Behring's Strait. She is to be schooner-rigged, and will be accompanied by some old collier, laden with coals, as far as Spitzbergen. Here the coals will be taken into the schooner; and as the run is only about five days to the Pole, and from thence to Behring's Strait nine days, and as it is intended to make use of sails when the wind is fair, his Lordship is sanguine in hope of being the first to accomplish the north-west passage over the Pole, and thus to get both of the Parliamentary rewards, amounting to 25,000*l.*, one-half of which nearly will be expended in the outfit. Hazardous as the navigation among the ice with a steam-boat may appear to be, yet the besetment of ships in the ice generally happens in a calm, when the ice is moving about in all directions by the under-currents, while the ships remain immovable; whereas, by lighting up the engine whenever the wind fails, the ship may be carried on. We heartily wish his Lordship success in this hazardous undertaking. —Evening Paper.

NEW-STREET COMMISSIONERS.—Knowing what we do of the practices of these official people, one cannot but smile to see them put forth such a defence as that urged in the case of PITT v. HUSKISSON, &c. viz. that they refused to transact business with Mr. PITT, and advised others to avoid him, because he had asked a large sum for a house, which was subsequently purchased at a reduced price. Without dwelling on the fact, that the parties had objected to Mr. PITT long before this affair of the house, and that it was not in the line of the New Street, it should be known how these delicate Commissioners have uniformly acted in their dealings with the persons who have been compelled to surrender their property. They affect to be shocked truly at a man's want of justice in asking a high price for his bargain, but they are not at all shocked at offering sums infinitely short of the true value of property which they wish to purchase. We have seen some of their offers. One tradesman was offered 580*l.*, who recovered 1550*l.*. Another, 200*l.*, who got 850*l.*. Another, 3575*l.*, who obtained 6022*l.*. And so on in a like proportion, or rather want of all proportion. Yet these Gentlemen can assume airs of extreme delicacy, and pretend that they could not possibly transact business with a man who could make an offer so wide of the mark!—The fact is, as it appears to us, that Mr. PITT's conduct as to the house had nothing whatever to do with the question before the Court. If he acted improperly, let him be made responsible; but that Messrs. HUSKISSON, NASH, &c. should become his accusers, his judges, and, we may say, his executioners, at their own pleasure, does seem to us somewhat hard, and that a Court of Law should sanction such proceedings, still more so. If such doings are allowed, the ruin of any one obnoxious to men in power may be easily effected, for no humble individual has any chance in such an unequal struggle, if the law will not finally protect him. We shall see.

MR. HAZLITT'S LECTURES.—The Lectures on Poetry, delivered by this Gentleman with such success at the Surrey Institution, he is now re-delivering at the Crown and Anchor. Those who heard the series at the former place must have remarked the increasing interest they excited as the Lecturer proceeded; and one cause may be, that as Mr. HAZLITT at first treats of those mighty masters of the art whose merits have long since been settled, he is not enabled to exhibit much novelty of criticism, or at least he is unable to put forth those lively and satirical powers, which so much delight a public audience. As he comes down however to modern men, he has ample scope for their display. Able dissertations on SHAKESPEARE and MILTON will deeply interest in the closet; but a mixed evening assembly expect something playful and piquant, something that will send them home smiling—and this Mr. HAZLITT, as he has proved, can well supply.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 316.

DRURY-LANE.

ANOTHER Rob Roy, though differing materially from the one at Covent Garden, was produced here on Wednesday, from the pen of Mr. SOANE, author of the Falls of Clyde. For the following excellent account of the leading incidents we are indebted to the Times:—"It will be seen that they owe little to the story from which the title is derived:—Diana Vernon (Miss SMITHSON), betrothed to, but hating Sir Rashleigh Osbaldistone (Mr. RAE), and secretly in love with Rob Roy (H. JOHNSTON), chief of the clan Gregarach, is urged by her father, General Vernon (BEN-GOUGH), on account of a large fortune which will be lost to both if the union does not take place, to a precipitate fulfilment of her contract. The marriage ceremony is interrupted by Rob Roy and his followers, who takes the place of Sir Rashleigh, and intimidating the priest by his threats, becomes himself the husband of Diana Vernon. Helen Macgregor, (Mrs. GLOVER), the mother of Rob Roy, considering her clan degraded by this alliance with Southern blood, is indignant at the marriage, and forms a design to carry off and destroy the bride by poison. The seer Morvyn (HOLLAND), to whom she applies for the drug which is to effect her fatal purpose, deceives her by a plan similar to that which is practised in Romeo and Juliet. The supposed poison is administered, with every addition of atrocious cruelty and malignant invective, by Helen herself, who, supposing her crime completed, dies soon after of despair. Diana Vernon, with the help of Dougal (WALLACK), a trusty Highlander, far surpassing in intellect his namesake in the novel, and the best character in the piece, is carried by the seer into a cave, and restored to life. Rob Roy, whose adventures do not blend sufficiently with those of his mistress, is impeached by Sir Rashleigh, taken prisoner, suffered to escape, kills his betrayer, is pursued, surrounded, and on the point of being shot, when General Vernon appears with his pardon, procured by the threat of resigning his commission; Diana appears, rushes to the arms of her husband, and the curtain drops."

The ambition of the author of this piece to make it as original as possible was very laudable; but it led him into an error common with young writers of this sort, which is, the resolution, though an unconscious one, to differ with what has gone before them, rather than to study a proper novelty for its own sake. It is a fault which is apt to slip into the very best and soundest originality, in times when literature has long been a trade, and authors are forced to be critics, whether they would or no. The consequence on the present occasion is some very striking errors, which have been well noticed, amidst a good deal of praise, by the Journal above-mentioned. "The most obvious," it says, "consists in annexing characters to particular names, wholly differing from the previous associations we had formed of them: a character like Diana Vernon or Rob Roy resembles an acquaintance: once alter the features of which they are composed, assign new attributes or different modes of conduct, the identity is destroyed, and our sense of propriety violated.—We may tolerate a General Vernon sharing a fate like that of Captain Thornton, ensnared and captured by the Highlanders; and even a Helen Macgregor, as the mother of Rob Roy, and the murderer of his wife; but not a delicate, high-minded creature similar to Diana Vernon, voluntarily sharing from any conceivable motive the fortunes of a robber and an outlaw; and still less can we imagine Rob Roy, the bold free-booter, the levier of black mail, the chief instrument in a daring rebellion, wasting his time, and ruining his purposes, in the pursuit of a love intrigue. To distort characters thus, is in some measure to pervert the truth of history: a few steps farther, and we might have JULIUS CÆSAR represented as a coward, and CICERO as an idiot."

We doubt the accuracy of the observation here made respecting Diana Vernon; that is to say, as far as the abstract question of delicacy and high-mindedness is concerned; for it is one of the first proofs and privileges of the highest pitch of these qualities to be able to pity the sorrows, make allowances for the errors, and love to value the good qualities of all beings, especially when they are threatened to be hunted down by the injustice and vicious common-places of society. But the rest of the remarks appear to us to be very sound, especially the one concerning Rob Roy. The insignificance to which this native and powerful character is reduced is not only at war with the character itself, with the very title of the piece, and with the expectations of the audience, but voluntarily abandons all the striking and unaccustomed interest,—all the rubbing off of every-day rust,—which such a character cannot fail to produce, and which surely cannot be neutralized now-a-days by one novel and one drama on the subject. Robin Hood's adventures, for instance, whenever any one of them was made the subject of a song or other piece of writing, delighted our ancestors for centuries. His name was as fresh and pleasurable whenever it came upon them, as the return of the green leaves.

The other material defect in the piece is an over-tendency to the declamatory and the grim. There is undoubtedly very often a great deal of genius, and even of beauty and moral sweetness, in compositions apparently the most terrific, as in Mr. COLERIDGE'S Ancient Mariner for instance. But these have a moral sweetness and a redeeming purpose and grace; the evidence of their predominance in the author's mind, is the genial radiance with which they shine through the cloudiness of the general story; and invariably they are not accompanied with declamation:—they are too powerful, beautiful, and sincere for it. Now the language of the piece before us is too full of thunder and lightning, and flowers, and fierce things, and vultures. There is, or rather perhaps was (for many judicious alterations, we understand, have been made), a mother cursing her son after he had shewn too great a virtue to curse her; and this same mother, in a frenzy of family pride, gives poison, as she thinks, to his bride; and not only so, but contrives to get her into a cemetery, and tortures her unresisting gentleness with the sight of a grave prepared for her. The curse indeed, as well as the attempt to put to death, recoils upon herself, as it ought; but Mr. SOANE, who is a young writer of promise, ought to be warned against these kind of excesses, which he will discover before long to be, not anticipations of the sublime, and leaps into the results of experienced genius, but a want of proper tact hitherto for a hundred delicacies by the way.

On the other hand, there are some things in the new

Rob Roy worthy of the author's most promising production, the Falls of Clyde. If the language and the thoughts in general are not of the truest kind, some touches both of simplicity and acute observation are by no means wanting. There are some excellent situations, particularly one at the end of an act, where, after an old Seer has warned Helen Macgregor against the commission of an act of ferocity, he makes her and the crowd about her listen to a supernatural voice of the neighbouring waters,—in the midst of which the curtain drops. This is in a truly poetical spirit. The character of Dougal also, which, as the Chronicle observes, is a good set-off against the more comic amusement afforded by the Bailie at the other house, is exceedingly well compounded of native kindness, and occasional, induced ferocity; and though some want of handling in familiar matters subjected the unobtrusive part of General Vernon to a merriment which did the discernment of the audience no great credit, we think we could see a very promising attempt indeed to sketch the staid judiciousness and suppressed passions of the more formal military character, in which the man nevertheless ultimately predominates over the machine. In short, there is inexperience and common-place in this production, but there is promise and talent also. The book of the songs will shew this at once. Some of the verses are old and common; but in others there are considerable evidences of a power to feel simplicity, and to have a strong sense of whatever else the author may experience. He has a tact for the shapes and differences of things, such as he ought to turn to good purpose. The Chorus, Fill, fill up the glasses, is very characteristic of the bravado and quick-flowing blood of a set of drinkers; and the following one at the bridal is equally so of the union of something devotional and voluptuous:—

Chorus.

Around! Around! Around!
We pace this sacred ground;
With our hearts to heaven glowing,
With the holy waters flowing,
With the tapers burning brightly,
With the incense scattering lightly,
Around! Around! Around!
We pace this sacred ground.

Every drop of water flowing,
Every grain of incense glowing,
Be a seed to pleasure growing.

The most prominent actor is Mr. WALLACK, who surprised us with his performance of a Scotchman still more than Mr. H. JOHNSTON did in the Falls of Clyde. He had more passion to show, and more humour; and showed both to great advantage. Mr. WALLACK'S greatest fault in general is a tendency to something affected, and to something worse, which is slang. As he rises in his profession, he will find, we trust, that the former is not necessary to him, and the latter not becoming. In the present piece, his person was a good deal hidden by the Scotch dress, or rather he was obliged to give up the display of it to the lower species of Scotch manner, the mingled drollery of which and slouching ease he fell into admirably.

FINE ARTS.

Mr. President WEST, Sir T. LAWRENCE, Mr. WILKIE, Mr. SHEE, Mr. NOLLEKENS, Mr. A. ROBERTSON, and Mr. ALLSTON, have been lately admitted Members of the Academy of Arts in New York.

Mr. WEST is obtaining in America the reward of public admiration, for his noble present to the hospital at Philadelphia. A Gentleman recently arrived from that city tells us, that a handsome exhibition-room has been built by subscription, in which his grand picture of Christ healing the Sick has been placed; and that it has for several months past been visited by 500 persons daily, at a quar-fer dollar each, the whole of which goes into the funds of the hospital.

THE ARTS AT PLYMOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—Whatever inference Mr. HAYDON may deduce from the mutilated extract with which he prefaces his Letter in your last Number, I again assert, not only that the intended building at Plymouth is not exclusively for an Academy of Painting, but that an Academy of Painting is not even contemplated by the Projectors. And that I may not be supposed deficient in information on the subject, I shall perhaps be excused for stating, that although I have not the honour of being a Lecturer on Literature, as Mr. HAYDON supposes, I am a Member of the Institution, a Trustee for the intended Building, and a Manager of the Annual Exhibition of Pictures, in the establishment of which (notwithstanding Mr. HAYDON's very extraordinary and gratuitous assumption of my hostility or indifference to the Arts), I have had the pleasure of taking an active part.

Mr. HAYDON requests me to answer the two following questions:—

1st. Was not application made relating to the Casts of the Elgin Marbles?

2d. If so, were Casts from the Elgin Marbles for young men to draw from, or for lectures on Literature?

I have already mentioned in my former letter, that about three years ago an attempt was made at Plymouth to establish a School of Art. At this period, I know that application was made to Mr. HAYDON for Casts from the Elgin Marbles; the attempt failed, and the Casts were consequently not sent. Very recently, it was suggested to the Committee for carrying the proposed Building into effect, that the Elgin Casts would be an appropriate decoration for the anti-room or lobby. Mr. HAYDON was accordingly again applied to on the subject.

The second question (although no doubt very facetious) I confess I do not exactly comprehend: the answer to the first may however do very well for an answer to this also.

Mr. HAYDON takes great pains to prove what I am not at all disposed to deny, viz. that a School of Art would not interfere with the sessions of the Institution, nor with the exhibitions. He says, how can an exhibition for two months in the year hinder study for the remaining eight? By the bye, I cannot help remarking on this novelty of curtailing the year of two months, to which it has an undoubted legitimate claim. Would not the good old method of assigning twelve months to the year have strengthened Mr. HAYDON's argument? But, Sir, the question at issue is not a question of expediency. The plain fact is, that no School of Art is intended. The money for constructing the building was raised among the Members of the Institution, the Trustees were elected from that body, and the Managers of the exhibitions must pay rent to them for the use of the rooms.

And now that I have, as I hope, set this question at rest, allow me to say, that so far from being unfriendly to the Arts, I was one of the first, and not the least active, in endeavouring to establish a School of Art at Plymouth three years ago, and that whenever there appears a reasonable prospect of success, such aid as I have in my power to give to so laudable an attempt shall not be wanting.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Plymouth-Dock, March 25, 1818.

ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE LIFE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LANCASTER GAZETTE.

SIR,—Ingenious men, in every age, have amused themselves with endeavouring to discover the nature of Animal Life. My agricultural pursuits have led me to conclude, that the principle of animal and vegetable life is the same; and that the different result is only in the difference of their organization.—Let us admit, if for my argument only, that human ingenuity cannot increase the vegetable matter on the surface of the earth; yet every farmer can manufacture all the vegetables on his farm into animals (and, vice versa,) he can kill, mince them, put them under his furrows, and bring them out in similar vegetables to those from which they were composed.

The ever-living and as ever-active particles they mostly consist of go (as disorganization proceeds) into the next growing vegetable, or take advantage of the atmosphere's wafting them to a fallow (particularly a limed one, or where the greatest chymical affinity exists) for re-organization into that plant (or rule of organization) the seed of which the farmer has just sown.

Presuming then, that the vegetable or animal particle or principle of life is the constituent part of every thing living, and that the animal body contains a multitude of secretory organs, each of which perhaps passes this vital particle in close adhesion with such matter as the organ is destined to furnish, for the supply of the particular part of the body requiring it, such as the bones, skin, &c.; these secretory organs may be regulated in receiving and passing the particles, so combined, by the shape of their capillary tubes, or on the chymical affinity which these organs possess, to add due matter to the vital particle, without which I presume no inert matter can circulate through them. If disorder in the system arises from an undue supply of this vital principle, or the want of matter, calcareous, metallic, or otherwise, to combine with it, the medical professor supplies what his experience tells him has afforded relief in a similar case: for he cannot, nor does he pretend to, prescribe from any scientific knowledge of animal economy. Every hint tending to this discovery has therefore been received by the liberal man with respect.

I have been led more particularly to these remarks, from a recent publication, where it is argued, in the event of death, whether the soul waited the day of judgment to be joined by its respective body, ere it ascended to its destined abode.

If we refer to the Egyptian, Indian, or Chinese records, we shall find the age of the world to be not less than 20,000 years. Now imagine all the animal carcasses to be still here, in distinct parcels, with their particles stowed as close as possible: they would cover the entire surface of the earth to at least 12 feet thick. Is it not more rational to suppose, therefore, that the clothing we have used, or worn out, should be re-manufactured for succeeding generations, and that it can be only fit for us while the soul sojourns here; and that a more proper clothing for our hereafter is provided for us by the Great Provider? The whole creation has revealed his existence and his providence to all mankind in its incomprehensible order, grandeur, and simplicity. The grandeur and sublimity of the human soul (I submit) would not be consistent with animal creation, if we took our old clothes with us.—I am, very respectfully, Sir, your most humble servant,

MR. BROUGHAM.

Extract of a Letter from Kendal, dated Monday night. "This day of great expectation has at length arrived; and notwithstanding the prodigious concourse from all parts, every thing, as was predicted by Mr. Brougham's party, has passed with perfect tranquillity. He was drawn above 13 miles by the people, from the borders of the county, and the procession was splendid beyond any thing that had ever been seen here. The thousands who filled up the road and the streets, though animated with an unexampled zeal in the cause, conducted themselves with exemplary decorum, and the whole day afforded a remarkable contrast to the 11th of February, when the Lowther party, disappointed of any thing like a tolerably warm reception, shewed their spite by raising a riot. The most respectable persons in the Independent cause gave Mr. B. a grand dinner, which was most numerously attended. The day was snowy; but this did not prevent the people from remaining in the streets, while he addressed them in a speech, of which it is to be hoped some account may be transmitted. No time remains now to add more, except that the town and neighbourhood is still filled with bands of people parading peaceably, singing and playing, or congratulating each other upon the day's proceedings, and looking forward to the certain triumph of their interesting and just cause. To-morrow Mr. Brougham begins his progress through the principal places of the County, where the people are to meet him from the more remote districts. He is to be in the two wards on this side all the week, and then to proceed to the opposite side, which, it is supposed, will occupy less time. It is quite impossible to describe the spirit and devotion to the Independent cause which every where prevails. A more animating scene never was witnessed, nor one more instructive to the Rulers of the Country and to domineering Family Influence."

MR. CANNING.

Our readers, no doubt, noticed the subdued tone of Mr. Canning, when called upon in the House by Mr. Lambton to explain what he meant by his insolent observation about "dolls and idiots." How valiant the Lisbon Jobber was, while slandering an absent, ill-used, and diseased old man—how facetious in his description of the dreadful surgical operation under which the poor creature had writhed in agonies!—But when a high-spirited and patriotic young Member demanded explanation, how the Right Honourable shuffled, and retracted, and mumbled about "words dropt in the heat of debate!"—Really, when we reflect upon the entire conduct of this low-minded and high-stationed personage, we are at a loss to say which he is most distinguished for, impudence or meanness. Mr. Canning abuses the lower classes, from whom he sprang; he connects himself with men in power by deserting his first friends and early opinions; he satirizes bitterly men whom he afterwards supports and praises; he denounces Lord Castlereagh in particular, as altogether incapable, meanly intrigues to overturn him, declares that his honour (his honour!) forbids his acting with such a Colleague—and finally accepts employment under this very Imbecile; he takes 14,000*l.* in one year out of the public purse, for doing absolutely nothing; he gets a miserable pension for his aged mother, though he possesses a large private fortune by marriage, and a large public one by practices which are well known; and lastly, in order to do something for his dirty wages, and assist to stifle the complaints of the oppressed, he turns parliamentary buffoon, and "excites some barren spectators to laugh" at that which "makes the judicious grieve."—Viewing him altogether, perhaps a more disgusting character never figured on the public stage; and it is one of the worst signs of the times, when such a being can manage to keep a high station in the Government in spite of the general contempt and loathing.

The following Letter appeared in the Chronicle of Friday:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE CANNING, &c. &c.

SIR,—As a distant relation of the unfortunate Ogden, I could not but be struck with disgust and indignation at your making his case the subject of ridicule in a late Debate in the House of Commons on the Indemnity Bill. What, Sir, are the facts upon which you raised an unfeeling laugh? Ogden is a man far advanced in age. He has for years past been afflicted with a grievous bodily infirmity. At the instigation of some skulking unknown Informer, he was arrested under a charge of High Treason. In these circumstances, neither his age nor his infirmity obtained for him any leniency of treatment: though it was evidently impossible for him either to resist or to escape the officers of justice, he was loaded with irons, which were continued on him after he was confined in prison. Under this treatment he was near sinking, and his infirmity was so much aggravated, that he was obliged to submit to an operation, the consequence of which must be either death or relief. By the blessing of God upon a skilful and benevolent hand, the latter took place. And because Ogden did not die under the surgeon's knife, his pain and peril are made the subject of ridicule, and you represent him as laid under obligation by "being cured at the charge of the public." Who are you, Sir, that thus taunt misery and misfortune? True, Ogden is poor—he is, if you please, a pauper. But what are you? When you are out of place, are not you a pauper, receiving from the general parish, by quarterly payments, two thousand a year? What is the conduct of the Reformers when compared with your's? When you went to Lisbon for the benefit of your son's health, they did indeed complain that for your convenience an Embassy was got up, which put 14,000*l.* a-year into your pocket. But did they make a savage sport of the infirmity of your boy? The hardness of your heart makes you deaf to the plainest suggestions of common sense. Some time ago you attacked the legitimacy of Lord Folkestone's ancestor; and now, while you have at home a sad instance of disease, you can joke upon bodily infirmities! This insatiation makes all sober people shudder. I hope you will repent your folly betime; for you may rest assured (and despise not the intimation because it comes from an obscure individual) that if a severe visitation of Providence is insufficient to teach a vain man wisdom, the course of events, or special interposition, will bring upon him a heavier judgment. I remain, in the cant of the world, your obedient servant,

Oldham, near Manchester.

SOUTHWARK REPRESENTATION.

A considerable number of the Electors of Southwark met on Thursday in the Borough, when it was resolved to invite the gallant Sir ROBERT WILSON to become a Candidate at the ensuing General Election, and to support his return at the expense of the electors, on the same judicious plan as that adopted by Westminster. Several Gentlemen, in consequence, on Friday waited on Sir ROBERT, who accepted the invitation, and a canvas will be immediately commenced.—At the above Meeting Mr. AULT presided; and Mr. HALL informed the company, that in a conversation with Sir F. BURDETT on the subject, he told him that he had known Sir ROBERT for 30 years, that he was a fast friend to Parliamentary Reform, and that he was therefore extremely anxious to see him in Parliament. Sir FRANCIS added, that when he stood for Middlesex it had cost him 60,000*l.*, though he did not intend to have expended more than 1,500*l.*, which was an evil that ought to be remedied. It was intimated, that it would be desirable that Mr. CALVERT, whose vote had never deviated from the cause of independence, should be returned with Sir ROBERT WILSON to represent the Borough.—We have reason to believe that the patriotic wishes of these Gentlemen will be successful, and that Southwark, as well as Westminster, will have the satisfaction of sending a representative equally able and willing to support the vital cause of Reform.

WESTMINSTER MEETING.

On Monday a numerous meeting of the Electors of Westminster was held in Palace-Yard, for the purpose of adopting Resolutions on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. At one Sir F. Burdett, Lord Cochrane, Mr. Hunt, and others, took their places on the hustings.

Sir F. BURDETT then came forward, amidst loud shouts of applause. He stated he had been desired to preside at the present meeting, the object of which was to consider of the best means of obtaining a full, free, and equal representation of the people in Parliament. The gentlemen, he said, who desired him to preside there, would address them on this great constitutional point; and he hoped they would give a fair and attentive hearing to every gentleman who should deliver his sentiments.—(Loud applause.)

Major CARTWRIGHT said, if he had a voice as loud as the largest bell, they should hear him, while he stated the grievances under which the people laboured; because there never was a time when it was more necessary than the present for the people to hear those who were disposed to give them good advice. (Applause.) As he himself had now nearly outlived his faculties, and nearly outlived the Constitution itself, he was not able to address them at the length that his inclination prompted him to; and therefore he hoped they would excuse his inability to make a long speech; but he had written an Address to the Electors, which had already been sent forth. He should now therefore content himself with proposing his resolutions.—Major Cartwright then proposed his first resolution, the substance of which was, that Parliament held a vicarious and delegated trust; that they could not suspend the liberties of the country, which would be the subversion of the Constitution; and that they had no authority to screen, by an act of indemnity, any persons who had been guilty of violations of that Constitution.

Mr. WALKER seconded this resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Major CARTWRIGHT said, that in his next resolution he had to take notice of a fact, which had not been sufficiently attended to in public meetings. For the last 24 years Parliamentary Reformers had become objects of public persecution. He took the date of the commencement of those persecutions from the time when Mr. Horne Tooke and Hardy were taken up on charges of high treason, merely because they wanted to obtain a Reform in Parliament—because they had committed acts of treason against the boroughmongers. After mentioning several other prosecutions of a similar character, he moved the second resolution, which was carried unanimously. It expressed the conviction of the meeting that Parliamentary Reformers had been calumniated and persecuted for the purposes of corruption. The third resolution, expressing censure of the rejection of 468 printed Petitions, was next put.

Lord COCHRANE disapproved of printed Petitions, as more liable to suspicion than written Petitions, and proposed to substitute a resolution expressing indignation against the acts of spies, &c.

Mr. HUNT spoke in favour of printed Petitions, and against the resolution of the Noble Lord.

After considerable discussion, the amendment was negatived, and the original resolution was carried.

Major CARTWRIGHT next read a Petition to the House of Commons, containing their sentiments upon the subject of printed Petitions.—It was carried unanimously.

The 4th resolution, recommending Petitions with 20 signatures, in compliance with the 13th of Charles II. being moved,

Lord COCHRANE hoped he should not be suspected of any intention to throw obstructions in the way, but he could not refrain from expressing his confidence, that the inhabitants of Westminster would never show such deference to the acts of a tyrant, as was implied by the resolution now proposed.—(Applause.)—He begged again to express his strong disapprobation of printed and uniform Petitions. They afforded great facility to forgery. He had himself received numbers of such forged Petitions. He would not be the instrument of scattering infamy against the reformers, by producing such forgeries in the House of Commons. They were the production of the boroughmongers; and the same Hon. Gentlemen would be ready to stand up in their places, if he produced their Petitions, to say that they were forgeries, and that he was one of those who forged them. He should on this ground oppose the resolution proposed, as encouraging this great abuse. Public meetings were the best bulwark of liberty. The only influence that could affect the assembly which met over the way, was fear. They were in their hearts cowards. Conscious of mal-administration, they trembled to encounter the public voice from public meetings.—(Great applause.)—Why had they prohibited their meeting in that place where their forefathers had been accustomed to meet, and to discuss public questions? The pretended reason was palpably absurd. The true cause was fear of encountering the public voice. (Applause.) The whole acts of that assembly were against the people, for establishing military despotism, and for sharing among themselves the plunder of the people.—(Much cheering.)—He therefore moved as an amendment, "That notwithstanding the act prohibiting Petitions with more than 50 signatures, and notwithstanding the proneness of Ministers to prosecute according to law, and contrary to law, the people should, like their forefathers, meet in thousands, and hundreds of thousands, and cordially co-operate, to obtain redress of grievances." He hoped the men of Westminster would not follow the example of the gentleman (Mr. Hunt) who had said that he was ready to support every thing that should be proposed by Major Cartwright. Neither approbation nor disapprobation was valuable unless they judged for themselves.—(Great applause.)

Mr. PARKINS agreed with the Noble Lord in this, as he did in every thing else proposed by him on that day.

Major CARTWRIGHT said, that there was no difference between the Noble Lord (Cochrane) and himself in point of principle. It was the opinion of the Judges, in the time of Lord George Gordon, when a law of the same kind existed, that it would be illegal for more than the prescribed number to sign a Petition. If Oliver or Castles, or any other spy, could prevail upon more than 20 to sign a Petition, the consequence would be that the persons so signing might be put in prison and fined 100*l*. People ought to be put upon their guard against such a snare. It was not for his own individual safety that he made the proposition. He was ready to sign any such Petition as that alluded to by the Noble Lord (Cochrane), and to encounter any personal risk that might arise from it. Petitions signed by great numbers were more liable to fraud than such as were signed by only the limited number of 20. It appeared that forged Petitions had come from two or three places. The motive was to give the borough faction an opportunity of saying in the House of Commons that they were forged, and thereby of throwing odium upon the cause of Reform. The Petitions alluded to were forged very probably by the borough faction itself. They were sent down to the places from whence they came, and every effort would be made to discover the authors of them.

The amendment of the Noble Lord (C.) was then put, and carried unanimously.—Lord Cochrane then proposed the resolution formerly negatived; it was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. WALKER came forward next with the 5th resolution, which recommended, as a convenient model for Petitions, a concise prayer for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.

Mr. HUNT stated, that he always would maintain, that every man who could be called to resist an invasion was entitled to be represented in Parliament. The principle had never before been fairly brought before the electors. This principle it was particularly necessary to have brought forward, because one of their representatives had never avowed his support of it. He hoped that member would now manfully tell them his resolution respecting it.—(Applause and some hisses.)

Lord COCHRANE hoped that, after ten years' observation of his conduct as their representative, they would not now call upon him to avow his political opinions. He was more especially unwilling to enter upon such an avowal at the call of an individual. The resolution was then put and carried.

Major CARTWRIGHT came forward with the next five resolutions at once. They were a set of propositions which formed a legal chain to prove that the House of Commons was bound to do justice, and must, whether they would or not, do justice to the people. The following resolutions were then put:—

6. That, by the law of this land, it appears, that whenever, by "Petition of Right," even a private man empleads the King himself, for that his Majesty wrongfully holds an inheritance belonging to that man, the King, as mere matter of official duty, invariably says in writing, "Let right be done to the party," when a commission is invariably issued to that end.

7. That when, last year, more, as it is believed, than a million of the aggrieved people, speaking, as it is believed, the sense of many millions, empleaded, by their "Petitions of Right," those Members of the House of Commons who wrongfully withhold from the whole nation the most valuable and the most sacred inheritance, Constitutional Representation, the empleaders, instead of being answered that right should be done, were scornfully refused justice, and were, moreover, insulted and calumniated; and their oppressors had influence enough, not only to cause their Petitions to be trampled on, but to procure a suspension also of all laws of protection; in consequence of which, Parliamentary Reformers were inhumanly hunted by the blood hounds of false accusation, into ruin and misery, chains, dungeons, and exile.

8. That every English Court of judicature hath not only attributes, but duties; not only authority, but responsibility: to try, or not to try, an issue, it hath no option; to do, or not to do, its duty, it hath no choice; for, in the English Constitution, as in the code of nature and reason, it is an eternal principle of equity, emphatically reiterated in the maxims of our law, and shines the brightest gem in Magna Charta; that justice should not be denied.

9. That as touching electoral rights, the House of Commons claims to be an exclusive court of judicature, as the Grenville Act sanctions that claim; and as, for redress of the greatest electoral wrongs, the courts of law are accordingly shut against the people; so the House of Commons, one of whose offices it is to impeach unjust judges, cannot enumerate among its privileges that of being itself an unlawful judge; nor among its attributes that of an authority to mock at justice—an impiety peculiarly offensive to God, and disgusting to man.

10. That to deny justice, is to dispense with and to suspend law—a treason for which a king was expelled the throne; and such a denial by a Court that had monopolized all the powers of redress, were an aggravation of the guilt beyond the force of language to express.

11. That it appears to this Meeting, that, in respect to Parliamentary Reform, those are the factious who, against the public right of the nation, set up a private interest of their party;—those are the rash who, to self-evident principles, oppose obviously erroneous opinions;—those are the presumptuous, who, in place of the ancient constitution of their country, prefer modern conceits of their own;—those are the intemperate, who expect the common sense of the community to stoop to their ignorant dictation;—and those are the violent, whose projects, if adopted, would violate our liberties.

They were all carried with acclamation.

Major CARTWRIGHT moved the twelfth resolution, thanking Lord Somers for his Essay against Reform.

Lord COCHRANE hoped the Electors of Westminster had too much respect for themselves to exercise levity on such a very important subject. He would agree to a resolution of reprobation of Lord Somers, not to a resolution of thanks. (Shouts of applause.)

Major CARTWRIGHT consented to withdraw his motion.

The next resolution, thanking Mr. Bentham for his Catechism in support of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage, was unanimously carried.

Major CARTWRIGHT moved, in the 14th resolution, thanks to Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Cochrane, and an assurance that they would benefit their country and gratify their constituents, by bringing in a Bill for Annual Parliaments, Universal Suffrage, and the ballot.

A Gentleman from the crowd called upon Lord Cochrane to explain why his name had not appeared in any of the divisions on the Indemnity Bill.

Lord COCHRANE replied, that the air of the House was enough to poison the devil. Mock debates and sham divisions did mischief. It were better to have no division, but to enter a solemn protest against their proceedings. (Applause.)

Mr. WOOLER came forward amid vehement shouts of applause, and stated, that the Reformers had now come to a certain stage in politics—they had come to the admission of Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments. Their opponents had left the field of argument and taken shelter in the garrison over the way. Researches into antiquity were not so useful as the plain and broad statement of rights inherent and inalienable. The unanimity which now prevailed they owed to the veteran who took the most active part in the proceedings of the day.

Major CARTWRIGHT, in his 15th resolution, expressed, that it was a salutary practice to refuse supplies till grievances were redressed.

Mr. HUNT seconded this resolution, and mentioned two instances of successful resistance to the charges of the tax-gatherer, one by himself, the other by one of his farmers in Somersetshire. The people should do as the Quakers did with respect to tithes—refuse to pay taxes, allow Nicholas Vansittart to sell their table, and George Canning to pocket the produce. This could not be long practised. He disapproved of Lord Cochrane's absence from the House. If he were there, he should resist every question while he had breath, and then divide the House. Mr. Hunt then noticed Mr. Canning's conduct. The Noble Lord had surely courage and talents to put down such a person, who, though the son of old mother Hun, a strolling actress, and whose father's name was not even known, had dared to speak with contempt of the "lower orders," and to hold up to derision the cruel sufferings of hapless old men, who writhed under the tortures of oppression. (Applause.)

The resolution was carried unanimously.

When the 16th and last resolution, expressing a confident trust that the people would, by their Petitions, manifest their determination to be free, had been agreed to,—

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, that it now only remained for him to declare the meeting at an end. In putting the long string of resolutions, as their Chairman, it was not necessary to be supposed that he acquiesced in them. No professions of faith were necessary on his part. If his past conduct did not satisfy them that he would incorruptibly, and to the best of his ability, exert himself to obtain, establish, and secure the liberty of his countrymen, he should attempt in vain to satisfy them by professions. He certainly never would express his assent to any proposition in circumstances which could excite a surmise that it was not a voluntary assent. He would only say, that he should always adopt that course which appeared to him most judicious and most likely to be effectual. He would not dwell on the atrocious conduct of Ministers, who had instigated the people to treason, by means of spies, and then covered themselves and their spies with a Bill of Indemnity. He would not attempt to increase their indignation against the gentleman who had descended even from his place in the House, from his rank as a borough-nominee, to act the part of a buffoon on the stage of corruption. He had exhibited tricks, and played in ferocious sport with the agony and sufferings of age, infirmity, and oppression. No assembly in England but one could have endured such an exhibition. He could not now express his sentiments respecting the infamous and atrocious practices of spies. They were execrated by all the feelings of our nature. They were, in reality, had recourse to in order to support corruption. So universal was the conviction among the uncorrupted part of the public that Reform was indispensable, that no other means were left but to employ spies to cast odium on the Reformers, and to support Ministers in their corrupt system. What had they seen? Persons dragged from their families, immured in dungeons, oppressed with every indignity and cruelty, were discharged without trial, their complaints were laughed at, their sufferings were ridiculed. Such was the treason of Ministers against the liberties of their country. At such a height was the evil arrived, that he hoped Ireland and Scotland would join with England in so strong, just, loud, and prevailing a voice, that Ministers would not have it in their power long to withhold redress. Ministers and the House of Commons were the same thing. They were not the Ministers of the Crown, but of borough-nominees. It was very awkward to be obliged to apply for redress to those who had done the injury. The sham pretence of being representatives of the people was now scarce pretended by the House of Commons. He hoped, however, they would become their representatives, and in a short time. The subject of Reform was so thoroughly understood, that every one knew its necessity. He did not agree with his worthy friend, the Major, as to Petitions by small numbers. He agreed with his noble colleague, that the voice of the people, publicly and frequently declared, was the only effectual mode of obtaining their object. Those who blustered about violent measures, whether sincere or not, only brought weak, well-meaning, and good men into terrible scrapes; and from these terrible scrapes they had no power to extricate them. The only security of the people was to turn upon all who proposed violence, and represent their conduct, although even in this there was great danger, for Scholes had suffered in consequence of giving information against Mr. Oliver. But Mr. Oliver was now a part of the establishment of the country. Lord Sidmouth, who, from his familiarity with him, ought to know him best, pronounced him an honourable man. He was of the character of the mouchards de police (Government spies) in France of old, but a character unheard of since England was England, till the present time. But such characters were now vindicated not only by Ministers, but by men of a higher character—by men of singular piety—by men, who not satisfied with the Church of England, inculcated vital Christianity. From his experience of it for nearly a quarter of a century, this vital Christianity was, in fact, mortal Christianity. It was mortal and destructive to the liberties of the world, and to the dearest and best interests of men. In the gradation of the spy-system, there were degrees of criminality which excited corresponding degrees of execration. The spy himself was at the bottom of the scale. Want, necessity, temptation, induced him to practice what his mind abhorred. Far higher in criminality were those who created, employed, and rewarded the spy. The Ministers were thus more infamous than their spies. But there was another degree. Those persons of exalted piety, of exalted characters, who execrated spies, and had hardly words sufficient to express their virtuous indignation against their practices, and could in the same breath pass panégyries on those who employed spies, and give their support to Bills of Indemnity to shield both, were infinitely the most criminal and execrable. In the present days of fashionable orders, they might expect a new order to be called, "the most honourable order of spies." It should have a medallion and a blue riband. On the one side of the medallion should be engraved the figure of Judas; but, no, poor Judas had been uniformly execrated; yet he had repented, and inflicted a suitable act of justice on himself, an example which modern spies were not disposed to imitate. It was the High Priest who had bribed him that was chiefly criminal. This was the Church and State in that age united. On the one side then there should be the figure of the High Priest who created and rewarded the act of the spy, with the motto, "Church and State;" on the other side there should be a vital Christian, and in imitation of a medal struck on the abolition of the Slave Trade, the motto on the exergue should be, "Are we not brothers?" Those who had suffered during the last year had the consolation of having done their duty, and they had the commiseration of their countrymen. They had suffered in the noble cause of supporting sinking liberty, or rather of recovering lost liberty. He hoped he should have fortitude at all times, and, in opposition to all difficulties, to adhere to what he thought most favourable to the liberties of his countrymen.—(Great applause.)

The Meeting dispersed in an orderly manner a few minutes before five o'clock.

POPULATION, CHURCHES, &c.

Two Documents have been laid before Parliament.—The first is an account of Benefices and Population; Churches, Chapels, and their capacity; number and condition of Glebe Houses, and income of all Benefices not exceeding 150*l.* per annum.

Number of persons the Churches and Chapels will contain	419,193
Excess of population above the capacity of Churches and Chapels	2,528,505

POLICE.

LAMBETH-STREET-OFFICE.

Thursday, Geo. Furdley, John Howells, and John Rippon, three notorious characters, were charged under circumstances of the most disgraceful nature. It appeared that some villains on Wednesday morning last entered the premises of Mr. Sheffield, butcher, of Aldgate, and stole three fine bullocks for the purpose of creating a riot, to enable them to commit depredations. In the evening about 800 or 1,000 persons, of the most infamous character, assembled near Stepney fair, and had the bullocks secured with halters till an appointed time, when they were let loose and hunted, and the utmost confusion was raised about the town, in consequence of the whole of the gang pursuing them, being armed with bludgeons, and other weapons, and pelting stones; they took their route towards Whitechapel, and several persons were tossed; a Mrs. Williams, who lives in Lambeth-street, was walking along with her child and was tossed; she and her infant were injured in a dreadful manner. A porter, with a chest of drawers on his head, was likewise tossed, his drawers were smashed, and himself gored in a terrible manner, having one of his arms broken. Several other persons were materially injured. The villains drove the poor beasts about till they became in a state of madness. They drove towards Hare-street, Spitalfields, on entering which, one of the animals rushed into the warehouse of Messrs. Roscier and Jacques, dyers, being followed into the shop by a number of villains who commenced their attack; the whole of the windows were smashed, and likewise the panels at the sides of the shop, and great injury was done to the property. The persons employed on the premises were dreadfully injured by the animal, and infamously maltreated by the robbers. At length the men who worked in the shop succeeded in turning the villains out, and managed to shut and bolt the doors; notwithstanding, the rioters broke open the place, and acted with the utmost violence. The persons in the warehouse, who were furnished with fire-arms, threatened to fire on the depredators, if they did not desist, and being disregarded, they fired, and four or five of the villains were carried off by their companions, supposed for surgical assistance; during this time the other two animals were hunted round the adjacent parts, and information having been received at this Office, Dalton, Fortune, and Foster were dispatched. On their going to the place, it was in the utmost consternation, but a party of the Worship-street officers succeeded in dispersing the rioters; and Dalton, Fortune, and Foster, at the peril of their lives, rushed and seized the prisoners, who were armed with tremendous bludgeons, and brought them to the Office. During the time the mob was in Hare-street, several persons had their pockets picked, and some cut completely off. An officer of Whitechapel, named Richard Plunket, was knocked down and beat by the villains, till they almost murdered him. The prisoners are all ill-looking fellows, well known by the officers. No property was found on them, but their sticks appeared to have been much used.—They were fully committed to take their trial.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

DESPERATE OUTRAGE.—Monday night, at a late hour, Mr. D. Smith, of Turk-street, Bethnal-green, accompanied by his son and nephew, was returning to his residence, after spending the evening at a friend's house on Stepney-green; as they were passing by the Red Lion public-house, in Whitechapel-road, a gang of 30 or 40 villains, rushed on them, and began to ill use and attempt to rob them; they knocked them down and beat them: The party attacked being aware of their intention, made a desperate resistance. On Mr. Smith, jun. getting up off the ground, one of the villains made a snatch at his watch-chain; but the chain and gold seals separated from the watch. Mr. Smith, jun. instantly collared the villain, and cried out "Watch!" and "Murder!" With the assistance of his cousin (Mr. Rogers, a young man), he kept him safe till the watchmen came up. In a short time the whole of the watchmen of the adjacent beats came to the spot, and on proceeding with the villain in custody towards the watch-house, some others being taken into custody, their gang exclaimed—"My boys, rescue, rescue!" On which a numerous body rushed on the watchmen, and made a general attack with sticks, bludgeons, and weapons of every description. Those without weapons of defence wrested the patrol's cutlasses and sticks from them, and laid upon them in a most unmerciful manner. Several of the watchmen were cut in a dreadful manner, and were taken to the Hospital; others were left on the ground in a state of insensibility; the rest endeavoured to apprehend the miscreants, but in vain. Wm. Rogers, nephew of Mr. Smith, in assisting his cousin off the ground, received a most tremendous blow with a bludgeon on the head, which felled him to the ground, and he was left weltering in his blood. Mr. Smith, sen. was very much injured on his head and body, as likewise his son. A watchman, named Burford, had his skull fractured by a blow with a bludgeon; another watchman, named Row, was dreadfully lacerated. Several persons were passing by from Stepney Fair, who took an active part in the affair, and suffered considerably. The villain who was taken by Mr. Smith, jun. was, however, safely conveyed to the watch-house, and in the morning was brought before the Magistrates at Lambeth-street. The evidence being quite satisfactory, the prisoner was fully committed to take his trial. He is a well-known character, named Thomas Healdy.

Tuesday evening, soon after dusk, an elderly gentleman passing along Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, was hustled by five or six pickpockets, who jostled him into the mud, and at the same moment he received two or three blows with a stick on the breast, his watch was taken out of his fob, and the gang ran away towards Wild-street. They were instantly pursued, but made their escape.

Fire.—About half-past two on Wednesday morning, the old-established tavern called the Barley-Mow, in Salisbury-court, Fleet-street, was discovered to be on fire. Mr. Knott was from home on business. Mrs. Knott, four female servants, and a female visitor, were roused from their sleep by the fire reaching their apartments. They fled as they arose from their beds to the top of the house, as the chance of descending was impossible; the whole of the lower part of the premises being in flames. Most fortunately for them there was a way out of a garret-window to the top of the house, and, after passing over the adjoining building, they succeeded in getting into the window of the next dwelling, and so escaped. The fire continued to rage with great fury, notwithstanding the prompt arrival of the engines; until the old tavern was entirely destroyed, and the roof of the house occupied by the Prayer-Book and Homily Society was burnt off, and the house on the other side, also received considerable injury. Great anxiety was for a considerable time entertained for the extensive premises of Mr. Joseph Bonser, as the fire had completely reached to the bottom of one of his warehouses, and but for the efforts of Mr. Bonser himself, ably assisted by a faithful servant, they would in all probability have been destroyed. The cause of the fire has not been ascertained.

An inquisition was held on Wednesday in Upper Berkeley-street, on the body of Mr. Robert Prosser, of Adam-street West. Charles Want visited the deceased on Sunday last: they entered into conversation; the deceased was very unwell; he asked him what ailed him? he shook his head and said, "all was not right;" he asked him what was the occasion of his dejection, and he informed him that his pecuniary affairs were deranged, and he was almost mad; he burst into tears, and then raved very incoherently: he was alarmed and left him.—Mr. Z. Meene, on the night of Sunday, slept at the house of the deceased, and was alarmed about four o'clock in the morning by the cries of Mrs. Prosser: he ran down stairs, and saw the deceased lying at the top of the first stair-case; his head was hanging over the stairs; he found his throat shockingly cut: he was conveyed into the back parlour and medical assistance sent for, but before the Surgeon arrived Mr. P. was dead.—Robert Goody, Surgeon, said, the main artery of the neck and the wind-pipe were severed.—Verdict, Insanity.—Upon further inquiry it appears the deceased left his bed and went into the privy, where he committed the act: he took a dish with him to catch the blood; and it is supposed he threw the instrument down the privy.—After he cut his throat he ran up stairs, where he fell, and was found by Mr. Meene.

Saturday week, Isaac White, aged 32, George Biggs, aged 19, and William Johnson, aged 26, were executed near Winchester. White was convicted of uttering forged notes; Johnson of highway robbery; Biggs's crime was a burglary in the house of his master, from which he carried nearly 400*l.* in cash and notes. Great interest was exerted in his behalf. Petitions, signed by the Minister, parish-officers, and a number of respectable inhabitants of Gosport and Alverstoke, were presented to Lord Sidmouth and Sir S. Holroyd, to commute his sentence to transportation for life; the reply to which was, that "the Judges are determined that the law shall take its course in all cases where servants of any description may be convicted of being concerned in robbing their masters."

In the High Court of Justiciary, at Edinburgh, on Wednesday week, the Rev. Joseph Robertson, of Leith Wynd Chapel, and W. Pearson, a spirit-dealer, in Canongate, were found guilty of using forged certificates of marriage banns, and marrying persons illegally, by the aid of such forgeries. They are both to be imprisoned three months in Canongate gaol, and afterwards Mr. Robertson is to be banished Scotland for life, and Pearson for 14 years.

On Wednesday morning, a young man, of very respectable connections, was killed in a contest, by a man named Price. The affair began in the public-house called Hillier's Ferry, near Walthamstow, and the parties having agreed on their seconds, commenced a fight in regular rounds, when the unfortunate man, since deceased, gave in, saying he could fight no longer. His second, however, insisted on his continuing the battle; and holding him up, bid his antagonist strike, when a blow was hit somewhere about the stomach, which killed him on the spot.

BIRTH.

On Tuesday the 24th, in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, Mrs. Henry Sass, of a boy.

DEATHS.

At the Naval Hospital, Plymouth, on the 18th instant, Mr. George Grover, at the age of 19, late a Midshipman of his Majesty's ship Impregnable—a young man much beloved by all who knew him, and a rising ornament to his profession.

On the 15th instant, after an illness of three days, in the 4th year of her age, Lady Caroline Parker, daughter of the Earl of Morley.

Sunday fortnight, at Edinburgh, Hector Macneil, Esq. known to the literary world as the author of "Will and Jean," and other productions.

On the 19th inst. in Arundel-street, Mr. George Ward, of the firm of Southby, Allison, and Co. coal-merchants.

On the 20th inst. at Bristol, Lieut.-Colonel Henry Balfour, late of the East India Company's Service, Bengal Establishment.

On the 25th instant, at Kensington, Mr. Robert Garrard, goldsmith, of Pantou-street, in the 61st year of his age.

On Saturday last, at her house in Chapel-street, Grosvenor-place, in her 27th year, the Hon. Miss Hawke, a Lady (says our Correspondent) eminently distinguished by her many amiable qualities, superior literary attainments, and above all, by her ardent devotion to religion, laudably evinced at an early period of her life, in her excellent Poem of Babylon, &c.

On the 18th inst. in the 78th year of his age, Thomas Warburton, Esq. formerly Major in the 7th Regiment of Dragoons.

On Wednesday, the 25th inst. of apoplexy, the Rev. John Kennett Parker, of Barking, Essex.

On the 21st inst. at Iddene, Berkshire, Lieut.-General Charles Tarrant, late of the Royal Engineers, in his 89th year.

On the 7th of February, at Kingston, Upper Canada, Captain Sir Robert Hall, Commissioner of his Majesty's Navy in the Canadas, &c. after a short but very severe illness, in the 39th year of his age.

Sunday morning, Mr. Luke, of Bermondsey-street: he had just finished his breakfast, and was in the act of reaching a prayer-book from the book-case, for the purpose of taking with him to church, when he fell down and instantly expired. His son was in the room, and instantly sent for a medical gentleman; but every effort to restore animation proved ineffectual.

ON THE EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN MANUFACTORIES.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

We are happy to lay before our readers another letter on this subject from the same excellent person that wrote the last. We need not repeat what we said in our preface to it; but we are bound, as human beings, who luckily have it in our power, to shew all the respect and give all the assistance we can to such publications; and indeed it is hardly possible to refrain from some remarks upon them, if it is only to wonder that they can want a good word from any one.

But so completely has this country been spoiled by the appetite of money-getting,—so completely has it taken leave of the real virtues and happy and natural pleasures of its ancestors,—so badly and with so many perversions even of terms themselves does avarice educate its worshippers,—so fatally do they confound industry with unceasing toil, leisure with idleness, pleasure (which is a part of virtue) with vice, an unhappy cunning with wisdom, their own false and superfluous gains with necessity and real profit, and yet at the same time the very necessities of others with superfluity,—that it is become necessary to ring the commonest and most obvious truths in their ears in order to waken them out of their feverish absurdities. They are what a nation would be who had so lost all sight of literature, that the simile of beauty and a rose should be a new thing to them. It is necessary to inform them, that there are such things as justice, and generosity, and health;—that there is fresh air to breathe as well as foul, and green fields to enjoy as well as manufactories to make pins and palsies in. They are like people in a delirium, who should toss unceasingly in their beds, and fancy the restlessness proper labour,—who should grasp the bed-clothes, and hug them to their hearts as gain. Nor are they subject only to paroxysms;—they take themselves perpetually for the staidest people in the world, though they are debauched with one of the worst vices. They do their best to secure themselves gout or insipidity in old age through the medium of care and ignorance all the rest of their lives; and this they call prudence. They contrive to make their faces pale, hollow, and wrinkled with anxiety, or red, puffed out, and of a horrible glazy sleekness with wine and gluttony; and these are the signs of their success. They are ignorant of letters; they confound ostentation with taste and mere possession with enjoyment; they take twenty times as much pains as any other men to be unhealthy and full of care; and all this they call knowing! Finally, these accomplished persons, like so many vulgar rogues in a farce, propose each other as models to the rising generation! Look, say they, at Mr. TOMKINS;—

what an establishment he has!—Observe Mr. JENKINS;—he's the best man in the city!—We accordingly look at TOMKINS, and find that he might as well be surrounded with Ethiopic alphabets as with his establishment;—we observe JENKINS, and see that he is a very great rascal.

The case however would not be so bad, if these persons punished none but themselves. To that kind of punishment they might have some right or pretence. It would be very deplorable, no doubt, and worthy of our utmost efforts to alter it; but still it would not be by any means so bad or so lasting as it is now; for certain it is, that although they have good arguments on their side neither in truth, nor even, on a little inspection, in appearance, yet the rising generations hitherto have been very successfully ruined by these involuntary defeaters of health and happiness. Individuals escape here and there, where the parents by some singular chance have produced an intelligent one; and of late years, prejudices have been so shaken, that more of these individuals may have been born or made than heretofore. We think they have. But to say nothing of those other young men who are driven to bad extremes by their fathers example, that is to say, who are either made to resemble them in their love of money-getting, or want sense enough to turn their disgust at it to right account, and so run into mere idleness and profligacy (both of which classes, observe, are spoiled by the same system), there are hundreds and thousands of young creatures, who by the dreadful inequalities that result from these false modes of gain, are compelled into its service, to the premature destruction of all human happiness. It is in behalf of these that Mr. OWEN pleads. He first addressed the Ministers, who are the servants of the Borough-mongers; and as a body, perhaps he had even more chance with these than with the persons he now addresses: yet doubtless there are some among them, as in other money-getting classes, who see and feel beyond the pale into which chance may have thrown them, and let us hope that these at any rate will listen to him, and do their utmost to further his recommendations. They have sense, and can see the better advantages of it;—they have humanity, and will recoil from this shocking sacrifice of children to the devil of lucre. The fiery offerings to Moloch were less inhuman. The sacrificers, in that instance, though beguiled by a diabolical superstition, did not contemplate years of suffering for their infants, nor do it for the most paltry kind of gain. They acted under the influence of that feeling which under so many disguises has done so much mischief in all ages,—the fear of a power whom the bad passions of its worshippers endowed with the most shocking inhumanity. But the sacrifice, though horrible, was comparatively instantaneous, and the victim till the very moment of suffering was unconscious. By the present system, children are snatched from the healthy air and their recreations to be imprisoned all day long in a kind of hell upon earth; their natural cheerfulness is checked, or turned into callous impudence; their bodies are blighted with unnatural warmth and inaction, the minds w equally unnatural thought or sullenness; their growth is either stunted or prematurely run up into weakness; their morals as well as health are spoilt from ignorant contact, and from the tendency under such circumstances to get any pleasure at any rate; instead of ruddy and sparkling faces, they have pale and careful ones; instead of the fresh air, they breathe the deadly fumes of fires and metals; instead of the birds, they hear nothing but the click of combs or the grinding of engines, or oaths and ribaldry; instead of genial exercise, they are moved like mill-horses, or use only their arms or their fingers, the rest of their bodies being imprisoned by inactivity; and all this lingering torture is called habits of industry!—The little victims, by a process less violent but more continual, are condemned to the old Inquisitorial torture of “the slow pan and the gradual fire,” and a phrase is to make us believe it good and refreshing! Habits of industry! They might as well call swearing a habit of piety, or habits of drinking temperance. They might as well fasten a child to a corpse, and call it habits of sociality. The children get nothing but what they would willingly throw off, and throw them perhaps at their masters’ heads into the bargain. It is first a sense of premature sorrow in themselves, and then a sense of the gross and selfish injustice exercised towards them by others, that renders these schools of industry the certain schools of debauchery and despair, and the probable schools of all which the masters fear and have reason to fear in the shape of theft, of riot, of Luddism, and when the excess of the provocation is complete, or rather the long-suffering patience exhausted, of bloody revolution.

Let the sacrificers of other people’s children and the abettors of the system think of this, if they can be brought to a sense of nothing else; and save the rest of the community as well as themselves from the possible consequences of their obstinacy. Borough-mongers and standing armies are as dust in the balance, whenever a time comes at which the inequality in the scales is destroyed by its own weight, and the empty one dashes against the beam. We live, at this very moment, in awful times;—kings and emperors foolishly breaking their promises, the community well informed and exceedingly discontented, and (to say nothing of spies and other grounds of disgust) a system of finance in our own country which calculators, who have never yet been disproved, say must infallibly tumble about our ears. The worst evils to be feared may still, we think, be avoided, but only by a readiness on all prosperous sides to act with decent justice; and if they will go on overbearing, working, and exacting, with the very laws of nature as well as the constitution against them; and dare a point of time

When everwrought the general system feels

Its functions stop, or frenzy fire the wheels, they bring the consequences upon themselves, however they may still be pitied for them as human beings;—but this mind has only to do with those consequences;—all the rest of the question, all the intermediate parts of it, are the same whether such catastrophes follow or not; and children have a right to demand not to be withered and tortured, even if tenfold the supposed advantages resulted to their employers, instead of useless riches, bad consciences, or a more shocking hard-heartedness.

TO BRITISH MANUFACTURERS.

I beg to address you, Gentlemen, on behalf of a cause in which, as men and fellow subjects, we are all deeply interested—the amelioration of the circumstances of those whom we employ as operatives in our various manufactures. Many of you, who have received a liberal education, will, I am sure, acknowledge that it is a subject of great national importance, and will consider it with more just and enlarged views, than the narrow principles of immediate gain might suggest. To such it would be presumption in me to offer any explanation of that which must already be obvious to them; but there are others who have not been so fortunate—who have never had the leisure to study or to think about matters of this nature; and for these only are the following observations intended.

Practices now prevail in our manufacturing system, which have been produced by circumstances, not under the controul of any individual, and for which, therefore, no individual can be justly blamed. They are, however, notoriously the source of most grievous evils, and stand in the way of improvements in the condition of our working classes, which are essential to the well-being of the state, and without which indeed its security must rest on a very precarious foundation. I refer to the premature employment of children; and to the unreasonable term of daily labour, now exacted from persons of all ages who are employed within our manufactories. It is to these practices we may attribute the worst effects of the manufacturing system; and if we permit them to continue, through mere indifference to the subject, or from the egregious and fatal delusion that they are connected with the prosperity of our manufactures, we must be content to suffer all the evils arising from the increasing misery and demoralization of the working classes. But it is my most earnest wish to excite the public attention to this important question; and to do away with any delusion that may exist in your quarter respecting it—to convince you that the continuance of these practices is directly opposed to every individual interest in the country; and that these fruitful sources of evil may be effectually closed without even diminishing the immediate gains of the master manufacturer.

Let us direct our attention, in the first place, to the unnatural circumstances in which the younger part of our operatives are now placed. Children are permitted to be employed, almost from infancy, in our manufactures, all of which are more or less unhealthy. They are condemned to a routine of long, protracted and unvarying toil within doors, at an age when their time should be exclusively divided between HEALTHFUL EXERCISES IN THE OPEN AIR, AND THEIR SCHOOL EDUCATION. The utmost violence is thus offered to nature at their very outset in life. Their intellectual, as well as their physical powers, are cramped and paralysed, instead of being allowed their proper and natural development; while every thing about them conspires to render their moral character depraved and dangerous. Without a vigorous constitution and good habits, children can never become really useful subjects of the state; nor can their lives be rendered comfortable to themselves, or uninjurious to others. While so many obstacles are unnecessarily opposed to that mode of training for the rising generation, which humanity and expediency so strongly recommend, society is alone to blame for the imbecility and suffering that may arise within it; the offspring of our poor must continue to be squalid and wretched,—to be untaught for any good or really useful purpose, but admirably trained to effect their own misery,—destined to disturb the peace of society in their younger days, and at an early period to become a burthen on the community for the remainder of life, eating that bread in idleness, which, if the state did justice to them or to itself, would never be claimed by any, not naturally infirm, except as the reward of useful industry. I conceive it to be a fact which consists equally with the experience of every one of you as it does with mine, that the labour of a child, strong and healthy, possessed of intelligence, and of good habits and dispositions, is infinitely more valuable than that of one who is weak and unhealthy, imbecile in mind, and of depraved habits and dispositions. But though this fact is abundantly clear, it may not occur to you to trace the cause of this difference between the two individuals, and to perceive, that in almost every case this great disparity is to be referred altogether to the different circumstances under which they have been trained and educated. A very little examination and reflection, however, will convince you that this is the true state of the case; and I will not allow myself to suppose, that in the face of so striking a fact, you will any longer have any desire to employ the inferior instrument, when, by means of regulations as practicable as they are humane, you may with certainty procure the best.

No child should be employed within doors in any manufacture until he is twelve years of age. In those manufactures in which dexterity of operation is much more easily acquired by children at an early than at a more advanced period of life, they might perhaps be employed, in order to obtain such facility, for five or six hours a-day, when between ten and twelve years of age; but I am of opinion that any advantage thus procured can be obtained only by tenfold sacrifices on the part of the children, their parents, and their country. I think an intelligent slave master would not, on the sole principle of pecuniary gain, employ his young slaves even ten hours of the day at so early an age. And we know that judicious farmers will not prematurely put their young beasts of burden to work; and that when they do put them to work, it is with great moderation at first, and, we must remember too, in a healthy atmosphere. But children from seven to eight years of age are employed with young persons and men and women of all ages, for 14 or 15 hours per day, in many of our manufactures, carried on in buildings in which the atmosphere is by no means the most favourable to human life.

If the well-being of our fellow-creatures be a more important object than a fractional diminution of the prime cost of a few articles of commerce—often very useless ones—and if that object be a primary consideration in any change in the practices and habits of society, then surely the present generation has gone far astray from the right course, when it has exchanged nine hours of healthy and really productive labour, for fourteen hours of unhealthy, and often of useless or pernicious employment. To mark the contrast of the two systems, look at the healthy, comparatively well trained, Scottish peasant boy, who attends the parochial school until he is fourteen or fifteen years old,—and then turn your eyes to the feeble, pale, and wretched flax or cotton spinning children, who, at an early age, are doomed all the year round to one unvarying occupation for fourteen or fifteen hours a-day, going to their work in winter before it is light in the morning, and returning long after dark. And here I may well ask—how should we like our children, girls as well as boys, to be thus employed? Would any of us permit our slaves, if we were obliged to maintain them, to be so treated? Surely it is but necessary to call your attention to these facts, and you must instantly be aware of the injustice and useless cruelty, which we thus inflict upon the most helpless beings in society. At this moment I feel almost ashamed to address any human being on such a subject.

You may perhaps admit that the legislature has a right to regulate the labour of these helpless children, and that you would not suffer much inconvenience from being obliged to employ persons of more advanced age in their place: but the free labourer, you may say, should be permitted to work, as long as he is willing, for hire. If the operatives in our manufactures were really free, and had the option to work nine or fifteen hours a day, it might be less necessary to legislate on this subject. But what is their actual situation in this respect? Are they, in any thing but appearance, free labourers? Would they not, in fact, be compelled to work the customary hours though they were 20? What alternative have they—or what freedom is there in this case, but the liberty of starving? An excess of labour and confinement prematurely weakens and destroys all the functions of the animal frame; and few constitutions can be preserved in health and vigour, under a regular occupation in our manufactures for more than ten hours per day, exclusive of the time requisite for meals. It may, however, perhaps appear to you that you have no particular interest in attending to the health and comforts of the working classes, provided you can get your work well and cheaply performed by them. Every master manufacturer is most anxious to have his work cheaply performed; and as he is perpetually exerting all his faculties to attain this object, he considers low wages to be essential to his success. By one master or other, every means are used to reduce wages to the lowest possible point, and if but one succeeds, the other must follow in their own defence. Yet when the subject is properly considered, no evil ought to be more dreaded by master manufacturers than low wages of labour, or a want of the means to procure reasonable comfort among the working classes. These, in consequence of their numbers, are the greatest consumers of all articles; and it will always be found that when wages are high, the country prospers; when they are low, all classes suffer, from the highest to the lowest, but more particularly the manufacturing interest; for food must be first purchased, and the remainder only of the labourers' wages can be expended in manufactures. It is therefore essentially the interest of the master manufacturer that the wages of the labourer should be high, and that he should be allowed the necessary time and instruction to enable him to expend them judiciously—which is not possible under the existence of our present practices; and this brings me to the main point of this letter. Is it, or is it not, the interest of the master manufacturers that their operatives should be employed longer than ten hours per day? The most substantial support to the trade, commerce, and manufactures of this and of every country, are the labouring classes of its population; and the real prosperity of any nation may be at all times accurately ascertained, by the amount of wages, or the extent of the comforts, which the productive classes can obtain, in return for their labour. It is evident that food must be procured by the working man and his family before he can purchase any other article. If therefore this class of our population is so degraded and oppressed, that they can only procure the bare necessities of life, they are lost as customers to the manufacturer; and it is to be recollected that at least two thirds of the population of all countries derive their immediate support from the wages of labour, and in this country, chiefly from trade and manufactures. The working classes may be injuriously degraded and oppressed in three ways: 1st, When they are neglected in infancy: 2d, Where they are overworked by their employer, and are thus rendered incompetent from ignorance to make a good use of high wages, when they can procure them: and, 3dly, When they are paid low wages for their labour. But when ignorance, overwork, and low wages are combined, not only is the labourer in a wretched situation, but all the higher classes are essentially injured, although none will suffer in consequence more severely than the master manufacturer, for the reason which has been before stated. Let your minds dwell a little longer on this subject, and you will soon discover that it is most obviously your interest that your operatives should be well taught in infancy, and during their future lives rendered healthy, and put in possession of the means of being good customers to you. But they cannot be well taught, healthy, or competent to spend moderate wages advantageously for themselves, for you, and for the country, if they enter into your employment at a premature age, and are afterwards compelled to exhaust their physical powers by unreasonable labour, without proper relaxation and leisure. By such short-sighted practices you cut up your prosperity by the root, and most effectually kill the goose from which you would otherwise daily receive the golden egg.

I can have no motive to deceive you. My whole pecuniary interest is embarked in the same cause with you. I am one of yourselves, and should suffer more than the majority of you by any measure that really injured the manufacturing system. I have taken much pains not to be misled on this subject; and my view of it has been, I think, unbiassed. I have no inclination towards any particular principle or practice but what an honest love of truth directs. Under these circumstances, allow me to assure you, my firm conviction is, that our present practices are destructive of every thing which deserves the name of comfort or happiness among our work people, and therefore inconsistent with common humanity towards them—that they are most ruinous to the best interests of our country, and ten times more powerful opponents to our success as manufacturers, than all the competition which it is possible for foreign nations to create against us.

We complain of the wretchedness of our work-people, and yet we work them, from infancy to old age, in such a manner, and under such circumstances, that, whatever wages they receive, the mass of them must be wretched.

We complain that all markets are overstocked with our manufactures,—and yet we compel our young children, and millions of adults, to labour almost day and night, to urge forward perpetually increasing mechanical powers, that those markets may be still more overstocked.

We complain that numbers of our strong, healthy, and active labourers, are unemployed,—and yet we prematurely employ children—infants almost—and greatly overwork a large part of our population; as if it were purposely to keep those out of employment who ought to work, and to whom employment would be of the greatest individual and national advantage.

We complain that the poor-rates are become an evil so alarming, that if they continue to go on unchecked, they threaten to shake the foundation of civil society; and yet we leave the mass of our population in ignorance, suffer their health and morals to be undermined in childhood—destroyed in manhood—and subject them to premature helpless old age; thereby taking the most effectual means to compel our working classes to resort to the poor laws, as their sole inheritance, and thus accelerate the most formidable evil, that ever yet, from within, assailed a civilized community.

We complain that foreign raw materials are extravagantly high, yielding the cultivator an enormous profit, and, that the articles we manufacture from them, by the over-wrought exertions of our men, women, and children, under every deprivation of natural comfort, and aided by unrivalled and almost perpetually moving mechanism, will not enable us to give a bare subsistence to these wretched beings,—and yet by our long hours of labour, we take every means in our power to increase the price of the foreign raw material, and to diminish the profit on the articles we manufacture. Such is the blind ignorance of our conduct, that I am compelled to ask, where is the boasted intellect of the British Isles? To those who can comprehend and steadily trace the rise, progress, and consequences of the manufacturing system, it is evident that it has given birth to circumstances, which train men to think it their proper business and duty, technically speaking, to take a FAIR ADVANTAGE of all their fellows, and to sacrifice their OWN happiness, and the well being of society, AT THE SHIRINE OF INDIVIDUAL GAIN: although by such practices the most favoured of them obtain only the shadow of their wishes, while, by their overstrained exertions, in a wrong direction, the substance of their desires is removed to a greater and a greater distance from their grasp.

Let us, my friends, now no longer proceed thus; let us stand still and examine the wisdom of those practices so dear to some of us—namely, the premature employment of children, and the exaction of excessive labour from a part of our adult population, while thousands are wholly unemployed, and miserable, and starving, for want of occupation. A very limited share of sagacity, properly directed, will shew us that, in our character of manufacturers only, it is clearly our interest to permit children to be properly educated, and to possess sound and vigorous constitutions; that our operatives, and all the working classes, should not be asked or permitted to labour more than twelve-hours per day, with two hours intermission, for rest, air, and meals; and that, in return for their labour, they should be allowed wages sufficient to enable them to purchase wholesome food, and some of the most useful articles of manufacture. View these changes in the most unfavourable light in which they can be placed for the manufacturing interest, and they will be found, each and all of them, to be beneficial to it. Should the non-employment of children, under twelve years of age, and the limitation of the hours of labour to twelve, inclusive of meals, occasion a small fractional addition to the prime costs of our manufactured articles, by the consequent diminution of the supply, yet as the latter now exceeds the demand, the prices of the articles will advance in a greater proportion, and the consumer, as he ought, will make up the difference. But any difference that may thus arise, must be small indeed, compared to the perpetual fluctuations which are made in the prices of all articles, by a few wealthy speculators buying up at once immense quantities of the raw materials, from which the various articles of commerce are made. In the cotton business, for instance, as being now the most extended, (but the principle applies equally to all,) the ameliorations proposed will not affect the prime cost of the thread more than the fraction of a penny per pound, and in the finished cloth or muslin, not more than a fraction of that fraction per yard—while such speculations will increase the prime cost of the raw material from 1d. to 12d. or 18d. per pound—and that to benefit a very few individuals, at the expense of the public. I find no fault with such speculations,—but it does not become those who are the most active in them, and the chief gainers by them, to contend against the removal of evils which affect the well being and vital interests of millions of the most helpless of the population, merely on the plea that a small fractional addition would thereby be made to the prime cost of an article—when for their own immediate gain they would add ten or twenty times the amount to its price.

In short, my friends, when you come to examine the subject fairly and honestly, you will certainly find that no valid reason exists for the longer continuance of the grievous and pernicious practices which now prevail in our trade; and that, instead of opposing them, it is especially our interest, one and all, to petition the Legislature to remove them without delay; and I trust that when you have dispassionately and without prejudice taken all these circumstances into your consideration, you will accordingly pour in petitions from every district in which manufactures are established.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 27.—The inquiries respecting the burning of the Odeon are prosecuted with great activity. We understand that several persons are already arrested.

A schocking accident has plunged the inhabitants of Villiers-le-Bel (Seine et Oise) into the deepest distress. On Wednesday the 25th, between four and five in the evening, some workmen were employed in lowering from the steeple a large cracked bell of 6,000 weight. About 60 persons had assembled in the belfry to witness the operation, and there were in the church about four hundred women, who had also been attracted there by curiosity. A cracking of the vault soon began to be heard, and in a moment the church was filled with enormous masses of stone, which fell from the height of 80 feet, with a horrible crash. The women rushed towards the door, and wishing to get out all at once, pressed against each other. On hearing their cries a great number of the inhabitants ran to the spot. On entering the church they found 25 mortally wounded: three died within a few minutes after. The next step to be taken was to assist the unfortunate persons who had remained, as it were by a miracle, in the belfry, some suspended by the ropes, others among the timbers. Zeal and courage triumphed over every obstacle, and they were all saved. It appears certain that this accident was occasioned by the fall of the bell, which broke the rope by which it was suspended, and fell on the key of the arch, instead of keeping the direction which had been given to it. The damage is estimated at 50,000 francs. The whole Commune is in mourning. Every one has to lament the fate of a friend or relative.

An 80-gun ship, called the Neptune, was launched at L'Orient on the 21st.

MARCH 31.—The Royal Court gave judgment yesterday in the case of the Sieur Scheffer. M. Merilhou endeavoured to give a favourable interpretation to those passages denounced as seditious. After a long deliberation, the Court declared the Sieur Scheffer guilty of a libel. He was condemned to one year's imprisonment, to a penalty of five hundred francs, at the expiration of his confinement to be placed under the surveillance of the Police for 5 years, and to give a bail of 2,000 francs for his future good conduct.

The negotiations continue actively for an alliance, offensive and defensive, of the European Powers against the Barbary Pirates. The combination of the naval forces of the different Powers will only take place in the event of the Porte being unable or unwilling to constrain the Regencies to adopt the principles of the rights of nations which the European States profess.

NETHERLANDS.

GHENT, MARCH 23.—The following are nearly the conditions on which the Powers consent to quit the French territory:—They withdraw their troops, but not their surveillance. All the smaller contingents go home, but the four great Powers keep each 15,000 men near the French frontier, who, in case of need, will advance upon Paris. The English will be in Belgium, and Brussels the Duke's head-quarters. Thus, at the least motion in France, 60,000 chosen men will unite at a certain point (Paris), and the Powers of the second order will have a reserve to support the operations of the great Powers. This army of observation will be paid for by France, which will be a disadvantage, as the money will be spent abroad; whereas what the French have hitherto paid, mostly returned into the hands of Government by the indirect taxes, CARRICKFERGUS, MARCH 21.—ABDUCTION.—Samuel Dick was indicted for forcibly carrying away Elizabeth Crockatt, with intent to defile; and also for an assault with intent to commit a rape; and for a rape on the said Elizabeth Crockatt.

Counsellor CORRY stated the case. The prisoner, Samuel Dick, stands indicted for the forcible abduction and subsequent defilement of Elizabeth Crockatt, the prosecutrix. She is a young woman of respectable family in Derry; and upon the death of her father she became possessed of about 2600*l.*: this property, her youth, being scarcely 17, and her personal attractions, had been the cause of two different atrocious outrages, for the purpose of obtaining possession of them. In August last, upon the Sabbath day, while returning from the meeting, she was forcibly carried off, and taken to Ballymena, where she was rescued by her brother and her uncle. On their return home, her mother, alarmed for her safety, sent her for some time to reside within a few miles of Stewartstown, with a Mr. Matthew Fairservice. On the night of the 3d of November, Mr. Fairservice's family were invited to spend the evening at Mr. Henry's, where the prosecutrix met Miss Jane Dick, sister to the prisoner, and who is related to the prosecutrix. The prosecutrix, with Mr. Robert Fairservice, his sister, and Miss Dick, then went from Mr. Henry's upon the car to a ball at a Mr. Park's, where she danced the greater part of the night. While at Mr. Park's, Miss Dick invited prosecutrix to Stewartstown, which she declined. When they had got on the car, Robert Fairservice drove rapidly towards Stewartstown, without paying any attention to the remonstrances of the prosecutrix; when in Stewartstown, they drove to the prisoner's house, where she saw the prisoner: after breakfast Miss Dick asked Miss Fairservice and the prosecutrix to go to Dungannon with her, as she wished to make some purchases. She was prevailed upon, and did go into Dungannon; remained shopping there until the evening; returned to Stewartstown, dined in the prisoner's house; and about nine or ten o'clock the prosecutrix was asked by Miss Dick to go out to the next door to assist her in purchasing some thread, and the distance being so trifling, she did not think even of putting on her bonnet. When out of the hall-door, she was forcibly seized by some person, and put into a chaise in which was the prisoner, who caught her by the arm; when in the carriage, she found her cloak and bonnet had been previously placed there, which was sufficient proof of the preconcerted plan. The prosecutrix, the prisoner, with Miss Dick, and the other person, were driven to Lurgan, a distance of 20 miles, before day-light in the morning, the prisoner Dick guarding the prosecutrix with a pistol! After some time she was again put into the chaise, and driven to the house of a person named Swayne, where, after having wept and fasted the whole day, she was prevailed upon to go to bed with Miss Dick. From the fatigue she had suffered the two preceding nights, joined to the anxiety of mind she had undergone, she fell asleep; and found, on awaking, that in place of Miss Dick being her bed-fellow, the prisoner at the bar was. The next morning the prisoner attempted to soothe the prosecutrix by promises of marriage, and went to Dr. Cupples, of Lisburn, to procure a license, leaving his sister and the other person to watch over her, till his return: in spite of them, she contrived to escape to the house of a Mr. English, where she was protected until delivered into the hands of her uncle.

Elizabeth Crockatt confirmed in every particular the statement of the Counsel.

Thomas Swayne was examined for the prisoner.—Elizabeth Crockatt did not tell witness that she had been carried away against her will. Went to Lisburn for a license; took Elizabeth Crockatt into the room, and asked her if she knew any reason why she and Sam Dick should not be married? She said she did not, and desired him to go for the license, and he went by her directions: when witness came home, she had run away.

The Learned Judge summed up, showing what degree of credit was due to the uncorroborated testimony of Swayne.—Guilty on all the three counts.

ASSIZES.

LEICESTER, MARCH 24.—PLATEL v. FRISBY.—This was an action to recover the value of a horse. The trial proceeded, in which nothing particular transpired, except what follows:—Mr. Davenport, a surgeon at Waltham, was thus cross-examined by Mr. CLARKE:—"Do you consider the oath which you have taken as binding upon you to speak the whole truth?"—"I do."

"Do you believe in the Holy Scriptures?"—"I believe in sin."—"I ask you, Sir, do you believe in the Holy Scriptures upon which you have just sworn to speak the truth?"—"I do not believe in every part of them."—"Do you believe in the divinity of Christ?"—"Witness to the Learned Judge:—"My Lord, am I obliged to answer that question?"

Mr. Baron GARROW said, that his belief or disbelief in these matters should not impeach his testimony. He might be equally disposed to tell the truth, whatever were his religious opinions.

The witness, on being again questioned, said he believed in a future state, and in rewards and punishments hereafter.

Mr. Baron GARROW repeated his opinion, that the testimony of the witness was unobjectionable; and in summing up again adverted to the testimony of Mr. Davenport, and observed, that a difference of religious opinion did not constitute a ground upon which to come to a conclusion that that gentleman was incapable of telling the truth. If, however, Mr. Davenport had the misfortune not to entertain the same opinion as they did, he would advise him in future to be more sparing of his declarations on that subject; as such opinions, delivered from a person whom it must be supposed had passed through a regular education, might have a very mischievous effect upon the minds of ignorant persons.

LANCASTER.—Part of Tuesday and the whole of Wednesday week were occupied in the Bank of England prosecutions; on the latter of which days, Redmond Ross, a miserable-looking boy, 19 years of age, was convicted of uttering Bank of England notes, knowing them to be forged. When the verdict of guilty was pronounced, Mr. TORRING said, he was desired to recommend the prisoner to the mercy of the Crown, as there was reason to suppose that he was an instrument in the hands of others.—His Lordship intimated that the same idea had occurred to him, and the recommendation would be attended to, but that the prisoner must expect to be sent out of the country.

ORFORD v. BUTLER COLES.—This was an action for compensation for a breach of promise of marriage.—The Jury awarded the Lady 7000*l.* damages.

DEVONSHIRE.—John Green was indicted for the wilful murder of Rebecca Smith, at Stoke-Damerel. The prisoner cohabited with deceased (who was a married woman) for eighteen months; but in consequence of a quarrel, returned to her husband.—Sarah Pope, of the Lion and Anchor public-house, Dock, said, on the 16th deceased came with prisoner, and went into the back parlour, prisoner desired a glass of beer to be warmed, as the woman's mouth was sore; there was no noise or scuffle whatever; in about five minutes deceased ran out of the room to her, bleeding at the neck; she could not speak but looked at witness, who attempted to place her in a seat, but she sunk to the ground.—Witness's husband deposed to the same effect; and also, that when deceased came to the tap-room door he ran into the parlour—no one was there but the prisoner, who was covered with blood, which he was wiping from his hands, coat, and neck: witness asked him what he had been doing? he said, "I attempted to cut my throat, and I have cut here."—W. Rawlings, constable, went into the tap-room, and after searching some time, found a table knife, with a broken point, under some shavings in the fire-place, it was covered with wet blood; went to the place where prisoner was confined, and saw that his waistcoat and handkerchief were bloody.—Ann Wilson said, the deceased and her husband lodged at her house; prisoner came some days before the murder, and spoke to the deceased; deceased said, "Jack Green, you mean nothing else but to murder me;" he answered, "I value not my own life, but will not hurt you." She said, "the last time you saw me, you said the next should be my last;" witness asked prisoner if he meant now to do it? he replied, "he was drunk when he threatened her."—Mr. Sparkes, surgeon, proved that deceased died of the wound inflicted by the prisoner.—Guilty.—The prisoner fainted when the sentence was passed on him.—On Monday, about twelve o'clock, the prisoner underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, on the drop, at the Devon County Gaol. He seemed truly penitent, and died almost without a struggle. His body was removed to the Hospital, for dissection.

Elizabeth Clarke was convicted for the wilful murder of her infant child three weeks old, by administering oil of vitriol to it. The evidence against her was perfectly clear, and that she had procured the poisonous drug for the purpose three weeks before the birth of the child. Judgment was however respited, in order to obtain the opinion of the twelve Judges on the following point:—The child was in the indictment called "George Lake— man Clarke." It appeared in evidence that the child had been baptized "George Lakeman;" and being illegitimate, the question is, whether it ought to bear any other name.

CORNWALL.—WADE v. BRAY.—This case had excited considerable interest. The defendant is a Clergyman, at Tintagel; the plaintiff is a daughter of the former Clergyman of that place. For several years a courtship was carried on between the parties, which at one time had suffered an interruption, but on the solicitation of the defendant it was renewed. This was in 1811: and the intimacy was continued until the death of the defendant's father, in 1814; when he became possessed of 10 or 12,000*l.* On this event the defendant discontinued his attentions to the plaintiff, and in 1816, he married another person. The plaintiff brought an action for damages: and the defendant allowed judgment to go by default. Application was made to have the damages, which were laid at 2,000*l.* assessed at the Assizes. For this purpose a Jury was impanelled.

Mr. Sergeant PELL, for the plaintiff, dwelt on the disappointment and injury she had sustained, and the strong claim she had to damages. When the defendant first addressed her, he had no other income than what he derived from his curacy;—when he became rich, he deserted her from base and interested motives. In the course of his address the Learned Sergeant read the following letter from the defendant to the plaintiff, on which he commented to the great amusement of the Court:—

"Tintagel, 20th Feb. 1811.

"MADAM.—You will doubtless be astonished at my presumption in addressing you by letter, but I flatter myself the offence may somewhat, though not altogether, be extenuated, by the recollection of that friendship which once subsisted between us. To the breach of that friendship are to be attributed those deviations from the path of rectitude into which I have unfortunately run. My mind is naturally attuned to virtue; but without a perpetual watch, how soon are the best resolutions liable to be overturned! I flatter myself, Madam, you will readily believe me when I say, that property is no motive with me for addressing you: for whatever woman it may be my lot to marry, be her property little or much, it should be settled on her before I went to Church. Of selfishness, I believe, you will readily acquit me. Imprudencies I have certainly fallen into; but like Tom Jones, in the Foundling, they have been the effect of openness of heart, rather than depravity of soul. I would scorn to add hypocrisy to guilt: but many who have preserved a fair outside, have made greater deviations than myself. A single state is contrary to the voice of God, and the dictates of nature. Man in Paradise, though surrounded by every other blessing, felt a vacuum in his soul, until the Almighty, in his goodness, conferred upon him our universal mother. I long to taste the sweets of a life of virtue, for 'her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.'—Now, Madam, should you imitate Heaven, and receive the repenting sinner to your clemency, in you he would find a help-mate that would not only make his journey pleasant through this 'Valley of the shadow of death;' but one who would also be the means of bringing him to partake of those joys which are reserved for the saints for ever and ever.—Now, Madam, should this not meet your approbation, let it be consigned to the flames, and believe the writer to be, your ever devoted servant,

"WILLIAM PITT BRAY.

"To Miss Sarah Wade."

Richard Penny said, that the plaintiff and defendant met at witness's house in 1814. The defendant told the witness, that he was under a matrimonial engagement to Miss Wade. In June following, the defendant told the witness that they were to be married on the 27th of that month. At this time the defendant was poor. In 1814 the defendant's father died, and he told the witness that he had got a handsome property. Soon after this the defendant said to the witness, that though he believed the little woman, meaning the plaintiff, loved him, he should not marry her, as she would not suit him, in his altered circumstances.—On his cross-examination, he said, that at this time the defendant was a widower, and had two children;—he is now married. The witness does not know, whatever he might have heard, that the defendant's wife was a servant of his father's; or that he had two illegitimate children by her.

Mr. GASELEE, for the defendant, lamented that the conduct of the plaintiff, who, he conceived acted under the influence of others, had rendered the present exposure necessary, by refusing to allow of the usual mode of assessing damages, before the Sheriff. The defendant had now no alternative; and must submit to the humiliation of publishing his errors, to preserve his wife and family from ruin. He should prove that the plaintiff knew of the connexion between the defendant and his present wife, when she formed the engagement with him; and that on learning his marriage, she said, she was glad of it; for she knew that she herself could never be happy with him, and, therefore, would not marry him. On the letter which had been read he would not comment, for he never saw a love letter that would bear a cool examination.—When men wrote on this subject, their heart was too warm, and their head too flurried, to allow of their studying language. If the defendant had broken his engagement with the plaintiff, it was not done through avarice; for he had married a servant of his father's, whom he had deprived of respectability;—he was sorry for his misconduct, and had endeavoured to repair it.

The Learned Gentleman was about to call his witnesses, when a compromise took place, and a verdict for 200*l.* damages was entered by consent.

KINGSTON, MARCH 31.—Lewis Lyon, a watch-maker by trade, was indicted for feloniously stealing, on the 1st of Sept. last, at Clapham, articles of plate, of the value of 50*l.* and upwards, in the dwelling-house of George Hibbert, Esq.—It appeared in evidence that the prosecutor, a wealthy merchant, residing on Clapham Common, had a party to dine with him on the 1st of Sept. The butler had displayed the plate in question upon the side-board and table. About twenty minutes before six o'clock, the butler missed the plate in question, having seen it at five o'clock; but no account could be had of the missing property. Next day the prisoner went to a pawnbroker's-shop, kept by a Mr. Price, in Whitechapel, and inquired of the shopman if he was willing to buy some plate, and what he would give an ounce. He did not then produce any plate; but the shopman told him that his master was not at home. In about an hour the prisoner paid another visit to the shop, and tendered a considerable quantity of plate, consisting of spoons and forks, some of which were broken, others bent, and others as if they had been exposed to the operation of fire. The shopman said his master was not yet come home. The prisoner went away, leaving the silver, and he afterwards called three or four times, and the last time, Mr. Price being at home, he asked the prisoner how he became possessed of it, but he could give no satisfactory account. Mr. Price suspecting that it was stolen, sent for a constable, and the prisoner was apprehended.—The prosecutor's butler swore to the identity of the plate, knowing it by Mr. Hibbert's crest.—The prisoner said, he was as innocent as a child unborn.—The Jury found the prisoner Guilty.—Death.

Joseph Charrington, charged with having stolen a gold watch, gold chain, and gold seal, from Ann Gardner, 57, Elliott-row, Prospect-place, Southwark, was next tried.—Ann Gardner had been a little acquainted with the prisoner's mother. The prisoner had on the 6th of January called on her with his mother's compliments. She asked him to come in and to take some refreshment, which he did. He saw the watch suspended above the mantelpiece, and admired the flatness of the dial plate, took it down, and did not restore it again to its place. Soon afterwards he went out as if to walk in the garden, but the moment he got out he ran off, carrying the watch with him.—John Smith proved that the prisoner had given the watch to one Cannon to be pawned.—The prisoner said, in his defence, that he had taken it for a lark, that is, in a frolic.—Guilty.

KINGSTON.—LORD VALLETORT v. ARTHUR RYLAND, Esq.—This was an indictment against the defendant for an assault committed in Vauxhall-gardens, upon Lord Viscount Valletort. The prosecutor was the eldest son of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe, and the defendant was the son of a respectable cornfactor in London.

Lord Valletort stated his case, which was proved by James Aspinall, Esq. who was at Vauxhall on the night in question. He said he did not see the first shove which the defendant gave the prosecutor, but he saw what he supposed to be the second, immediately after Lord Valletort had slackened his pace. It was extremely violent, and did not appear to be the effect of accident. He saw the prosecutor turn round and shove the defendant; upon which the latter put himself in a boxing attitude. He aimed blows right and left, but only one took effect upon the prosecutor's face. Witness was one of the persons who advised Lord Valletort to send for a constable. He thought the assault so unwarranted, that he advised the prosecutor not to have any thing at all to do with the defendant. The defendant was so strong, that witness thought the prosecutor would have had no chance with him.

The Jury found the defendant—Guilty.

William Byfield, bookkeeper to the Half Moon Inn, was tried for a rape upon Sarah Beach, a girl of 15, in his own house, Prince's-buildings, Southwark.—The prisoner declared his perfect innocence, but called no witnesses. Although the evidence was enforced by much timidity and apparent modesty on the part of the female, some doubt prevailed as to the consummation of the crime, and the Jury acquitted him. He was charged again with an assault, and his trial was put off till next assizes.

John Moor, drummer in the 14th regiment, aged 20, was found guilty of an atrocious assault on Caroline Ruddell, aged nine years, at Witley.—He was sentenced to two years imprisonment.

In the course of the preceding trial, George Chennel, a farmer at Godalming, aged 37, and Wm. Chalcraft, a labourer, aged 41, committed on suspicion of having murdered George Chennel, the father of the former, were brought up, but on account of the illness of a most material witness, the case was ordered to stand over till next assizes.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, April 2.

STOCK DEBENTURES.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE moved for various papers relative to the state of the coinage and currency, from the commencement of the present reign to the 5th of January last. A rumour, he said, had for some time prevailed of Ministers having in preparation some plan for issuing debentures on stock. If a plan such as that reported to be in contemplation were adopted, it would completely alter the state of the currency of the country. He might therefore find, that when the day now fixed for the motion of which he had given notice arrived, that the whole subject to which his notice applied had become a nonentity. He wished therefore to be informed by the Noble Lord, whether it was true that any plan of the nature of that to which he had alluded, was in contemplation?

The Earl of LIVERPOOL had as well as the Noble Earl opposite heard vague rumours of several projects respecting the currency being under consideration. All he could say on the subject was, that if his Majesty's Government should think it advisable to submit any financial plan to the consideration of Parliament, due notice would be given to their Lordships. There was no reason to suppose any measure would be proposed without proper time being afforded for its consideration.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE did not mean to call on the Noble Secretary of State to explain the nature of any project which might be in contemplation, but it surely was in his power to say whether or not it was his intention to propose any plan relative to the currency. He did not desire to know any plan which Ministers might have under consideration. All that he wished to know was, whether it was intended to propose any measure which would operate a change in the existing currency.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL repeated, that if it should be thought proper to submit any plan on the subject to which the Noble Lord had alluded, or on any branch of that subject, to the attention of Parliament, due notice of such intention would be given.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE regretted that he could get no answer from the Noble Secretary of State.

The motion for the papers was agreed to.—Adjourned.

Friday, April 3.

The Husbandry Horses' Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Earl GROSVENOR said, he had learned from some of his tenants in Grosvenor-square, that a coalition had been formed between certain Water Companies. He should have hoped that these Companies would have fulfilled the two great objects of their institution—namely, to supply the metropolis with water of a purer quality, and at a cheaper rate than formerly. He understood, however, that the charge was not more moderate, and that the supply was very bad. He had thought it right to mention this subject, as the state of the water supplied by these Companies was of great consequence to the health and safety of the metropolis.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE observed, that the supply of water was not only bad, but if a fire took place in a quarter of the metropolis appropriated to one Company, the water of another could not be applied to it. This disadvantage would not exist if there was a fair competition; for then the water of each Company would be sent to the same parts of the town.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if these Companies acted in a way to defeat the object the Legislature had in view at the time of their incorporation, that it was in the power of Parliament to correct such a proceeding.—Adjourned.

MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. W. SMITH presented two petitions from places in Lancashire, from manufacturers, praying in favour of Sir R. Peel's bill: one was signed by 400, and other by 4000 persons.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. J. SMITH presented a petition from 640 cotton-manufacturers in New Lanark, praying for regulations in the hours of labour. This petition, he observed, contained some particular points, which, though they might appear inconsistent, were founded in fact. He had seen these individuals at a time when their employers were absent, and he could say he never saw a more moral and religious set of people. They stated the great evil of children being kept at work 14 or 15 hours a day, with scarcely any interval; but added, that the system in practice with themselves was a humane one, as the working hours were only ten hours and a half a day; yet they manufactured more than those who were kept so long at work, owing to less fatigue, and a sense of the kindness they experienced.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

REFORM.

Mr. PROTHEROE said he had 286 Petitions to present from Bristol, in favour of Parliamentary Reform and Universal Suffrage. Though he did not agree with the opinions of the Petitioners, yet he owed it to them to say, that they did not appear to be actuated by improper motives. The first of the Petitions was read in part; and they were received.

Lord STANLEY presented two Petitions for Reform from places in Lancashire.—Ordered to lie on the table.

TRADE, &c.

Alderman WOOD gave notice, for the 10th inst. of a motion for leave to bring in a Bill concerning the Trade, Manufactures, and Fisheries of the United Kingdom.—Adjourned.

Friday, April 3.

Mr. BENNET brought in a Bill to repeal certain parts of Acts which gave pecuniary rewards to police officers, &c.

A Petition against the window-tax from Belfast was received. Mr. MAY put some questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, respecting his intentions as to this tax. He replied, he was sorry to oppose the wishes of a large portion of the population of Ireland, but he could not concur in the repeal, while so great a provision was required for Ireland, and there was such a deficiency in the revenue.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved the first reading of the Bill for promoting the building of new Churches.—Read a 1st time, and to be read a 2d time on Monday.

Mr. GRENFELL, in the absence of an Hon. Friend, postponed a motion respecting forgeries of Bank Notes to Tuesday se'nnight.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a Petition in favour of Sir R. Peel's Bill, from Glossop, signed by about 800, above 16 years of age; and Mr. WILBERFORCE presented two Petitions of a similar character from Renfrew and Blackburn.—Ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned till Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, APRIL 5.

THERE is little news this week from France. The attempt to assassinate the Duke of WELLINGTON still remains a mystery, though the assassin is stated to have been secured. His Grace, it is said, was to leave Paris for London last Friday, probably to confer with the Ministers respecting that perplexing business the French contributions. He will also no doubt take the opportunity of thanking the PRINCE REGENT for his late congratulatory letter, evidently made all out of his Royal Highness's own head, without even a reference to the Ready Writer. Yet the court papers do not, after their old fashion of panegyric, compare it with CICERO, PLINY, or even FREDERICK of Prussia, which is perhaps lucky for some of us.

The Coronation of BERNADOTTE is expected to take place on the 12th of May. He has submitted a prohibitory law to the States "against the sect of Friends or Quakers, confining their abode to particular towns only in the kingdom, unless they have a special permission from the KING." What his quarrel can be with this sect, who are generally speaking a very negative and harmless people, it is difficult to say. Have some of the disaffected to his succession become Quakers in order to avoid taking the oaths or fighting his battles?

And patches from India, as if they came on purpose to corroborate the observations in Mr. MILL's excellent work on that country and our Government there, bring accounts of a general rising of the Native Powers against the British. The Courier accounts it a good thing that even SCINDIA is detached. But it is not believed that even this piece of good fortune will turn out to be true. The Newspapers have been in the habit of talking in a very pithy and self-satisfied manner about India, and of relating their pieces of news as if all our doings there were quite right and proper; but it is easy to see, even through the medium of those statements, that if the Native Powers had had journals of their own, and we could have seen them, we should have heard very different accounts of the matter. The plain truth is, we have been playing the same game there for which we objected so violently and hypocritically to BONAPARTE in Europe; and we have been playing it with less excuse; for he was a conqueror educated in our own military institutions,—provoked, in addition to his love of power, by our inveterate hostility and our passion for doting old despotisms,—and more warranted in endeavouring to dictate his notions of improvement to Europe, because it was already at variance with its own prejudices, and he and its inhabitants were all of the same family. But, with the exception of one or two just interferences with custom and tyranny, we have been encroaching, and conquering, and usurping in India, whether we were wanted or not, or provoked or not, or whether we were or were not of any use whatsoever; nay, we have preserved some of the very despotisms against which we pretended to exclaim, with this aggravation of them,—that in addition to the exactions already made upon their subjects, we drain fresh exactions for ourselves, and turn the single despots into double ones. But we exclaim against French egotism, and then think that wherever we go, and whatever we do, we must do good. The people of the countries which we take under our protection do not, we may be assured, agree with us. They can see absurdities in our customs and opinions as well as their own; and when we add obvious and selfish injury to recommendations of improvement, what are they likely to feel? Observers, who have been in India, have long been aware of the dangerous situation of our unwieldy power there; and from what we have heard them say, setting aside even all books on the subject, we would not give tenpence for the continuance of our sovereignty there, if a few skilful leaders should rise up to head a willing soldiery and population.

"We copy the following," says the Courier, "from the Plymouth paper, with infinite regret.—Among the great and bad changes which the French Revolution has produced, perhaps one of the most afflicting is, that it has shaken the attachment to country, to the homes of our fathers, the graves of our ancestors, the Altars of our God:—

"We perceive with regret, that the tide of British emigration to America, (the last of all countries where we should like to see Englishmen settle), is beginning to flow in this port and many parts of the country around, to an extent which threatens the deprivation of some of our best artificers and workmen, and includes even persons, who, by their situation in life, might appear to have no cause whatever for quitting their country."

Now this is the way in which the present commonplace rulers of the world and their hirelings bandy about terms which they neither feel nor understand. The Courier being sentimental over "the graves of his ancestors!" If there was one particle in the general composition of his paper and opinions which warranted it, we would treat even his romance with reverence;—but such phrases from the CROKER-journalist, the advocate of the paper system, the panegyrist of all sorts of men as unlike their ancestors as tinsel is like gold, the humble servant of the men who speak with levity of BLAKE and with consideration of CHARLES the 2d who has his body dug up, are too revolting. Attachment to country, to the homes of fathers, graves of ancestors, and altars of God, mean just about as much of what they ought to mean in the mouths of such writers, as the phrase habits of industry in those of the avaricious blighters of childhood. "Attachment to country" is attachment to any thing lucrative in it let the rest be as it may;—attachment to the "homes of fathers" is attachment to a capital residence for the son;—"to the graves of ancestors" means a good large piece of ground about it;—and the altars their favourite BURKE has explained, when he talked of a flourishing set of men whose desk was their altar, the ledger their bible, and Mammon their God. It is nothing external or theoretical that can tear men up by the roots from their native land. It is nothing but sheer and desperate necessity, or indignant contempt of wrong; and some of the very graves to which the Courier advises us to be attached, are, on this very account, in other countries. If the Courier is weak enough to suppose what he advances, let him look at one single convincing proof to the contrary of an unpolitical nature. A catastrophe has just happened at Catania in Sicily, in consequence of an earthquake. The place has absolutely been famous in history for the number of earthquakes and consequent catastrophes it has suffered; one of them took place not many years back; the people are wretchedly governed by one of those Bourbon despots, whom we have taken care shall not be replaced by a better; and yet notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding they live and have long lived under the jaws of Ætna in poverty and slavery, they and their fathers have been so attached to the soil, that they have persisted in rebuilding their city over and over again, and most likely, with the tears gushing from their eyes, will set about restoring its present dilapidations.

We have ascertained that a report had reached Bombay at the date of the last dispatches, which stated that the troops of the Rajah of BERAR had made an attack upon the British subsidiary force, stationed at his capital, Nagpore. They had, however, been repulsed. If the Rajah of BERAR, influenced by the intrigues of the PEISHWA, has declared war against the British Government, slight apprehensions may be entertained of the effect of his hostility. Whoever will look at the map will see, that though his territories are extensive, he does not come in immediate contact with the PEISHWA; the NIZAM's dominions lying between them, and he remaining, as far as we have been able to ascertain, quiet. Not only SCINDIA but HOLKAR remained faithful to his engagements.—Their assistance would have been more efficacious to the PEISHWA than the BERAR RAJA'S—though HOLKAR, we believe, has within these few years been subject to such frequent fits of insanity, as to have reduced him to comparative insignificance.—Courier—Saturday.

The Duke of WELLINGTON is expected to be in London on Tuesday next, to be present at the nuptials of the Princess ELIZABETH.

The arrangements for the celebration of the nuptials of the Princess ELIZABETH, have been so formed as not to interfere in any respect with the sittings of Parliament. The ceremony will take place so early as eight o'clock on Tuesday morning next, at the Queen's Palace. Her Royal Highness was born May 22, 1770. The bride and bridegroom will leave the QUEEN'S house, soon after the ceremony, for the PRINCE REGENT'S cottage in Windsor Park. The QUEEN will go to Windsor in a few days after the marriage; but will return to hold a drawing-room on the 22d instant; at which the PRINCE and PRINCESS will be presented.—Morning Post.

Mr. BROUGHAM has been absolutely drawn in triumph into the principal places in Westmoreland. The crowds which followed him for miles, and hailed his progress, consisted of thousands. At Ambleside there was an illumination. He addressed the Freeholders at various places, in speeches which were received with raptures.—What a contrast must he have afforded to his dull opponents!

A document in our paper will show the enormous increase of crimes of late years.—The excess last year, over that of the year preceding, is most striking. In 1817, there were near 14,000 commitments; in 1816, only 9,091; and, during the seven years, the gradual increase of numbers is from 5 to 13,000!

By a Return made to the House of Commons, it appears, that the number of persons executed for Forgery, within the last 23 years, amounts to 222. Of these 76 were for forgeries on the Bank of England.

The Solicitors of the Bank have had to conduct, on the last Midland Circuit, no fewer than 82 prosecutions. Such is the distrust which is felt at receiving Bank of England paper at Leicester, that very few wish to receive it, and all prefer the notes of Local Banks.

A Corporation in the West of England (with which one of the principal Officers of the PRINCE REGENT is closely connected) are advertising for sale the next Presentation to their principal Church, in order to pay off a debt on their Theatre!—Evening Paper.

"The Judges are determined the law shall take its course, in all cases where servants, of any description, may be convicted of being concerned in robbing their masters."—Except, we presume, the servants of the public:—that is another affair. We well remember when it was proposed to render the embezzlement of public money by great defaulters a felony, the late Mr. PERCEVAL said, that a man of honour would scarcely be induced to take a place, with such an awkward contingency hanging over his head.—Chester Guardian.

OLD BAILEY.—This Court seems now to be chiefly occupied in trying forgers and utterers of forged Bank-notes, so easily are they at present fabricated. On Friday several were found guilty, and yesterday again, a desperate rogue was tried, one George Chapman, alias Claxton, who was indicted for forging and uttering a one-pound note, with intent to defraud the Bank. It appeared the prisoner uttered the note in question to a Mr. Wright, a pawnbroker in Mutton Hill, in payment for a pistol which he purchased. Several witnesses were called to prove the prisoner a notorious utterer. Foy, an officer, stated that he had taken him a second time into custody, he having escaped the first time from the hands of the Constable, and that while conveying him from Marlborough-street to the House of Correction in chains, the prisoner having previously filed off his irons, sprang on him and forced a cord round his neck, with which he attempted to strangle him; his cries, however, occasioning the vehicle to stop, and a person coming to his assistance, the prisoner was overpowered, but not without striving to grasp a knife which was concealed under his thigh.—The prisoner offered no defence.—Guilty.

WIDOW AND ORPHANS OF MR. WM. ELLIOTT.—The following Professional Ladies and Gentlemen have, with the most friendly benevolence, undertaken to arrange and perform a Concert at the Freemasons' Hall, on Monday, April 20, for the benefit of the Widow and seven Orphan Children of Mr. WM. ELLIOTT, whose long and painful illness has terminated in his death:—Miss Stephens, Mrs. Vaughan, and Mrs. Salmon;—Mr. Bartleman, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. W. Knyvett, Mr. B. Sale, Mr. Bellamy, &c. &c.—The Committee of Management consist of Messrs. Bartleman, Bellamy, Beale, Elliott, Evans, Greateorex, Gore, Hawes, Horslev, Knyvett, C. Knyvett, W. Knyvett, King, Leete, Nield,—Sir George Smart,—Messrs. Sale, sen. Sale, jun. Taylor, Terrail, Vaughan, Welsh, and Williams.—The Conductor is Mr. Greateorex.—As during the whole of Mr. ELLIOTT's professional career, the wants of a numerous family never prevailed over his habitual modesty so far as to induce him to solicit the patronage of his friends or the public in favour of a single Concert for his own separate advantage; and as upon benevolent occasions, none stepped forward more frequently, or with more cordial alacrity, for the benefit of others, it is presumed that hope may safely venture to build on the strong ground of his posthumous claims: they have been thus felt and appreciated by the brightest ornaments of the musical profession: and when to the claims of departed worth and suffering innocence, are added the attractions of art and of living excellence, who shall doubt the result? The British public has ever shewn itself ready to kindle the torch of pleasure at the flame of virtue,—to disguise, under a frank and friendly exterior, the refinements of its bounty,—to make "the Widow's heart sing for joy," whilst their own vibrates in unison, and listens with delight.

A Correspondent informs us, that such is the extent of pauperism, at Foxon, near Market Harborough, that to every parishioner who pays levies, there are two paupers, whose abject state is so deplorable that their services are regularly offered to the best bidder weekly!—We are assured that many of these poor fellows are now actually receiving only two-pence each of their employers for their daily labour; the remainder of their scanty pittance is made up from the poor's rate.—"Britons never will be slaves!"—Nottingham Review.

LETTER TO MR. CANNING.

Last week we briefly noticed the appearance of this animated Letter, and we now proceed to make a few extracts. It is evidently the production of no mean hand. The writer has warm blood flowing in his veins, and an English heart beating in his bosom. He feels deeply, therefore he expresses himself strongly: he is an honest hater of the mean, the insolent and the tyrannical,—therefore he boldly denounces the guilty, and manfully holds them up to the scorn and detestation of the people.—The author is not prodigal of words, for the whole letter is comprized in about 30 pages of open print; yet we rather suspect, that there is one individual at least who will think it much too long for his reputation and interests. But the reader shall judge for himself:—

"The revered and ruptured Ogden!!! And this mad, this monstrous sally was applauded—was received with roars of laughter! and if there was a confession from some more candid lips, that such allusions were not "quite in good taste," an excuse was drawn from the warmth of the debate: clear as it was, to those accustomed to your patchwork, that the stupid alliteration was one of the ill-tempered weapons coolly selected from your oratorical armoury.

"Certainly, Sir, you found the Legislative Assembly more tractable than your Sovereign, who has, more than once, repulsed your rude familiarity. His Majesty, were he now on the throne, would recognise the frontless upstart who placed the hand of his Sovereign upon the seat of the wound which had been inflicted upon him as the reward of his duplicity; and of him who had referred him to a brother Minister, with the indecent freedom of equal intimacy. When, Sir, you placed the King's hand upon your thigh, when you told him you would send to Pembroke, you gave rise to a resentment, such as would have affected your honest interests, while the throne of England was filled by a gentleman. But, I presume, the silent rebuke of offended Majesty was not sharp enough to be felt by the coarseness of your texture; for the insult offered to those who should be the Representatives of the people, and to the people themselves, is equally rude and familiar, and is ten times more overbearing, in every respect, than that which before offended your Sovereign."

* * * * *

"In the House of Commons alone you find yourself taken on your word, with no inquiries made; and when you display the whole deformity of a heart devoid of all just, and generous, and gentlemanly feeling; and when you show, by arts untried before, not only how despicable you are yourself, but how you despise all around you, you are not hissed to the ground (as you would infallibly have been had you ventured at such topics before a popular assembly); you are heard, you are encouraged, you are cheered; your inhuman taunts on the irons and infirmities of those who demand reparation for the injuries they have endured from a bloody police: your ridicule of the prisoner and the oppressed are received with shouts of laughter, with loud shouts of laughter!!!

"Go on, Sir, I pray you; proceed with your pleasantries; light up the dungeon with the flashes of your merriment; make us familiar, make us pleased with the anguish of the captive; teach us how to look upon torture and tyranny as agreeable trifles; let whips and manacles become the playthings of Parliament; let patriotism and principle be preserved only as vain names, the materials of a jest; and, as you have convulsed the bed of sickness with your unhallowed mirth, disturb, with appropriate mockery, the long foretold approaching Euthanasia of the expiring Constitution.

"But confine your efforts to that assembly where they have been so favourably, so thankfully received. You will find no other hearers. You are nothing but on that stage. The clerks, the candles, the heated atmosphere, the mummeries and decorations, the trained, packed, paper audience, confused, belated, and jaded into an appetite for the grossest stimulants; these are the preparations indispensable to your exhibition.

"Thank Heaven, however, the House of Commons is not the only tribunal; and it is possible, that, in spite of your extraordinary progress and probable success, there may still be, in this country, a body of men, now dispersed, but whom their common interests will one day collect and unite, for the defence of their rights, and the punishment of their oppressors.

"Believe me, Sir, not an echo of those shouts of laughter, which hailed your jests upon rebellious old age and traitorous disease, not an echo has been lost in the wide circumference of the British Islands. Those shouts still ring in our ears: they will never die away as long as the day of retribution is deferred; they will never die away until we are finally extirpated by your triumph, or you are annihilated by our indignation. Do not flatter yourself, that by securing the connivance of Parliament, you are safe from all national censure. Parliament does not represent the feelings any more than the interests of the British nation. It would be an insult upon the character of this great, this glorious people, to suppose that their representatives were sent to the House of Commons to encourage the playful ferocity of a hardened politician. The nobler portion of the nation are certainly not members of either House: the better educated, the more enlightened, and the more wealthy, at least the more independent, are to be found without the walls of Parliament. You are (and what dishonest man is not?) an enemy to Reform. But you shall be told, Sir, that the extreme necessity of Reform, and of choosing our representatives from some other classes of society, was never so decidedly shown as in the reception of your speech."

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 317.

COVENT-GARDEN.

WE took the opportunity of the first appearance of a new afterpiece here on Monday to see Miss O'NEILL in Juliet; for when she first came out, and for some time afterwards, we had not recovered from a long state of ill health, and were obliged for the requisite criticisms to a friend. Juliet is not a part in which we can admire this lady, of whom our general opinion is, that she is an intelligent and striking but not a great actress; more excellent in situations and obvious passages than in the nicer workings of the heart. She has too tragic an announcement in her voice and manner, let the character be what it may; and indeed is altogether so theatrically serious, and has so much of the manner, though the best manner, of a regular tragedy performer, that she is certainly not fitted for characters like Juliet. She is too loud and sombre throughout. Juliet is a young Italian, sparkling and "light of foot," with so lively a relish of joy, that the excess of her after wretchedness is made out of the contrast with it. There is undoubtedly something of violence in her composition; but it is rather the ardour of her spirits and nation and time of life, than any thing else:—her tragedy in the first instance arises out of a horror of what is tragic; and the catastrophe is pure love, and inability to survive, not outrageous, or even splenetic.

We think we never saw CHARLES KEMBLE to such advantage as in this night's Romeo. It was full of tenderness and power, graceful, intense, excellently well studied, and yet as naturally played.

Who it was, of all the meddlers with this exquisite play, from ORWAY to GARRICK, that thought proper to introduce into the catastrophe the addition made by LUIGI DA PORTA, by which Romeo survives the poison long enough to talk with Juliet when she wakes, we know not; but as we are certain it ought not to have been made, if for no other reason than reverence for SHAKSPEARE, so it strikes us as an addition which he himself would not have made, had he copied from DA PORTA instead of some other writer. The incident is certainly very striking and affecting; it is only too much so, and without any necessity:—there is enough anguish in all conscience without it;—Romeo's forgetting for some moments that he had taken the poison, and then feeling death, and a fresh and more shocking despair, coming upon him, overloads as it were the original happiness with two tragedies for one, and almost renders us too impatient for tragedy itself. It would have been natural, we think, to SHAKSPEARE's exquisite judgment as well as feelings to see this; and after the strings of a fond heart had been snapped, not to let it be set up again for this savage gratuitous blow.

After the play, there was one of the completest failures we ever witnessed. The new afterpiece,—the well known nursery story of Puss in Boots,—had all the advantages that scenery and performers could give it. The former, though not in the best taste in its domestic scenes, presented some beautiful landscapes, and was very expensive and gorgeous throughout. Among the latter were the names, (we can hardly say any thing else) of KNIGHT, LISTON, EMERY, TOKELY, and GRIMALDI, besides Mrs. DAVENPORT for the enamoured elderly lady, and NOBLE, Miss LUPINO, and the Miss DENNETTS, for dancers. The music too, by Mr. WARE, had some pleasing passages. All however would not do. There was one decent scene for the actors, in which EMERY and TOKELY, the two millers, having got unwittingly, and with great appetites for dinner, into the Ogre's palace, saw written in gilt letters over a door Here you shall eat, which on looking up again, to their great consternation, was changed into Here you shall be eaten. They read this inscription with a very natural "trembling of mind." But only fancy this the best and solitary joke in a piece said to be written by an author of comedies! The truth is, the whole thing was so exceedingly flat and unworthy, with all the childishness of the story brought forward, and only one scene in which the influence of the well-booted Grimalkin was exerted to advantage, that the audience seemed to resent the appearance of so many good actors to no purpose. LISTON, for instance, had no opportunities for his sort of humour, or for any humour at all; he merely walked about, uttering frigid common places in a cap and feather; and GRIMALDI, who was expected no doubt to be infinitely droll, had too much to say, and too little to do. He once took occasion to wash his face with his paw, and now and then threw in an eleemosynary mew; but that was all. The disapprobation was early and pointed, and finished with being very complete. Mr. LISTON, however, who attempted to give the piece out for repetition, appeared to the audience to go away under one of the usual pretended understandings, that the object was obtained; and after we had left the theatre, we find by the Papers that they kept their seats though the stage lights and chandelier were put out, and forced the Manager's appearance by a most formidable obstinacy. They began to make a sort of O. P. dance to the tune of his name, and proceeded so far as to commence a war with the theatrical goods and chattels, slamming the doors, belabouring the partitions, and breaking a hole in the drop-scene, with a bit of a seat out of the boxes. Mr. FAWCETT at length appeared, assuring them that he had left the house before the piece was over, and had come as soon as he knew their wishes. His address was interrupted several times by vehement demands that it should be withdrawn; and on finally ascertaining that it would be so, they departed in great triumph, about half-an-hour after midnight.

DRURY-LANE.

The above scene of failure we have now to contrast with one of as complete success. It is that of a new afterpiece, which was produced on Wednesday night under the title of The Sleeping Draught. It makes little or no pretensions to dialogue, but what it says is to the purpose, which is very laughably made up of intrigue, situation, and equivocal. Rinaldo, (Mr. BARNARD), the son of an old miserly fellow (Mr. GATTIE), is in love with Francesca (Miss IVERS), but the match is prevented partly by the family pride of a physician, her uncle (Mr. FLORES), though principally by the stinginess of his rich father. He therefore intrigues to get to her, and for this purpose sends his servant Popolino (Mr. HARLEY), to take a letter to the physician in the disguise of a Dutch servant of one of the old gentleman's friends; who, it is pretended, wants his attendance at Mantua. The doctor is beguiled; and Popolino contriving to secrete himself during his setting out, comes forward again from behind a screen, and thinking to take another glass of cordial which the old gentleman had given him, tosses off a sleeping draught. His disappointment at the taste is evinced by many wry mouths; but a greater horror speedily comes over him; he begins to look dolefully sick; and his master's mistress and his own, her servant Nonna (Mrs. HUGHES), just enter in time enough to recognize him in his disguise, and to receive, as he thinks, and to the latter's great consternation, his dying words. After bequeathing his clothes to some of his friends, which is an incident pleasantly copied from SHAKESPEARE, he appears to die; and the females, not knowing what to do with the body, put it into a great chest, and get two men to take it away for the purpose of burying it. They are frightened from their charge on the road, by the sudden exclamations and outcry of the old miser, who thinks it a treasure, and has it conveyed to his house, for the purpose of examining it at night, and appropriating its contents. At night-time, accordingly, he is counting and chuckling over his money, thinking how much he is going to add to it, when he is startled with the sound of a moan, which he attributes to his fancy. He is roused by another, which however he attributes to some owl who has got into his creaking tenement; and finally the chest, which was placed upright, falls flat down; but this, after recovering from his fright, he supposes to be owing to the negligence of the carriers in placing it. He then goes out to look after a deaf and dumb man, who had just been recommended to him by his servant (KNIGHT) as one who could not possibly blab in the village, and whom he wants to kill a pig for him. Popolino, who was by this time completely waked up, now issues forth out of the chest, wondering where he can be; and seeing a bed, gets into it (not the most probable incident, by the way, in the piece), and pulls the clothes over his shoulder. He has hardly settled himself, when the deaf and dumb pig-sticker, who it seems does not know the master of the house and has not yet encountered him, comes in with a great knife in his hand, and going up to the bed, makes a number of signs, which appear awfully horrible to poor Popolino, pointing to the door to invite him out, and the passing the knife significantly across his throat. He is too much frightened however to go; and the other leaving the room to do the work by himself, Popolino gets out of the bed in great horror, and enters the chest again. The lid is scarcely over him, when the miser comes back with his servant, and a fearful dialogue ensues alluding to the pig, but every word of which Popolino applies to himself, till at last unable to contain his terrors any longer at the expected catastrophe, he groans aloud, and issuing in a ghastly manner from the chest, is taken by the other two for an apparition. Down falls the miser on his knees and face, praying forgiveness for his sins; the servant, with his hands up for the same purpose, tumbles in trembling horror against his master's back; and the lover with the two females entering the next moment to look after the chest, the doctor pursuing at their heels, and Popolino standing and gesticulating like an unaccountable spectre in the midst, present altogether one of the most striking groups and best dramatic conclusions which we ever remember to have seen. What completes it too is, that advantage is taken of the miser's alarm, before he is acquainted with all the circumstances, to make him consent to the match on condition of saying nothing about his endeavour to secrete the chest. HARLEY's performance is very good throughout, especially in the sick scene and in his personation of the Dutchman with his splay-footed manner and voice. The Dutchman's dull obstinacy in insisting to have a written instead of a verbal answer for his supposed master at Mantua has, we understand, been since shorn of its repetitions,—which is not so well, as the idea is very characteristic. KNIGHT has little to do, but what he has to do he always does well, and renders as effective as it can be. The other most prominent performer is Mrs. HUGHES in the maid-servant,—an actress whom we scarcely remember to have seen before, but who is very keen and vivacious, with a good romping talent, and an emphasis now and then that reminds us of Mrs. JORDAN.

The only apparent reason why the scene of this piece is laid in Italy, is that the main idea of the plot is taken from Boccaccio. The tenth story of the Fourth Day in the Decameron is about a Sleeping Water, which the lover of a doctor's maid-servant swallows by mistake. He is also put into a chest, which is taken into the house of a couple of usurers, and falls flat as it does in the afterpiece. The other incident, about the pig-sticker, is taken, we believe, from a book upon apparitions; but we have heard or read of it at any rate elsewhere. The author however has worked both of them up extremely well. The piece was heard throughout with great laughter and clapping of hands, and will no doubt have a run.

We ought not to omit, that some allusions, in the course of the Beggar's Opera, to spies and betrayals, were received with great clapping of hands. One of the passages had three distinct rounds given it,—gallery, pit, and boxes all joining.

FINE ARTS.

PORTRAITS OF ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONAGES.

FOR half a century back the Art of Engraving has been cultivated in England with a success that assimilates its fame in many respects with that of Italy, Germany, Holland, and France. Our native Artists create and satisfy the cravings of the connoisseur. They not only gratify us with the polished result of industry, but of industry grafted on sentiment and taste;—not only the general design of the painted originals, but the heart, the soul, and the strength:—not only an intelligent, but a luminous translation. They are the sculptural LANGHORNES and DRYDENS of the pictorial PLUTARCHS and VIRGILS. Their productions are the most attractive grace of our well-stocked merchandise windows, and, if we except Paintings, of the interior also of our houses. They give refinement and increased profit to trade, as well as to literary study. They tend to improve the beauty of our manufactures. They materially assist the studies of the scientific and the Artist of every class. They are some of the numerous intellectualities, as well as manual productions, that shed a lustre and a delight on individuals and the people of a polished nation. They are, in fine, a noble result of the Artist's application, and part of that rich provision made by the glorious few, who are occupied in furnishing the repasts of mind to their fellow men.

Before we enter on the more immediate object of the present article, we shall take this opportunity of noticing a practice that has of late excited much dissatisfaction among all who love the art of Engraving, and are anxious that it should fully maintain the high rank it has reached in this country. We allude to a practice too often we fear adopted by some Artists, of employing inferior hands in the execution of their plates, and then putting their own names to the work, when perhaps they themselves have not bestowed upon it a day's labour. Not to dwell on the personal dishonesty of this system, we shall proceed to show, in the words of one who is every way competent to appreciate the evil, the infinite mischief that must result from this mode of engraving by proxy. "Engraving," observes our excellent friend, "is a pursuit which requires much study, and all the patient perseverance to which the mind can attain, and that too to an extent which almost wholly shuts up its votary from all the cheering associations of life, and even renders its greatest blessing, health, an object of secondary consideration. But it may be inquired, does not all this acquire riches? The answer is, no! Well then, it will be added, it must produce fame, the desire for which has been described as "the last infirmity of noble minds."—This is granted, for this is the Artist's main and great reward. But here then comes the fatal disclosure to those who advocate the practice of Art by substitute, for then the great stimulant is withdrawn. Who would ever entertain in earnest the idea of proxy Poets, Painters, or Soldiers? This thirst of fame, which every age and nation seems by one consent to hallow, having given existence to all the great works of human genius, will, in every pursuit where reputation has a place, become a chief ingredient towards attaining excellence;—so, in proportion as this stimulus is weakened, must be the relaxation of effort in the individual, till there may not be enough remain to effect any thing beyond the commonest purposes; and so would the Art of Engraving become retrograde, and at last decline into a thing upon a system, and level with the manufactory of Birmingham wares.—The evil complained of seems to have grown out of a partial necessity appearing to belong to this Art, for a portion of its labours, in the progress, to be effected by junior practitioners, the stubborn material of metal to work on rendering more of mechanical means essential to the process than other branches of Art. This practice however serves only to free the professor himself from as much of the labour as demands not his hand, while by it he comes more fresh with his powers to infuse his mind into the work. But this is widely different to the practice of those who only cast a glance now and then over the labours of others, and never perform any part of it themselves. Such a system as this must end, if generally pursued, in putting the Art down to the level of a manufactory, and the degraded practitioners into the hands of persons who happen to possess capital, as in affairs of manufacture; and thus would all excellence become withered and fade away."

In the course of our critical labours, we have had the pleasure of introducing to our readers various beautiful engraved works, and we have now to bring before them another of great merit, executed in the chalk style, by Messrs. AGAR, COOPER, SCRIVEN, MEYER, FRY, &c. It is published under the title of Portraits of illustrious Personages of Great Britain, with Biographical and Historical Memoirs of their Lives and Actions. The biographical circumstances are sufficiently detailed to mark the leading lines of character, and bring it at once prominently into view, connected with remarks that develop the motives of action, and are unaffectedly and neatly expressed. The narrative and remarks are advantageously blended; and if the writer has something of a courtly bias toward the STUARTS and their supporters, we cannot be much surprised, as the profession of Mr. LODGE, that of Lancaster Herald, almost naturally implies aristocratical propensity. The portions of the work already published contain no less than sixty beautiful Portraits, mostly engraved after copies carefully made by able Artists from the finest originals. The inspection of these Prints, in union with the biographical notices, would have convinced us, if we had not been convinced, of the truth of the following opinions of the author:—"Little need be said on the extended information and delight which we derive from the multiplication of Portraits by Engraving, or on the more important advantages resulting from the study of biography. It is, however, from the combination of portraits and biography that we reap the utmost degree of utility and pleasure that can be derived from them; as, in contemplating the portrait of an eminent person, we long to be instructed in his history; so, in reading of his actions, we are anxious to behold his countenance. So earnest is this desire, that the imagination is generally ready to coin a set of features, or to conceive a character, to supply the painful want of the one or other."

We wish our room would allow us more than a brief notice of some of the plates:—Sir Philip Sidney, engraved by Mr. SCRIVEN, with the suitable suavity of tone and gradation, in a figure that is young, handsome, and elegantly dressed in cambrie ruffs at the neck and wrists, and in satin sleeves and jacket, the effeminate though beautiful appearances of which have a masculine counterpoise in the piece of steel armour on the breast and shoulders, most lucidly sculptured, and in the opaque texture of the lower part of the dress. We have before praised, and we must ever praise, this able Artist, for his very accurate distinguishing of objects by that dotting, and mixed dotting and line, which best denote their essential quality. It is this, in union with what the Engraver before us gives us of alternate sharpness and softness, touchiness of outline, faithful drawing, a due proportion, separation, and melting of the masses of light and shade in all their degrees of strength, from the bright sparkle of precious stones and sunshine, to the profound shades of night, with a just apprehension of the peculiar execution of the Painter whose work he translates, that together constitute a fine Engraver, whether he practices the mixed dot and line, or, like Mr. SHARP, the line only. For it is the essentials of character and truth of form, and not mode or manner, that are alone valuable in the Engraver's art. Of a similar sweetness of style in the flesh, and of diversity in the accessories, is the Print of the Countess of Carlisle, by Mr. SCRIVEN, from VANDYKE. His graver has, with the same justness, a bolder style in his plates of Sir John More, after HOLBEIN, Lord Russell, after LELY, &c.—Mr. FRY wants variety and boldness of grain, but he is exquisitely delicate in his flesh and the white parts of his dresses.—Francis Russell, 4th Earl of Bedford, from an evidently beautiful drawing by Mr. SATCHWELL, after VANDYKE, is one of several estimable specimens.—There is a fascination in the style of Mr. AGAR. Few Engravers draw so well, and his granulation, and the properly varied play of his dotted line, his mellowness and united neatness and force, are all the product of genuine reflection and a rightly regulated fancy. Such is his Lord Coventry, from Mr. CRASE's able copy from C. JANSEN.—Mr. MEYER's Earl of Sussex and Catharine Par, from Mr. HAINES's beautiful Drawings, after Sir A. MORE and HOLBEIN, have a well applied mixture of boldness and minuteness, great purity and brightness of grain and effect.—Mr. COOPER shews a bright and firm style in his Duke of Northumberland, after HOLBEIN, &c.—Most of the other Engravers produce a mixture of professional merit and defect, that we have not room to point out; but as all the Prints are executed with care, and are from beautiful drawings, after celebrated old masters, in possession of our great Collectors, the whole set of Portraits have the recommendation of great beauty and more authenticity than even "the magnificent collection of BIRCH and HOUTBRACKEN," exquisite as are HOUTBRACKEN's Engravings, while the imitations of HOLBEIN's admirable heads have less variety, confined as they are to a single master and to one reign. We are therefore not surprised at the entirely filled subscription of this elegant literary and engraved work, which has the higher value from the plates being destroyed, on their ceasing to produce their brilliancy of effect without repair. We shall notice the forthcoming numbers.

CRIMINAL LAWS, &c.

London, March 17, 1818.

MR. EXAMINER,—I am truly surprised to find a doctrine rapidly spreading itself, which (without the least intention of doing so) is calculated to encourage and increase crimes of all kind, and, if not speedily checked, will, I am fearful, be the means of entrapping many an unwary victim to commit them, which, on the score of mercy, he fancies he may with impunity. The mania founded on false notions of humanity is big with danger, and if the authors of it were aware of its fatal consequences to society, I am persuaded they would no longer persist in their fallacious reasoning. When I reflect on the number of public executions which occur in this metropolis in one short year, I lament for the unfortunate individuals, and regret their necessity; but can any reasonable man prove to me that such spectacles are not morally requisite? The increase of crimes I regret; but, too true, a day seldom passes that does not bear witness of this fact. Murders, and these of a most bloody and wanton nature, are now quite common among us; highway robbery and forgery, together with petty thefts, particularly so. Will, then, any man be found to defend these offences, because the perpetrators of them have alike increased in numbers and depravity? And yet it seems a champion is to be found in a late Number of the Examiner, in the person of "An English Citizen," who, in a letter addressed to Sir Samuel Romilly, and other Members of Parliament, after exclaiming against the frequent "executions of public offenders," says, "Every reflecting mind asks, are these executions necessary?" and (according to his account) "the invariable conclusion of the argument is, that they are not only not necessary, but a disgrace to our criminal code;" and he produces four cogent arguments by way of finale, which proves most clearly that the cause arises "from great neglect of the comfort and instruction of the lower classes,"—from "inadequacy as a preventive punishment,"—from "encouraging crime and cruelty,"—and from "immense disproportion between the offences and the punishment." I should be glad to know from this INTELLIGENT writer, if the immense number of charitable institutions with which this metropolis abounds, is a proof of the "neglect of the comfort and instruction of the lower classes;" and whether the punishing of capital offences with death, which the ablest and most humane lawyers of the age have always recommended as the surest means of preventing them, can be considered as "inadequate, or calculated to increase crime and cruelty?" No; far different is the effect this appalling sight has on the minds of the spectators; they behold their fellow men on a scaffold, suffering an ignominious death, as the only atonement they can make to society and to the laws they have violated; they behold the fatal consequences of dissipation and idleness, the author and forerunner of the worst of crimes; their decorous deportment on these occasions does infinite credit to their feelings; they return quietly to their homes, impressed with the awful example they have witnessed, imploring the Divine assistance to protect them, and their families from falling a prey to those vices which sooner or later lead to destruction. The effect on the juvenile depredator is often such as to turn him from his evil ways, lest he fall a victim to a similar end; he firmly resolves to change his way of living, to avoid his former associates in guilt, to attend to the duties of religion, and become an honest member of society.

The forger, the housebreaker, and the highwayman, will no doubt duly appreciate the merits of this eloquent writer, and these professional gentlemen would do well to vote so able an advocate of their cause a service of plate, as a memento of their respect and regard. The immense disproportion between the offences and the punishment, so much complained of by him, I confess I cannot discover, unless it be that the harmless individual who, through inadvertency, substitutes the name of another, by which mistake he defrauds a poor individual perhaps, of all his little property, the accumulating of which has been the whole labour of his youth, in order to support him in old age. He farther says, we are "tenacious and indeed infinitely regardful of life;" thereby admitting, that the punishment of death for crimes of magnitude acts on the mind in the way the Legislature intended it should, with terror and dread so revolting to the soul of man, that the only matter of surprise is, that any are found mad enough to incur the risk of so great a penalty; but depraved as the minds of some are, if such punishments did not exist, there would be an end to all order and civilization. And yet we are told, because crimes and executions have increased, and the most wanton robberies and barbarous murders have been committed, that our Criminal Code is too severe in its punishments, and requires amendment and less severe penalties:—what is this but a direct encouragement to crime? Much has been said on the subject of forgery, particularly as relates to Bank Notes, and I am aware many excellent plans have been presented to the Bank for the better prevention of it. Why will they not adopt some effectual mode to protect the public against this species of fraud felt so grievously by all classes, and at the same time, by the means now in their hands, prevent the possibility of imitating their notes, for which so many annually suffer? And can we much wonder at it, when the temptation is so great, and the method so easy: but this must not weigh as a palliation; the penalty which awaits the offender is too well known, and certainly deservedly merited. If the Bank would call in all the one and two pound notes, even this we should find would put a considerable stop to it; and were tradesmen not so easily to be duped, they would neither take so many forged notes, or have so many bad debts on their books as they now have in the course of a year: culpable negligence on their part richly merits the losses it occasions, and at the same time is highly reprehensible, in as much as it opens a door to fraud. In your last Examiner, your Correspondent, "An English Citizen," again intrudes himself; and, if I may judge from his writing, appears perfectly satisfied with it;—he talks loudly of strong feelings being "excited in the country against the punishment of death for forgery,"—which I as strongly contend do not exist: he may with as much propriety insist there is a strong feeling excited against the execution of a murderer, because, forsooth, murder, which a few years since comparatively was a stranger in our criminal annals, is now so prevalent, that even the forfeiture of life does not appear to prevent it, and the calendar of crimes is for ever blackened by those miscreants bearing the form, but devoid of the nature, of man, who trample on all law, human and divine, and bathe their hands in blood with so much composure and so little remorse, closely bordering on a SUPERSTITIOUS ZEAL—that when we see such hypocritical wretches under the garb of religious sanctity attending places of public worship, and passing for and mixing with the pious and devout, we should suppose they had been performing an "act of grace," and fulfilling the dictates of a good conscience; but when we view them in their horrid shapes as murderers of the innocent and defenceless, we should expect to see them at once visited by the retributive vengeance of a justly incensed Creator, and crushed in the very sanctuary they had dared to pollute. I shall, in a future letter, touch more at length on the subject of his last communication, and shall conclude this by contending, that if capital punishment is necessary, it surely must be at that period when crimes assume so formidable and daring a shape, that even the arm of the law, with all its strength, is unable to protect the lives and property of individuals, unless administered with firmness and severity. It is a mistaken idea to suppose, because the execution of criminals for murder or forgery does not, as could be wished, entirely prevent these crimes, that a less severe punishment would; such a measure would convince us, and that speedily too, that if this strong barrier be once removed, we instantly let the wolf escape, the consequence of which is, the sheep are destroyed.—I am, Mr. Examiner, your's &c.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday morning the eight following prisoners were brought up to the bar and arraigned under an indictment, charging them with having committed various forgeries upon the Bank of England:—Sarah Wilson, James Butler, Richard Rutford, George Downes, Mary Shaw, William Downes, John Townsend, and Thomas Smith. They all pleaded guilty to the minor offence, and of course will be sentenced to 14 years' transportation; and Joseph Davy was capitally convicted for forging a draft for 124*l.* on Ed. Stephenson and others.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

MURDERS AT GREENWICH.

Since Hussey was suspected, the Magistrates have been indefatigable in their exertions to apprehend him. Thursday morning intelligence was brought of his being taken at Deddington, in Oxfordshire, and a little before seven o'clock in the evening Hussey arrived in custody, and after he was released from his handcuff, the officers proceeded to search him.

John Poulton, the man who apprehended the prisoner, stated, that he keeps a public-house in Deddington, and is the Constable. He read the Oxford Newspaper, in which he saw the prisoner advertised. Soon after 9 o'clock, he saw the prisoner pass his house, and his person answering the description given, he followed him. The witness asked a neighbour to accompany him; they followed the prisoner to a farm-yard, which he supposed was a thoroughfare, and finding it was not so, returned again; he was then convinced the prisoner was a stranger, and he went up to him, and said he must go with him, as he had strong suspicion he was the man advertised. The prisoner, after some hesitation, confessed his name was Charles Hussey. On his taking him to his house, he proceeded to search him, and found a watch and a pocket-book, with a ring in it, part of the property stolen from the late Mr. Bird's house.—The prisoner denied any knowledge of the murders or robbery, but admitted being in possession of the stolen property.

The Magistrate told the prisoner it would be necessary for him to account for being possessed of the things which had been stolen.

The Prisoner said, that between four and five o'clock on the Sunday afternoon after the murders, he saw a man get over a wall into Mr. Smith's grounds at Greenwich, and run; he followed him, and saw him put down a bundle against a large tree and leave it there, and then run again: curiosity led him to the spot, and he opened part of the bundle, and saw two watches and the handle of a silver soup-ladle. He left the bundle then as he found it. On the Saturday afternoon following he went to the spot again, and found the bundle against the tree exactly in the same state as when he left it. The bundle consisted of three watches, a silver soup-ladle, a silver wine-strainer, four sheets, six or eight shirts, six rings, a quantity of old silver coins, two 2*l.* Bank of England notes, three 1*l.* notes. The rings were wrapped up in rags. There was no wearing apparel in the bundle. His motive for absenting himself was, that he was ashamed to return back, after having such things in his possession, meaning Mr. Bird's stolen property, and not coming forward at the time to tell of it. He was asked, if he had any thing to say respecting the charges that were made against him; he replied, no, he had nothing to say upon the subject. He was told, witnesses would attend against him at the next examination, and it would be heard what they had to say against him; he replied, very well, Sir.

Mr. Poulton was bound over to give evidence at the prisoner's trial, at the Assizes for Kent.

The prisoner, during the whole of the examination, betrayed no particular emotion. After his examination he was ironed strongly, and conveyed to the House of Correction.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Wednesday a young man of genteel appearance, named Edward Benyon, was charged with plundering his employers, Messrs. Pearson and Pritchard, warehousemen, in King-street, Cheapside, of property to the amount of upwards of 300*l.*—Mr. Pritchard stated, that the prisoner had been for more than two years employed in the firm, and that the utmost confidence was reposed in him. He suddenly absented himself from the warehouse on Monday se'nnight. Suspicion being thus excited, the stock was examined, and it was thought that a large quantity of valuable stuffs was missing. Inquiry was made at several pawnbrokers' shops, and at some of them were found pieces of stuff which had been pledged by a man answering the description of the prisoner. The route of the latter was also ascertained, and the witness, accompanied by Hawkins, the Marshalman, succeeded in tracing him to Alton, in Hampshire, where he was taken into custody. Hawkins, on searching him, found a waggon-office receipt for three large boxes, which had been sent to Birmingham, and also some keys, which he acknowledged to belong to those boxes. The officer then proceeded to Birmingham, where he found the boxes, which were filled with stuffs. These were immediately identified by the witness as the property of the firm, and the prisoner was brought to London.—Several pawnbrokers, produced whole pieces of stuff, which the prisoner had pledged. The whole of these were identified by the prosecutors.—The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

UNION-HALL.

On Wednesday a female, elegantly dressed, whose face was covered with a veil, was observed by one of the Clerks of this Office, as she was leaving the place, with a law book, (Dukenson's Justice), which she had stolen from the Magistrate's desk; he immediately stopped her, and asked her what she was going to do with the book; she said "What book?" He replied, "that which you have under your pelisse." She persisted that she had not got any thing belonging to the Office. The Clerk brought her before the Sitting Magistrate (Thomas Evance, Esq.) and informed him of the transaction; she still persisted that she had not got the book under her clothes, and force was obliged to be resorted to to take it from her person.

She was placed at the bar, and charged with stealing the book, the property of his Majesty.

MAGISTRATE—"Pray who are you, Madam?"

Prisoner—"I don't choose to say who I am; this you may know, I am an injured woman, have lost my character, and wish to leave the country."

MAGISTRATE—"What was your object in taking the book?"

Prisoner—"I took it because I thought you would commit me to trial for stealing it, and then I should be sent out of the kingdom."

MAGISTRATE—"Why do you want to leave the country?"

Prisoner—"I don't chuse to say; commit me; if you like: I took the book."

MAGISTRATE—"I am afraid the prisoner is insane."

Prisoner—"I am not insane, nor have you any reason to think so; I am as clear in my intellects as you are; I stole the book, and had my reason for doing so. I know it is the King's property, and you always commit for robbing the King. If you do not send me to trial, I will come and rob you again to-morrow."

MAGISTRATE—"The prisoner is evidently insane; let her be discharged."

Prisoner—"I'll visit you again to-morrow."

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Monday morning, about 11 o'clock, a fire broke out at the house of Mr. Jones, blacking-manufacturer, Sonerset-place, Hackney-road, which in a few hours destroyed the whole interior of the premises: engines arrived in a short time from various parts of the metropolis, and saved the adjoining houses. The mother of Mr. Jones was burnt dreadfully in different parts of her body. Mr. Jones's daughter, a girl only 13 years of age, suffered very much; her neck and hands were in a dreadful condition. The surgeon gave very little hopes of their recovery. The fire originated in the following manner:—Mr. Jones had got some pitch melting in a furnace in the shop at the back part of his house, it boiled over; the flame was so great that it set fire to the cloaths of the two unfortunate persons who had casually come into the place a few minutes before.

Wednesday night, about 11 o'clock, the neighbourhood of the New Cut, Lambeth, was thrown into consternation by an alarm of "fire," being given, from a gentleman having discovered that the house of Mr. Christie, timber-merchant, near the Cobourg Theatre, was in flames. The inhabitants of the adjoining houses broke into the house, and found Mrs. Christie, an elderly lady, the mother of Mr. C. dreadfully burned. After conveying her to a place of safety, they succeeded, assisted by the firemen, in preventing the destructive element spreading beyond the floor where it began. Mrs. Christie languished until Thursday morning, when she expired in great agony. When the melancholy event took place, all the persons of the family, except the unfortunate lady, were from home. She had been very decrepid for some years, and it is supposed she fell asleep by the fire-side, when a spark fell either from the fire or candle, and set her apparel on fire.

Thursday morning, as Mr. Parker was crossing Haggerston-fields, his attention was attracted by the conduct of a female, genteelly dressed, whom he observed on the bank of Smeaton's Pond, kneeling at times, and again walking to and fro in quick motion, at times looking into the pond with earnestness; at last she took off her bonnet and pelisse, and rushed into the water, which, however, was not sufficiently deep to cover her; he could plainly perceive her lie down in the water whilst he was running to the bank to her assistance, but he came in time to save her life; he pulled her out, and conveyed her to an adjoining public-house; where on being questioned, she said she was the wife of a carpenter, at Mile-end, who of late had suffered many losses in trade, and she was afraid she should, with the whole of her family, be reduced to a workhouse. She wept bitterly, and betrayed a great distress of mind. She was conveyed home.

On Thursday an Inquest was held in the City-road, on the body of Edward Wagstaff, aged 18, a miniature-painter. It appeared from the evidence of Mr. George Weighton, who holds a situation in the Post Office, and Catherine Hargrave, his servant, that the deceased lodged in the house of the former. For want of other employment he exhibited birds in Peerless-place. On Tuesday evening he went out, saying he was going to see a friend; on his return he went to bed, and in the morning he was found dead. He was observed lately to be very low; the witnesses were of opinion that the deceased died through weakness or fatigue. The body not having been opened, the Jury doubted whether he came to his death in a natural way, and the Inquest was accordingly adjourned.

A child which was stolen a few days since in Parker's-street, Drury-lane, has not yet been heard of. The sister of the child, a girl of about ten years of age, was carrying it, when a well-dressed woman asked her to go a message for her to a house in that street, and offered to hold the child till she returned. When she returned the woman had disappeared.

Tuesday night, as Mr. Warren, of Tottenham-court-road, was passing near Fitzroy-square, he was attacked by four or five men, who knocked him down, and to prevent him making any noise, stuffed his mouth full, supposed to be with a silk handkerchief, while they robbed him of two pounds and his watch.

A gentleman, named Blackstone, was knocked down and robbed of his watch, in Parliament-street, on Thursday night.

Thursday night, about half-past-eight o'clock, as an elderly man, named Boulter, who resides in the Edgeware-road, was coming across Harper's-fields, he was stopped by two men, who both carried large sticks. They robbed him of three shillings, one half-crown, and three pence half-penny.

Thursday night, as Mr. Thomas Conolly, plasterer, in Berwick-street, was returning home from Chelsea, along the King's-road, a fellow, dressed like a sailor, tripped up his heels, and robbed him of eighteen-pence, all the money he had about him.

On Tuesday morning, when the Regulator post-coach arrived at the George-inn, in this town, a young man was found dead in the inside, in the arms of his grandmother! The circumstances of his death were precisely similar to those of the young woman who died in the Bang-up coach near Newcastle, a few weeks ago. The young man had taken his place in the coach at Dydley, and was on his way to Stoke, his native place. He had been indisposed upwards of a month, but was apparently much better when he set out. At Wolverhampton, however, he appeared very ill, and the coachman allowed the grandmother (who was outside) to remove into the coach, where she supported him in her arms. When the coach stopped at Stafford, the poor grandmother was not aware that he had expired. On the following day he was conveyed to Stoke in a hearse. His name was Thomas Boulton, and his age about 20.—Stafford paper.

John Girvan, chimney-sweeper, in Glasgow, has been fined 10*l*. for using one of his boys cruelly. On the 2d ult. Mr. Black, the superintendent of fire engines, and his men, having been called to a house on fire, in Argyll-court, had to make a hole in the wall to get at the vent, recently on fire, when they discovered in it a sweep boy who had been forced up by his master. A prosecution was immediately instituted by Mr. Black, and the master for some time defended; but at last pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the mercy of the Court.

BIRTH.

On Saturday the 4th instant, at the Manor House, Wandsworth, the Lady of Alderman Magnay, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

On Friday last, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, by the Very Reverend the Dean of Chester, Edmund Foster, youngest son of Richard Foster, Esq. of Clewer, Berks, to Maria, only daughter of Arthur Benson, Esq. of Hillingdon, Middlesex.

On the 17th ult. at Alverstone, Hants. Mr. Richard Cattley, merchant, of Hull, to Caroline, third daughter of the late Joseph Carter, Esq. of Bury.

March 24, at Great Marlow, Bucks. Mr. Edward Wyatt, jun. of Oxford-street, to Frances, eldest daughter of John Holroyd, Esq. of Northumberland-street.

On Monday, at St. George's, Bloomsbury, Peter Clement Cazalet, Esq. of St. Petersburg, to Olympia, only daughter of the late Peter Cazalet, Esq. of Bedford-square.

On the 25th ult. George Baster, Esq. of Wantage, to Lucy, only daughter of Thomas Dreweatt, Esq. of Winterborne, Berks.

On the 31st March, Gurney Barclay, Esq. of Tavistock-square, to Miss Freshfield, of Harleston, in Norfolk.

DEATHS.

On Sunday last, at his house in King's-road, Bedford-row, Mr. Timothy Flux, timber merchant.

On the 28th ult. Elizabeth, second daughter of the Rev. Wm. Aylington, Twywall, Northamptonshire.

On Saturday week, at his seat, Hollydale, near Bromley, Kent, Col. James Kirkpatrick, formerly in the East India Company's Service, aged 89.

On the 1st of April, in Dean-street, William Preston, Esq. in the 77th year of his age, a gentleman who may properly be designated a pioneer in literature, having conducted through the press of the house of Messrs. Strahan, some of the most celebrated works of the last century.

On Sunday se'nnight, the wife of William Wood, a periodical number seller, was delivered of a fine boy, and on Monday morning she produced a second son, who are both living, and likely to do well. The unfortunate mother, whose appearance indicated the birth of a third child, only survived the second birth a few hours, leaving her distressed husband with six children, five of whom, from their tender years, are incapable of earning any thing towards their support. This distressed family lives at the Bank, in this town, at a place called the Well Houses.—Leeds Mercury.

NAPOLEON.

Extract, published in the newspapers, of a letter from St. Helena:—

“St. Helena, Jan. 26.

“Bonaparte’s regimen almost confounds our calculations of the materials of which he is composed—so opposed does he appear to be to his former habits of life. He has not passed the threshold of his house these four months; the consequence is, his legs are swollen, his corpulency fast increases, he cannot help complaining of having a most painful palpitation at the heart, and his countenance is extremely pallid. His sullen, austere manner shuts out all descriptions of persons; he refused to see the Admiral (Plampin) a day or two since. General Montholon (whose wife has lately been delivered of a boy), we are told, lately hinted to his Imperial Master, that he had half a mind to go to Europe: when Bonaparte replied—“You have always hitherto proved yourself devoted to me; wait twelve months longer, and then you will return with honour, for I shall by that time be no longer a trouble to any one.” Certain it is, that his health is become in a very precarious state.”

Again we lift up our voice against the petty and vindictive treatment of this fallen conqueror. Must we still have the mortification, as Englishmen, to say that it is a solitary one? When the question was first agitated, his adversity found one or two excellent advocates in the Parliament;—useless indeed to the particular purpose, but not to the national character or to results connected with it. Are even these to keep silence before the monstrous ascendancy of common-place that now has its day? Will they let the natural disgust and contempt which they feel as far as themselves are concerned, stand their opponents instead of real argument and ridicule, and hinder the little remaining spirit of our ancestors from shewing itself in behalf of another? Does even Sir FRANCIS BURDETT tacitly give up the privileges of a consistent lover of freedom, and stoop to discover something awkward and unfashionable in attempting to relieve fallen greatness?

From the Ministers it is impossible to expect any thing like a generous movement on this subject,—at least out of any impulse of their own. We have given our reasons before. They have not minds enough to afford it. They have not brains enough even to discern the dignity of it. They confound impotence to alter, with firmness to maintain; and can be made sensible of their importance in no better way, than by feeling the very body of a superior under their feet.

But besides the better spirit above-mentioned, what is become of all those who admired BONAPARTE so much in his prosperity? What is become of all those, including some whom we are loth to name, that made their bow at the levee of the First Consul? What is become of those who did not even think it beneath them to pay their respects at the Court of MURAT and CAROLINE BONAPARTE?

What of those enormous multitudes, who shadowed the seas when NAPOLEON stood on the deck of the Bellerophon, like the king of the very world that had conquered him?

We blush for our countrymen. We blush for a change which has become more and more silent, in proportion to the adversity of its object. Is the journal, which without worshipping his enemies united in opposing his ambition, to be the only one that would defend him when overthrown? Have those who bowed at the levee of the First Consul, bowed at the Courts of no others that have broken their promises? Are the visitors of the Court of Naples to make amends to the insulted dignity of legitimacy, for discovering that JOACHIM made a better King than FERDINAND, and that CAROLINE BONAPARTE might have taught princeliness of manners to the greatest houses in Europe? Lastly, have we neither feeling nor imagination? Must a man whom thousands thought worth going to see, lose all his interest with them, because he is not standing before their eyes? Must we think as little of him when out of sight, as of any vacant-faced booby with a ribbon over his shoulder; or keep silence if we do think of him, because such boobies affect to know as little about him as they do of any thing else? Or is it sheer adversity alone that makes us give up the mention of him? Is it because he is trampled on, that we let him continue to be so? Is it because the dull rogues caricature him with involuntary likenesses of legitimate gluttons? Or is it because he can no longer influence the funds,—or because they say he has been obliged to break up his plate in order to meet his expenses?

The first of these forgetters,—the former worshippers,—we do confess, have all the reason on their side of which they are capable. They admired him not on account of his merit, but his success; and latterly it was his merit only that increased. Had he succeeded again, again they would have shouted. But what is even a silenced oracle? a fallen god? Only fit to be made a devil of, as the Heathen ones were. The low and the grovelling can only look up, in order to admire. What Fortune reduces to their own level they cannot help thinking poor indeed. Exquisite self-satirists! The mere abusers of him, the GIFFARDS and CROKERS, are, in this respect, just in the same condition, though from a different cause. They abused him, not on account of his success, but his merit; and his merit continuing, and what is worse, having been more than ever contrasted with the success of those who have his faults without his merit, they more than ever load him with their Billingsgate. Delicious self-betrayers! But gentlemen levee-bowers, cannot you muster up a little courage? a little, little bit of a distant hint of recognition?—“No answer,”—as the preacher said when he pretended his kat was a human being, and waited for a reply from it.

Gentlemen homage-payers to MURAT and his wife,—not a word from you either?—Oh, we forgot;—MURAT was shot in a vulgar market-place.

Gentlemen boaters off the coast,—you who went miles and miles, and crowded in shoals about NAPOLEON, like the Lilliputians about GULLIVER,—you who trod on mud and sea-weed, and came in contact with dirty piers and ropes with your yellow-gloved hands, and subjected your delicate persons and fair friends to the care of coarse-fisted boatmen, and encountered the sickening undulation of the sea-water, in order to get a smile or a bow from the great Leviathan,—have you not a single good speech for him? not a word? not a syllable? We mean, of course, such of you as can speak for him, somehow or other;—who can say something in the House,—or at court,—or write a paragraph in a paper.—Not a syllable. Well, you need not blush;—your fair-friends there blush for you. Ah, ladies, take care how you lose your beauty, or your dowries, or get scandalized, or want disinterested defence on any account;—you will not find it from creatures like these.

Then you, gentlemen scholars, readers and admirers of CÆSAR and XENOPHON,—admirers of THEMISTOCLES, to whom BONAPARTE, with the privilege of conscious talent and misfortune, compared himself;—you who instil the same tastes in the rising generation;—and all you, whether scholars or not, who admire the memories of eminent soldiers, ancient or modern;—and all you, whether soldiers or not, who cultivate in any way the military spirit, and who defend conquest and the motives to it in your own countrymen;—have none of you, who have opportunities of speaking on this occasion, the least will to do it! There is one of you in particular, who is thought to be rather a great animal than a great man. Here is an opportunity for him! Is he too silent? Is this what rivalry has come to in modern times?—Oh lord, Sir, the Courier assures us that BONAPARTE is not at all like THEMISTOCLES, and it was puerile and common-place as well as vain in him to make the allusion. Besides, ambition is a shocking thing after all,—that is to say, such ambition;—and in short, Sir, we cannot have our studies interrupted.—Indeed! But you, noble Sir, who are not at the mercy, one should suppose, of this want of sentiment,—this common-place mistake about common-place,—much less of this odious hypocrisy,—have you too nothing about you that tells you it would be a graceful and truly conquering action to recommend the most liberal and princely treatment of a fallen prince and brother-soldier?—“Anan!”

Well then, gentlemen money-getters, if liberality is not to be found in any of these quarters, perhaps it may have got over some how or other to—Oh lord, Sir; pray do not expect any thing from us. What have your political or poetical notions, or whatever else you call them, to do with consols? Tell us that. Don't come spoiling trade. We understand that your vagaries have found some advocates among us already, whom we always thought sad merry fellows, and wondered how they thrived as they did. You put us out in our calculations, and we'll be put out for no one. We've a great head-ache already, had a nightmare last night, been driving at work like the devil all the morning, and shall hardly have time to digest one's dinner this evening; so charity begins at home.—But, gentlemen, one single word with you. BONAPARTE is not so poor as you imagine. The fact is, that though his situation is rendered deplorable by his keepers, he has great funds of his own in Europe.—The deuce he has! Ah, we always thought him a great man,—a very great man,— a sly dog;—but what's the use of riches if one can't enjoy them?—Most true, gentlemen.

Such are the persons, we fear, whom BONAPARTE mistook for the British Public,—or rather, such are the answers, more or less tacit, which are given by those who have any voices in public matters to the pamphlet from St. Helena. We do not think so ill of that public as to imagine, that there are not even thousands who feel that his treatment is unworthy of them; nor can we imagine, but that these thousands will ultimately influence matters; it is in the nature of things that they should:—but at present he mistakes us as a public body. He pays us too great a compliment; and it must be an awful reflection for him, that the survivors of genuine English spirit among us are prevented from doing justice to a fallen enemy and to the great qualities he possesses, by the ascendancy of that common-place despotism which his lesser qualities suffered themselves to countenance and hold up again. His original provocation to go on fighting, we allow, was great; his ambition, considering his “legitimate” education, was natural; but he should not have imitated inferior men, and countenanced their imitation of him, in breaking his first promises; he should have exercised less generosity to sovereigns, and more to the people; he should have led a new age in every thing, as he did in some things; nor would we have made an observation to this effect, during his fallen fortunes, were it not to shew him why it is that the old race of Englishmen are too weak to assist him, and had he not qualities enough to afford to be shewn it. We cannot answer for his particular habits, or opinions, or associations; but if we were he, we would encounter insult no more than he does, but we would cultivate with our own hands a spot of ground by our door, and write our history, and wait to see whether the times which will surely arrive, would arrive while we lived. And yet we know not how far an indefinite hope could think it worth while to do so. There is a great difference between imprisonment for a limited time, however long, and a prison unlimited but by accidents; and his jailers know it. We are persuaded however, for our own parts, that under the new intellectual circumstances of society in general, the monstrous interregnum of common-place that now prevails cannot last long. We happened the other day in a bookseller's shop to take up an old number of the Quarterly Review, which we had never seen before, though some of our friends had. Amidst a great deal of striking malignity about Mr. BONAPARTE,—Mr. LOUIS and Mr. JEROME, and the old emigrant stories about washerwoman,—this publication seriously regrets that when BONAPARTE was first conquered, he was not put to death, as it always thought advisable. As if his enemies, the panegyrists and followers of the FREDERICKS and LOUIS the Fourteenth, had the least shadow of right to do so!—or as if such proceedings could possibly be of any use to legitimacy when its turn comes round again! But the thing was evidently written out of pure venom and littleness. That Quarterly Review, to use the words of one of its friends on a different occasion, is “the fiercest duck we ever saw.” Its recommendation of killing BONAPARTE reminded us of Partridge, when he was so anxious in the valour of his fear, that Tom Jones should proceed in as summary a manner with their captive on the road. “Partridge leaped up at this news, and ran back to the place, where Jones stood with his sword in his hand to guard the poor fellow; which Partridge no sooner saw, than he cried out "Kill the villain, Sir; run him through the body; kill him this instant."—The folly and timid cruelty of these people are uppermost at present; but there is an under and sullen laugh at them in society, which says that their reign will be short.

FRANCE.

PARIS, APRIL 5.—The ball given on Thursday by Lord Wellington was extremely brilliant. Their Royal Highnesses Monsieur, Madame, the Duke of Angoulême, the Duke and Duchess of Berry, their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Orleans, and the Dowager Duchess of Orleans, did not leave till two in the morning. The ball continued till five o'clock in the morning. Nineteen magnificent sideboards were covered in different apartments. M. Comté, whose slight of hand was put in requisition on the occasion, contributed highly to the gratification of the illustrious company by new tricks.

The Sieur Crevel, author of The Cries of the People, was yesterday sentenced to one year's imprisonment, a fine of 4000 francs, five years' surveillance and interdiction from civil rights, and to find security to the amount of 2000 francs.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, MARCH 26.—The Austrian Observer of today, in a long and interesting article, refutes the ridiculous conjectures circulated by a great number of the public journals of England and Germany, respecting the project attributed to the Allied Powers, of continuing the Army of Occupation assembled on the right bank of the Rhine, for the purpose of maintaining the tranquillity of France and of Europe. It also contradicts the reports contained in these papers, of the objects which are expected to be discussed in the ensuing Congress of the Sovereigns.

EAST INDIES.

Bombay couriers have reached town, bringing details of the first engagement, which took place towards the beginning of November, between the British troops and those of the Peishwa; the former under the command of Colonel Burr. It seems the Peishwa chose his opportunity when the greater part of the British force near Poonah had been detached for the suppression of the Pindarree power. Symptoms of Mahratta hostility becoming pretty manifest to our officer commanding, and the Peishwa, amongst other circumstances, having declared his resolution of retiring from his capital to the camp where he had assembled his troops, Colonel Burr took a position in advance of Keerkee, and, on the 5th of November, prepared to receive the enemy, who appeared in his front with an army which was estimated at 20,000 cavalry, and about 10,000 foot. Mr. Elphinstone, the British Resident, repaired to our head-quarters, taking with him his personal guard. The force under the orders of Colonel Burr was composed of one regiment of European Infantry, and four battalions of Seapoys, besides 64 men of the 65th regiment of the line, with a small detachment of artillery and pioneers. The British advanced, but, at the same moment, the enemy's artillery opened upon their centre, while the Mahratta cavalry charged their left wing, and forced two regiments, which had expended their ammunition, to retire. A demonstration by the British right very prohably saved the retiring body from a repetition of this attack, which, as the enemy had almost surrounded our left wing, might have proved in no small degree destructive. The Mahrattas likewise got into the rear of the British right, so that the whole corps was enveloped by the enemy; when our men faced about, and gave them some volleys, which threw them into confusion, and put an end to the engagement. This contest was at one period of it severe and critical; but superior training triumphed over disparity of numbers; and the result, though not a total overthrow of the enemy, was honourable to the Company's arms. On the morning of the 6th of November, a light battalion, with 1,000 auxiliary horse, effected their junction with Colonel Burr's little army. General Smith came up with his division on the 13th, and appears to have engaged almost immediately in a series of active operations. The battle which he fought with the Peishwa, on the 16th, is said to have terminated in the defeat and dispersion of the Mahratta force. But it ought to be recollected that, with an army so constituted, a flight is not always decisive of its overthrow, and dispersion is very different from ruin. Poonah, however, has been abandoned by the Peishwa, who is reported to have fallen back on the hill fort of Sattarah, a place of great strength, about 47 miles from the capital. It has been stated that General Smith was following up his advantages; though no details of the battle of the 16th, nor of any later movements, are to be found in the intelligence from Bombay. Much perplexity appears to have been occasioned by the Peishwa's conduct among the circles of political reasoners in India.

ASSIZES.

LANCASTER.—ORFORD v. COLE.—This was an action to recover damages for a breach of a promise of marriage.

Mr. TORRING addressed the Jury. Mr. Orford, the father of the plaintiff, was a surgeon of eminence; he died in 1810, leaving a widow and four children. The plaintiff was highly accomplished, had received a liberal education, and had much personal beauty; she was about 28 years of age. Immediately after the death of Mr. Orford the family removed to Liverpool. Soon after an intimacy took place between the families of the plaintiff and defendant, who were distantly related to each other. Mr. Cole had succeeded, by the death of his great uncle, to the possession of a very large fortune. Among his other possessions he had a mansion at Kirkland, and when he came of age he went to reside there. In Feb. 1817, Mrs. Butler, the mother of the defendant (who had adopted the name of Cole, in pursuance of the will of his grandfather) dispatched an invitation to Mrs. Orford, inviting her and her daughter to Kirkland-Hall. The invitation not being immediately accepted, Mrs. Orford received a second invitation, which was accepted, and early in March Mrs. Orford and her daughter paid a visit to the defendant. They were received by Mrs. Butler and her son with every demonstration of the most sincere friendship. This visit continued about a fortnight, and Mr. Cole was so much pleased with his fair visitor, that he took an opportunity of making her a tender of his hand. Miss Orford consulted her mother, and Mrs. Butler was also informed of the offer, and after considerable deliberation it was accepted. Soon after the return of Miss Orford to Liverpool, the defendant wrote a letter, which recognized the offer he had made, and contained his opinion upon the subject of a settlement, which he said, he ought not to be called upon to make, as the lady had no fortune, and that she ought to depend upon his affection and generosity. To this Miss Orford replied, referring the whole matter to his own honour. About the middle of April the defendant visited Liverpool, where he remained about ten days, and he was received by Miss Orford and her family as her future husband. Such progress was made in the suit, that wedding-dresses were ordered, and new liveries prepared. On the 1st of June, the defendant wrote a letter to Miss Orford, lamenting that he could not visit Liverpool so soon as he could have wished, but assuring her that he would see her as soon as possible. This was the last communication the plaintiff received from the defendant, who without writing a single line, or assigning any reason whatever for his conduct, closed, from that period all intercourse with the family of the plaintiff, and, on the 29th of August, he married a Miss Grimshaw, the daughter of a solicitor at Preston.—Mr. Topping observed that the defendant was a man of large fortune, not less than 8000*l.* per annum, and that he was, of course, very able to honour any check which the Jury might draw upon him, and he trusted that their draft would be a most liberal one.

The letters which passed, during this short courtship, were read. Those by the defendant evinced more proofs of a cool, calculating head than of warm and generous feeling, and were indeed very heartless productions.

Mr. SCARLETT, on the part of the defendant, admitted that he had acted wrong. He insisted however upon the disparity of years, the plaintiff being little more than 21 years of age; that the proposal had been a sudden impulse—that the engagement had been precipitately entered into—that the connection, on account of the disparity in years, did not promise much happiness, and would probably not have been a happy one—that there was no reason for supposing that the affections of the lady had been deeply engaged, or that the loss of so fickle and capricious a lover could give her any lasting uneasiness—and that, as she had suffered no injury in escaping a marriage with him, she had no claim to serious damages.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY observed, that the promise of marriage had been proved, and it was clear that the contract had received the sanction of their mutual parents. The injury consisted in this—that instead of being Mrs. Cole, the mistress of Kirkland-hall, the plaintiff was still Miss Orford. Whether she would have been happier as the defendant's wife was a question they could not well take into their consideration. But for his unjustifiable conduct, he would have been her husband and she his wife, with that splendid establishment the wife of a man of his fortune might be entitled to expect. He was a man, according to the testimony of his steward, enjoying between 4 and 5,000*l.* a year; the plaintiff would have been the wife of a man with that fortune, and with that establishment which would have belonged to her rank in society as his wife. These advantages she had lost. The defendant stood in a very unfavourable point of view. What had he done? He had drawn a lady to Kirkland-hall, that she might see the establishment she had a right to expect would shortly be her own. He had gone on amusing her for a period of two months, under the expectation that she was to be the mistress of his establishment; and then, without any reason, he had married another woman. He would, therefore, have no right to complain, whatever damages might be awarded against him. With reference to the amount of the damages, he would only observe, that the Jury ought to be liberal, rather than penurious.

The Jury retired, and, returning in about a quarter of an hour, pronounced their verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, Seven Thousand Pounds.—[This trial had been the subject of general conversation throughout Lancaster for months. Crowds were collected, and the doors were scarcely thrown open, than the Court, capable of containing 2,000 persons, was instantly filled. The ladies were conspicuous in all parts, having braved every danger to obtain admittance. The verdict, which bestowed so considerable an addition of fortune on the fair suitor, was hailed with universal satisfaction.—On the subsequent morning, Mr. SCARLETT moved for a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, on two grounds: 1st. That the letters containing the contract of marriage had not been duly stamped, as they ought to have been. And secondly, on the ground of excessive damages. He observed, that it was the first instance in any similar case in which damages to such an enormous amount had been given.—Mr. Justice BAYLEY was of opinion, that the objection as to the letter requiring a stamp, had not the least validity. Upon the question of excessive damages, he was not prepared to say, that if it had been put to the option of the lady to have received the defendant as her husband in preference to the 7,000*l.*, she would not have chosen to have accepted him rather than the damages to that or any other amount. He thanked God the Constitution had placed the jurisdiction upon that subject where it was. Upon the whole, he thought he ought not to disturb a verdict dispassionately given, in a case where, if he had been one of the Jury, he might himself have been inclined to have awarded even larger damages.—The rule for a new trial was accordingly refused.]

APRIL 1.—The business of the Crown End terminated last Friday morning, when the CHIEF BARON passed sentence upon the numerous prisoners who had been convicted during the Assizes. The following, among other unhappy men, received sentence of death:—William Oxenham, for forgery; William Stewart, Thomas Curry, Margaret Dowd, Robert Wardlaw, Redman Moss, Hannah Mayhall, and John Vaughan, for uttering forged Bank of England notes.—It was impossible to witness this spectacle without being almost petrified with horror; and the progress of the painful ceremony was occasionally interrupted by the frantic exclamations or piercing shrieks of some wife, mother, daughter, or sister, of the unhappy delinquents. Oxenham was so ill that he was brought into Court wrapped in a blanket, and was obliged to be supported by two attendants while sentence was passed upon him. George Steel, Edward Corran, James Walker, Eliza Berry, James Jelly, William Conolly, James Scholefield, Mary Steel, Edward Walton, William Taylor, and Edward Moores, convicted of having forged Bank of England notes in their possession, were sentenced to be transported for the term of 14 years.—The Judge gave no hopes to Stewart, Curry, Dowd, and Wardlaw, for uttering forged notes, who are all left for execution.

MONMOUTH.—Samuel Evans and Thomas Way were convicted of having forged notes in their possession, and sentenced to be transported for 14 years.

SOMERSET.—CRAMMER AND ANOTHER v. HELLINGS.—This was an action against the administrator of a lady, whom the plaintiffs, who were medical gentlemen, had attended and supplied with medicines during a long illness. A difficulty being raised by the defendant's Counsel as to the mode of proving the delivery of the medicines, Mr. Justice HOLROYD held, that if the plaintiffs, after going out to visit their patients, upon their return directed their apprentices to make up the medicines, and the apprentices, upon making them up and sending them out, entered a minute of them in the plaintiffs' books, and such was their course of practice, those entries might be received as evidence of the medicines being supplied.—Verdict for the plaintiff, 25*l.*

CRIM. CON.—THOMAS v. TYSER.—This cause occupied the Court six hours. The damages were laid at 5,000*l.* A verdict was given for 2,000*l.* The plaintiff is a clergyman; and the defendant a physician at Wellington.

CORNWALL.—During the Assizes, the Grand Jury found Bills of Indictment against Thomas Graham, John Kimber, William Brown, John Bennett, Thomas Orchard, and John Hallett, all members of the late Corporation of Fowey, for perjury.—An indictment was also found against Nicholas Donmithorne, John Treherwy, and John Filkins, for assaulting and obstructing John D. Sobey, a Sheriff's officer, in the execution of his office.

At the late Quarter Sessions for Cornwall, the most interesting case was that of Sancti Lysne, a considerable farmer, of Shevick, of which parish he is overseer, for a violent assault on Philippa Langman, wife of James Langman. The prosecutrix came from Dock, where she had been endeavouring to get work, to the defendant's house, in order to obtain relief, as herself and her child were reduced to a state of starvation. The defendant refused to give her relief; and on her persisting in demanding it, he gave her a violent blow on the head; and finding that her extreme necessity made her pertinacious, he next set his dog on her, notwithstanding she was six months advanced in pregnancy. Hunger and the distress of her child overcame the fear of the dog; when the defendant went and brought out a horsewhip, with which, in the most brutal manner, he gave her many severe blows on the head, breast, arms, and other parts of her body; and in consequence of such ill-treatment, she was obliged to remain under a surgeon's care for some weeks.—The Surgeon proved the severity of the treatment.—The Jury found the defendant guilty; and the Court sentenced him to pay a fine of 40*l.* and to be imprisoned until the fine was paid.

KINGSTON, APRIL 4.—David Owen, aged 50, a stout, mild, good-looking man, was tried for stabbing and cutting John Jones, his brother-in-law, in Southwark, on the 26th of September. It was distinctly proved, that the prisoner had gone to Mr. Jones's house between one and two o'clock, put his foot on the step at the door, and cut and seriously wounded Jones and several other persons with a clasp knife as they came to the door. He never spoke one word while he was acting so outrageously. He had previously said he would murder the whole family.—The Prisoner, in his defence, said he knew nothing of what he had done. Several respectable witnesses gave it as their decided opinion, that the prisoner had not been in his senses. He had a fever nine years before, and since then they thought him subject to melancholy and insanity. He laughed, sang, and danced the night he was committed to gaol. The loss of his wife, and of his property deranged his mind. It was proved that the prisoner had a law-suit with John Jones, who was his brother-in-law.—

The Jury, after some deliberation, found a verdict of—Guilty. After a pause, their Foreman recommended him to mercy, in consideration of the respectable testimony borne to his character. —The JUDGE immediately pronounced sentence of death, and assured the prisoner that he could not reasonably expect that the recommendation of the Jury would have any effect. —When the Judge was proceeding to pronounce sentence, two ladies, friends of the prisoner, screamed and fainted away. The prisoner preserved the same unchanged look of composure throughout the trial, and when sentence was pronounced.

George Mills Margeson was charged with having stabbed Jane Rushforth, on the 23d of September. The prisoner is a midshipman, aged 17.—Jane Rushforth, an interesting young lady, said she lived at Richmond in September. On the 23d, the prisoner came to her lodging. In course of conversation he asked her whether a murdered person went to heaven? She said it was a curious question, but she thought it more likely that the murdered person should go to heaven than the murderer. To divert his attention, she said she felt unwell; she had had a bad night's rest. He said he would ensure her a good night's rest. He afterwards supped with her. After supper he asked on which side her heart lay? She replied, putting her hand on her left side, "Here, you little fool." She looked at the watch, which hung over the mantle-piece, and observing it was ten minutes after nine, said, "Come George, my dear, are you not going?" He rose, and placing his left hand over her left shoulder, stabbed her with a dirk or dagger, and with a laugh said, "I have done it." She rose, and pulled the dagger from her side, then sat down, and fainted away.—Being cross-examined, she said she did not consider her marriage legal; she went through what she believed to be a marriage ceremony. It was with a Mr. Prevost, in Essex, seven years ago. She believed he might be a clergyman who acted on the occasion. (The witness showed great reluctance, and requested to have those questions waved;) she always went by the name of Prevost since. She signed her maiden name on this occasion, because she did not consider the marriage legal. Mr. Prevost, she understood, to be dead three years last February. He was abroad. They lived together as man and wife. She had passed as his widow since his death. She knew the prisoner's mother. She knew of no insanity in the family. She knew him for eight months previously. She was very little injured. She could hardly describe his laugh. It was wilder than his usual laugh. She and he have been on amicable terms since. He was fond of her society, and used to call frequently. Philip Lugar, a surgeon, observed the wound on the left side. It was a small punctured wound of a triangular shape. It did not appear to have proceeded beyond the integuments. It was about three-fourths of an inch deep. She was ill more from the shock than the wound. It healed in five days.—The Prisoner said, "My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury, it was not my intention to kill Mrs. Jane Prevost, I meant only to frighten her. I loved her so that I would lay down my life for her; it was not my intention to murder her; no, far from it."—He is a very lively intelligent looking youth. While the Counsel was opening the case for the prosecution, he laid his head on the bar, and wept aloud.—Mr. Baron Wood said it was material for their consideration, whether the prisoner really meant to frighten her. If it was not maliciously done, he was not guilty.—Not Guilty.—He was discharged instantly. He bowed respectfully and retired.—On the verdict being returned, the prosecutrix seemed in ecstasy, and exclaimed aloud, "Thank God." She wrote the following letters to the prisoner during his confinement:—

"Richmond, Surrey, Oct. 2.

"MY DEAR GEORGE,—I much regret that I am compelled to write to you, because I am afraid my answers do not give you pleasure. I little thought I ever should have to write to one I so dearly loved, in a prison. Believe me when I say I freely forgive you; but I am sorry to add, I cannot esteem you as I once did. I miss you greatly—every footstep I hear, I fancy is yours; and those thoughts considerably retard my recovery. But let me request you, as a friend, not to dwell on those scenes of pure delight and pleasure, which can now never return; but fortify your mind to bear those troubles which you have unfortunately brought upon us. If it depended on me, be assured you would soon be restored to liberty. I shall quit Richmond as soon as possible. Every scene seems changed, and I am truly, truly unhappy. Adieu, I can write no more. "JANE PREVOST."

(Dated early in last week.)

"MY DEAREST GEORGE,—I have sent you two pieces of cloth, lined with wadding, which you must sew round your irons, and then at night you will not feel the cold. I wish I could have the pleasure of putting them on. I have placed them ready, so mind you do them right, or I shall scold."

APRIL 10.—John Fawcett was this day tried for the murder of his son on the 13th of March.—The particulars of this case were detailed in our Police Reports at the time. Fawcett's wife had left him, and gone to live with one Bush, and so had his eldest son, the deceased. Fawcett, in a fit of rage, went to the house, and mistaking his son as he descended the stairs for Bush, discharged a pistol at him, which caused his death.—These circumstances were all given in evidence. Bush, when examined, was threatened by the Court before he would confess that he slept with Fawcett's wife.—The Prisoner, in his defence, stated that his wife, after living with him nearly 20 years and having had 16 children, had abandoned him for another, which had caused all his misfortunes. She had even deprived him of all his property, to his very clothes.—Agitated by long suffering, he went to the house of Bush, and hearing him, as he thought, coming down stairs, his pistol went off, when, to his inexpressible horror, he found he had shot his own child, against whom he felt no sort of enmity, as he solemnly declared before God. He threw himself on the justice and mercy of the Court.—Several persons gave the Prisoner a good character for humanity and tenderness to his family.—Mr. Baron GRAHAM spoke feelingly of the case of the prisoner; but remarked, that the question for the Jury to try was, whether he had not gone to the house of Bush with a deliberate intention to kill some one?—The Jury, after half an hour's consultation, brought in a verdict of Not Guilty; when the Prisoner (a tall, robust, and well-looking man, who appeared involved in grief during the trial), bowed and retired. The Court was much crowded.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 6.

ARREST FOR LIBEL.

Lord ERSKINE said, he had last Session moved for returns of the names of persons arrested and held to bail for libel, before trial; some had been made, but the whole had not yet been presented. It was his intention to follow up these returns by a motion for Bill, if no proposition on the subject should be brought forward by a Noble Earl (Earl Grey) who had already called the attention of their Lordships to the subject. He believed that it was now to be understood that arrest before trial for libel was the practice of some inferior Magistrates. The law, however, ought not to be allowed to remain in a state of uncertainty on this point. It was not his wish to encourage any licentiousness of the press, but it appeared to him necessary to remove all doubt on this question.—Adjourned to Wednesday.

Wednesday, April 8.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY moved, that the Directors, Secretaries, Architects, Surveyors, and Foremen of the Firemen, of the different Fire Companies, and various other persons, be summoned to attend the Committee on the Chimney-sweepers' Regulation Bill.—Ordered.

WATER COMPANIES.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY presented a Petition from the Grand Junction Water-works Company. It stated among other things, that the Company were surprised to find that what they had done had excited an alarm of their having entered into a combination with other Companies, which was not true. The Petitioners therefore prayed, that their Lordships would be pleased to appoint a Committee to inquire into their proceedings.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE was firmly convinced that the Companies had combined to divide the metropolis between them. While there were two rival companies, there was some security that the public would not be imposed on; but as the matter now stood, a monopoly was established; and he was sure that their Lordships must feel that it was impossible for them to consent to such a state of things, unless they meant to take into their consideration the supply of the metropolis with water; and to fix the fair price at which that first necessary of life ought to be sold to the inhabitants.

The Petition was laid on the table.—Adjourned.

Thursday, April 9.

PRINCESS ELIZABETH'S MARRIAGE.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL rose to propose an Address of Congratulation to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent on the subj of the Marriage of his Royal Sister, the Princess Elizabeth. He also intended to move congratulations on the same event to her Majesty the Queen, and to the Princess herself.—With reference to the event itself, he should only say, that it certainly must be a proper subject of congratulation, that this union had taken place with a Prince of a most illustrious family, high military reputation, and who had displayed great talents in the course of the long wars in which he had been engaged.—The Noble Earl concluded by moving an Address to the Prince Regent, which he followed with motions for Messages of Congratulation to the Queen and the Princess Elizabeth.

The motions being agreed to nem. con., the Address and Messages were ordered to be presented in the usual form.—Adjourned.

Friday, April 10.

On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, an Address was voted for Copies of the Reports of the Commissioners appointed in 1814, to inquire into the fees paid to Officers of the several Courts of Justice in the United Kingdom.—The Noble Marquis called for such Reports on the ground that shameful extortions continued to prevail in various Courts, particularly in Ireland.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 6.

Petitions were received from all parts of the country against the additional duties on Leather.

Alderman WOOD presented several Petitions from watermen on the Thames, who felt that their interests would be affected by the proposed bridge at Rotherhithe. They wished in that event for compensation: but as their sole employment consisted in plying on the river, they prayed against the Bill passing.

Mr. WROTTESEY took the opportunity of suggesting the propriety of bringing in a Bill to increase the fares of the Thames watermen. Every one who took a boat must know how unequal the hire was to the labour.

COTTON-MANUFACTORIES.

Petitions were received against the Labour Regulation Bill, from Holywell, Manchester, Glasgow, Derby, &c.—Mr. PEEL presented a Petition in favour of the pending Bill. It was signed by 1,781 respectable persons in Manchester and its vicinity, who feelingly deplored the excess to which labour was carried, under circumstances unfavourable to the health of the manufacturer, which often proved fatal to youthful and delicate frames. Among the signatures there were those of seven Magistrates, nine Physicians, 21 Surgeons, and 20 Clergymen, of whom 17 were of the Established Church. Some of the medical gentlemen had attended the infirmary for a long time.

Mr. PHILIPS would not enter into any discussion then, as future opportunities would occur: he was only surprised, under all the circumstances, that more signatures had not been procured.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, the knowledge of the bare facts that children were kept at work in an unwholesome atmosphere from four or five in the morning till perhaps nine or ten at night, rendered it sufficiently obvious that the practice was destructive in every way to their morals and their health. He hoped the House would not allow this question to be put off.

REFORM.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT presented a number of Petitions for Parliamentary Reform, from Marylebone, Lambeth, Paddington, Halifax, Botley, and other places; above 30 in all.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COPY-RIGHT.

Mr. J. SMITH presented a Petition from Messrs. Longman, Rees, Hurst, Orme, and Browne, respecting a Bill now before the House regarding Copy-rights; and stating that the delivery of the eleven copies, from the time the Act passed in 1814, had actually cost to them 3000*l.*, or nearly so; that from the great burden of the delivery, they have declined the publication of some expensive works, and especially Baron Humbolt's Non-descript Plants of South America; that they are already obliged to leave another copy at the printer's, by the Sedition Act; that although the Rev. Mr. Todd presented from himself one copy of his edition of Johnson's Dictionary to Sion College, they demanded another copy under the Act; that the English Universities pay no duty on paper, and can therefore undersell book-sellers; and are now so printing an edition of Scapula Lexicon, published by the London booksellers. They prayed the House to consider the subject of Copy-rights.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

A Petition to a similar effect was presented from Lackington and Co.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LEATHER DUTY REPEAL.

On the order of the day for the second reading of the Leather Duty Repeal Bill,

Mr. C. GRANT opposed it, contending that the Leather Trade was reviving, and that a further reduction in the public income was quite inexpedient.

Mr. HART DAVIS, though he had formerly voted for the repeal of this Tax, had recently altered his opinion. He had received a letter from an eminent tanner, which stated that the trade was certainly reviving.

Mr. P. METCAL then said that if all England should be searched, there would not be found another tanner thinking like that one whose opinion they had heard that evening.

Mr. MANNING said, that his opinion was guided by a far better criterion than any letter from a single person—there had been Petitions by hundreds laid before them, and every one unanimous in favour of the repeal of the tax.

Mr. LUSHINGTON was enabled to state confidently, that there never was a complaint made against a tax with less real grounds. For a century back the Leather Trade had had no additional burdens, when almost all other trades had been loaded with them; and the trade was now in a very prosperous condition. The drawbacks that had been granted had given so much satisfaction, especially to curriers and shoemakers, that they had declared it to be their desire that the Leather Laws should undergo no alteration, and that the pretences under which a repeal of the additional duty was sought to be obtained were scandalously false.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, the Hon. Secretary had said, if the additional Leather Tax should be discontinued, another should be imposed. That he denied; they might proportion their expenditure to their reduced revenue. Every tax on the necessities of life tended to increase the price of all labour. The tax under consideration was as bad as a poll-tax; it was to all intents and purposes a poll-tax. It pressed more heavily on the peasantry than those above them. The former paid twice as much as the latter, whose shoes were made lighter and finer; for the leather did not pay according to quality, but weight, coarse leather producing as much duty as any other.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. HUSKISSON contended that the tax was pledged to the public credit for the interest of a loan, or the faith of Parliament. The whole amount of the taxes carried to the Consolidated Fund at that moment were not equal in amount to the public necessity. They were bound to make some other provision as an equivalent in point of revenue to the additional-leather duty, if it should be discontinued. It was very clear, that this tax, from its nature, must ultimately fall on the consumers.

On a division, the Bill was thrown out, there being 130 for, and 136 against it—so the additional duties on Leather are to be continued.

FEES ON PARDONS.

Mr. FREDERICK DOUGLASS said, the fees paid on every pardon under the great seal amounted to 110*l.*, and without this a full legal pardon could not be obtained. If, as must be presumed, pardons were always granted on just grounds, he could not but consider it as a severe hardship in an individual to be excluded from a full enjoyment of the favour of the Crown by his inability to discharge these fees. The Hon. Gentleman moved for leave to bring in a Bill for diminishing the expense of pardons granted by the Crown.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated that pardons were granted in precisely the same manner as all other letters-patent which passed the great seal. Nearly one half of the expense was occasioned by the stamps. The charge made at the office of the Secretary of State was for the warrant which gave authority for applying the great seal to the instrument of pardon. The clerks employed in preparing it, were paid out of the fees for their trouble; and a portion was paid to the Law Officers, whose business it was to see that the pardon was properly drawn out. Where the object of a pardon was the furtherance of the ends of justice, by the admission of convicted felons to give evidence, it frequently happened that the Crown paid all the expenses. But where the favour of the Crown was extended for the purpose of restoring an individual to his civil rights, it was not easy to see why it should be done free of all expense to the party receiving the benefit. No case had been alleged of any pardon being made a subject of traffic by the officers of the Crown.

Leave was then given to bring in the Bill.—Adjourned till Wednesday.

Wednesday, April 8.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM, &c.

LORD STANLEY rose to present a Petition, which, he said, was signed by one individual, on behalf of a meeting held in Royton, Lancaster. He had thought it his duty to read this Petition, and, having done so, he entertained very considerable doubt whether he ought to present it: at the same time he had always felt that the right of presenting Petitions ought to be as open as possible.

The Petition was read. It represented, that self-preservation was the first law of nature: that the persons who had attended the meeting were weavers, whose wages did not exceed 7s. a week; they were, therefore, unable to procure the common necessities of life, and were, in fact, naked, and in want of provisions, while they were bringing children into the world who could never obtain the means of support. God had not made man to labour and starve. General beggary produces misery and slavery. The Petitioners knew that labour was the foundation of all rent and taxes; and the true end of Government was to provide for the happiness of the people. The House had, however, imposed taxes which affected the poor more than the rich. They had enacted the Corn Laws for the benefit of the great. As to the professed alteration of the Poor Laws, it evinced no disposition to ameliorate the condition of the lower ranks. The Petitioners had seen with great indignation, that the Government had imprisoned some of the best men in the country. (A laugh on the Ministerial benches.) They had imprisoned persons on charges of treason, but no treason was found against them. They might as well have arrested a man for murder, where no murder had been committed. In short, the Petitioners ascribed the present system of legislation to the selfish principles which had governed the honourable House for a considerable time past. They, therefore, prayed for the repeal of the Corn Laws, for a reform of the House, and for the adoption of liberal ideas of government.

LORD STANLEY moved, that the Petition do lie on the table.

MR. C. WYNN observed, that when the House looked at the distinct charge which the Petitioner had made against them, they could come to no other conclusion than that the Petition was presented for the purpose of insulting them.

MR. LAMBTON could see nothing in the words of the Petition derogatory to the dignity of the House. If the Hon. Member meant to propose that the Petition should be rejected on the ground of improper language, he should feel it his duty to divide the House.—(Hear, hear!)

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER remarked, that the Petitioners said, the House had long been governed by selfish principles. This was language which they ought not to hear.

MR. TIERNEY said, if the House were to reject such Petitions as this, they might as well say at once, that men should never Petition for Parliamentary Reform. There was nothing derogatory to their dignity in the language of this Petition. The word "selfish" was the only unhappy word on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been able to place his hand. The Right Hon. Gentleman had said, that any member who should use that word in debate, would be called to order. Now he (Mr. Tierney) would use that word on the very first opportunity (a laugh), and he was sure that the Right Hon. Gentleman would not call him to order.—(Hear, hear!)—If the Petitioners had charged the House with having legislated from corrupt motives, it would be very different.

The House divided.—For receiving the Petition, 14—Against it, 42—Majority, 28.

The New Churches-Bill went through a Committee, the report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Monday se'nnight.

The American Trade Bill was read a third time, and passed.

FORGED NOTES.

GENERAL THORNTON was sorry to observe, that the forgeries on the Bank of England appeared to increase rather than diminish. It was highly desirable to invent some means of preventing notes from being easily forged. In 1797, Mr. Tilloch had presented a plan which was declared by the best engravers, to be incapable of imitation. The expense of such an invention would, he was sure, be more than compensated by the immense reduction it would make in the Bank prosecutions. The Hon. General then moved, "that there be laid before the House an account of the total nominal value of notes presented and refused at the Bank, as forged, for the last six years."—It being however suggested that an Hon. Member had given notice of a motion which embraced that of the Hon. General, he withdrew his motion.—Adjourned.

Thursday, April 9.

Petitions were presented, and received, against the Salt Duties, and the Law of Copy-right, and in favour of Reform.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH.

LORD CASTLEREAGH moved Addresses to the Regent, the Queen, and to the Princess of Homberg, on the happy nuptials of her Royal Highness the Princess Elizabeth and his Serene Highness Frederick Joseph Louis Charles Augustus, hereditary Prince of Hesse-Homberg,—expressing the heartfelt satisfaction of the House.—Agreed to.

CAPE BRETON—GOVERNOR AINSIE, &c.

MR. BENNET understood that a correspondence had taken place between certain inhabitants of Cape Breton and the Colonial Department, relative to the conduct of Governor Ainslie, and the other Authorities in that Colony, in the imposition of Taxes, without the concurrence of a House of Assembly. He wished to know why Governor Ainslie had been sent out to Cape Breton after his conduct in other settlements, and whether or not any steps had been taken by Government on the subject?

MR. GOULBOURN replied, that the question had been for some time, and was now, under the consideration of Government; but that no actual determination had yet been come to upon it.

MR. BENNET would call the attention of the House to the subject some day next week.

BANK RESTRICTION—NEW ISSUE OF PAPER.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER entered upon various statements to show the propriety of delaying the return to cash payments by the Bank of England. He said, that out of the 2,600,000*l.* lately issued by the Bank in gold, hardly any proportion of that sum now remained in the country. Owing to the bad harvest of 1816, much specie had been exported for the purchase of corn. Since the peace, too, a number of persons had gone to reside abroad. From Dover alone, from 1814 to last February, 90,230 persons had sailed for the Continent, out of which only 77,531 had returned to that port. These 12,700 absentees, it was obvious, must spend a great deal of money abroad. At 200*l.* each, the sum would reach 2,540,000*l.* annually. Then there was the large sum spent abroad by our Army; for though the French paid the troops, yet there was much private expense on the part of the Officers. The Foreign Loans raised here were also to be considered. The French Government had raised two, amounting to 27 millions, which had occasioned a depression of the exchange, and a rise in the price of gold and silver. That Government meant this year to raise another loan of 12 millions sterling; and if it intended to fulfil its engagements, it would require full 20 millions sterling to do so. All these circumstances demanded serious consideration, and he could not imagine that any Gentleman would advise an immediate return to Cash Payments at such a time. In the present year, too, a Loan of 5 millions for Prussia was to be raised in this country. It was, therefore, these external circumstances, not any thing internal, which rendered it altogether inexpedient and injurious to compel the Bank to resort to payments in specie.—He could assure the House that he was sincerely desirous of such resumption (laughter), and he hoped that a plan he had to propose would very much tend to restore the metallic circulation, as well as give a security to our paper circulation which it had never before possessed. His object was, that after the 5th of July, 1820, no private banker in England and Ireland (for he did not mean to include Scotland) should issue notes under the value of 5*l.*, without a sufficient deposit of Government securities, consisting either of stock or of exchequer bills. He proposed, therefore, that it should be enacted, that every private banker should transfer into the names of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, an amount of exchequer bills equal in value to the amount of the notes to be issued, or a quantity of stock double the amount of the nominal value. After a deposit of stock and exchequer bills, if a private banker issues notes, they shall be stamped in a way to denote that sufficient security had been deposited, and that they are given on the faith of that security. This was the general outline of his plan, which, he thought, would be sufficiently intelligible; the details of the regulations would, of course, require great consideration. The plan, he said, had a tendency to engage men of real property in banking concerns, and to exclude those who had not such property, and who could not give available security for their issues. Care should be taken to fix on such a stamp as would prevent imposture. It might be the wish of bankers to introduce stock-notes, but he would have the choice of what security he wished to give. The Right Hon. Gentleman.

after some other statements, concluded by moving, "that leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue the Bank Restriction for a time to be limited."

Mr. TREVELYAN remarked, that the House was now called upon not only to continue the Bank Restriction for one year longer, but to agree to an entire alteration of the paper circulation, at least as far as related to 12. and 22. notes. What could be the object of the Right Hon. Gentleman, he would not trust his own judgment to conjecture. He did not know whether it was to sweep the whole of the country paper away, and perhaps to give the paper circulation into the hands of the Bank; or whether it was a means of enlarging the paper circulation. The subject demanded inquiry, and a Committee should be appointed for the purpose. Then there was the restriction, which was to be continued for one year more; but in his opinion it would be continued for that, and the next, and many more, until the Bank was compelled to a resumption. The Right Hon. Gentleman's system could not go on without the Bank, and the Bank (his masters) could not go on as they wished without the restriction: they lived only for profit, and they could not get what they desired without a paper circulation. The great object of the Right Hon. Gentleman was to keep up a great paper circulation, in order to force up the funds and lower the rate of interest. He trusted, however, the House would not lend itself to sanction his projects without inquiry. He would, therefore, propose that the report should be brought up on Monday, when he would propose the appointment of a Committee to make inquiry into the subject. It was a monstrous proposition, that, in compliment to the abilities of the Right Hon. Gentleman, the House should allow the currency of the country to be altered, to suit the views of the Minister, whatever might be his pretensions.

Mr. GRENFELL said, he had listened with much pain to the flimsy pretences upon which it was attempted to justify a measure, which tended, he believed most conscientiously, to the subversion of all property in the kingdom. An overwhelming paper currency had always been productive of the most fatal mischiefs to every country where it had been tolerated. The renewal of the Restriction from time to time had been supported upon various grounds. Sometimes the state of foreign exchanges and the price of gold were brought forward for this purpose; at other times a bad harvest, or the convulsion and revulsion apprehended from sudden recurrence to cash-payments were held out. Since the month of July last, the progress of the Bank was a sufficient reason to account for the rise in the price of gold.

The Resolution was then carried, and leave given to bring in a Bill to continue the Act for the Restriction of cash-payments for a time to be limited. As also a Bill to enable the Bankers of England and Ireland to issue promissory notes upon deposit, stock, or other Government security.—Adjourned.

Friday, April 10.

WAR IN INDIA.

In reply to a question by Mr. HOWORTH, Mr. CANNING said, it was certainly true that the Peishwa had commenced war against the Company; but that in two actions the Company's troops had gained advantages, without the loss of a single Officer, three only being wounded. The Board of Control however had not yet received any official details.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE, &c.

Lord A. HAMILTON called the attention of the House to an election transaction in the county of Lanark. Last November, Sir A. COCHRANE had declared himself a Candidate for that county. He had the whole influence of Government. Mr. F. FERGUSON, an agent of Lord Douglas, wrote a letter to W. Dyke, Esq. in which he expressly stated, that he had communicated to Lord Douglas Mr. D.'s wish to have a situation under Government for his young friend, Mr. Dyke; and he (Mr. F.) was authorised to state, that if Mr. D. supported his Lordship's views in politics at the first election, his Lordship would secure his friend an eligible situation, which would be of great advantage to him, &c.—After various observations, Lord A. H. moved, that Thomas Ferguson be called to the bar of the House on the 21st.

A long conversation ensued.—Mr. W. DUNDAS said, that Lord Douglas had never given Ferguson any such authority.—Mr. C. WYNN thought, as there was a clear attempt at bribery, that Ferguson should be examined.—The Lord Advocate thought that he should be proceeded against in some other way.—Mr. BROUGHTON said if the House would not admit the motion, they would at once hold out impunity to all the corrupt supporters of Ministers. Even the Noble Peer himself ought to desire inquiry.—Mr. B. BATHURST admitted that it did appear that an individual had committed a very high breach of privilege; but he proposed as an amendment, that the case should be referred to a Committee of Privileges.—To this Lord A. HAMILTON consented, and the Committee was ordered to proceed in it directly.

Various Ordnance Estimates were voted, after some conversation, in which Mr. BENNER observed upon the hardship endured by many meritorious officers, who had served 22 years, being placed upon half-pay, while other officers, who had not served more than three, were placed on full pay.

The Surgery Regulation Bill was opposed by Sir C. MONCK and others, and the motion for reading it this day six months was carried—so that the Bill is thrown out.

Mr. Alderman WOOD's motion for a Committee for considering the means of promoting trade, manufactures, and commerce, by the encouragement of partnerships, was carried, and appointed for Monday.

The Lord Advocate obtained leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the Funds of the Royal Scotch Burghs. Hitherto, he said, the Magistrates of those burghs had given in their accounts to the Court of Exchequer of Scotland, without any check on their proceedings; he should, therefore, propose, that these accounts should be produced to the burghs, before they were brought before the Court of Exchequer; but as this might not be entirely effectual in preventing abuses, a power was to be given to five burghs, to make representations on the subject to the Court of Exchequer.

The Bill was afterwards brought in and read, and ordered for a 2d reading this day three weeks.—Adjourned till Monday.

ATTACK ON THE EDITOR IN A MAGAZINE.

Our readers may remember an extract which was made in this Paper a short time since from a gross and malignant attack on the Editor. It is with infinite loathing I notice the subject again, even for the purpose of dismissing it. It's unhappy author values himself, as he reasonably may, on it's having been noticed so much; but I must here observe, that I have never been in the habit of attending to these things, and that all the notices of it, except the last, came from my brother; who being at the Examiner-Office when the libel reached him, and moved with a zeal for me which a friend may reasonably feel beyond the party attacked, thought it worth while to call for the author, and possible that the call would be attended to. The call was repeated in vain. I made one myself in terms strong enough to rouse up any decent animal from his hiding-place, and endeavoured to persuade myself that I ought to feel something more than mere scorn—but all to no purpose. The Bookseller was even threatened by us with prosecution; but I confess, that partly from a bad habit of delay, partly from doubts as to the law itself, partly from no great respect to it's decisions now-a-days whether for or against,—partly from delicacies which were not overcome even by all the advantages taken of them by others,—partly from a disinclination to make the instrument suffer for the workman,—partly even from a notion that the Bookseller might be obstinate from feelings of private friendship towards the man,—partly from a horror upon me that it might turn out to be some most pitiable person who had attacked me because he had every reason in the world not to attack me,—and more than all, from some theories which I hold on the subject of retribution and reformation and which I have often expressed in this Paper,—I neither did, nor beyond the moment intended to prosecute him. Still however I fancied that the author could scarcely help coming forward. I had never disguised myself from individuals, or from the public. I had particularly left word at the Office, that any one who thought himself aggrieved by me, and who demanded my name and residence, should be told them; and out of a simplicity, which it will take still more disappointment, I hope, generally speaking, to do away, I was trusting enough to imagine that an individual, evidently ignorant of all noble theories, and who had taken pains, in language that recoiled upon himself, to misrepresent my actions, my motives, my very reading, nay, my personal manners and very walk, would nevertheless have spirit enough remaining to avow himself and come forward. He did not. He contented himself, instead, with addressing to me a letter, in which, after a certain growling and mean fashion, he recanted;—that is to say, in which he had the face to pretend that he had not attacked me in my private character and person,—in which, with habits of falsehood equally disgusting, he pretended to confound all the absurd particulars of his libel with some general questions equally ridiculous,—and which he concluded by saying that he did not mind being called a coward, and should not come forward.

It is quite impossible I should answer the letter of such a person as this, or take any further notice of him. I only warn Mr. BLACKWOOD his bookseller how he admits private libels into his publication, and does more ultimate injury to his reputation and even profits than he seems to be aware,—not to mention that others may treat him in a very different manner than I have done. I also authorize him to inform the poor unhappy creature, that he may now come forward, if he has no other persons to fear than myself; and that my pity for him, with very great sincerity, is still stronger than my contempt.

LEIGH HUNT.

BACC. ART., who has no need of apologizing for being earnest in the defence of any one he admires, will be noticed more particularly in a week or two.

Mr. S.'s Letter was extremely agreeable to us, and still more creditable to himself.

We have scarcely been able hitherto to look into the volume of C. S.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, APRIL 12.

THE doubts and delays respecting the final settlement of the duration of the armies in France, naturally agitate the people a good deal, and have more than once set the Chambers in a bustle. A member the other day in praising the Swiss troops, who had not demanded, he said, contributions nor yet arrears, wished "to God that all had proved themselves as good Frenchmen as those brave foreigners." This expression was followed by cries of Order! and Abominable!—Another deputy, M. BIGNON, protested against the proscription lists, "in which were placed names, taken at random, from among 28 millions of Frenchmen, when so many other names might with much greater propriety have been placed there." M. BIGNON was called to order amidst great confusion; and M. COURVOISIER said, that the observation was an attack on the Royal Authority, from which the ordonnances emanated; to which M. BIGNON found it necessary to reply, "that the ordonnances were countersigned by the Ministers, and that to criticise those ordonnances was therefore not to accuse the King, but the Minister." So little even yet does the new French Parliament seem to understand it's own provisions. Our own Members of Parliament are much amused with the inexperience of the French Deputies, their reading from written speeches, and above all, their breaking up the debates as sure as the dinner hour comes. Our illustrious countrymen have certainly the advantage of their parliamentary imitators in some things,—thanks to a few old-fashioned lovers of freedom that lived some time ago; but as to inexperience, there is a worse kind of experience that knows the institutions which it is violating;—a written speech, if it is the author's own, as it is apt to be, is a better evidence of something intelligent and independent, than the being unable or ashamed to make any speech at all;—and as to stopping at dinner-time, there must be some point of time to stop at, and it is better to earn one's refreshment by a previous duty and an unclouded head, than to come half muddled down to the House ready for any unconstitutional measure or brutal joke, which the Minister or his bought friend chuses to deal out,—much more than still to sit muddling and eating in the lobby-tavern, till their masters want them, and they are called for.

It is said from Brussels, that a number of persons who used to meet at the house of Madame REGNAULT DE ST. JEAN D'ANGELY, have been arrested and interrogated upon the affair of the assassination; and that the Countess herself was to appear before the Magistrate of the District. The Mistress of CANTILLON, the man arrested as the supposed assassin, has been imprisoned also at Paris. CANTILLON himself, it is stated, takes his confinement in a very cavalier manner, and some days ago wrote the following distich on the wall of his room:—

Pour ce scelerat de Wellington
Je me trouve dans cette prison :—
Here am I in prison thrown,
For that rascal Wellington.

The cause of the alleged attempt still remains a mystery.

We have unfortunately to record an attempt at assassination, which has occurred in our own country in the course of the week. The reader will find the particulars in another part of our Paper. We have several times expressed our opinion of this kind of action, which in a solitary instance only here and there, in the history of the world, is to be traced to unequivocal virtue and benevolence acting with an over-wrought enthusiasm upon the clearest public grounds:—in all others it is either mere ferocity and bad passion, or lamentable insanity: as in the one instance, a man must be dispatched out of the way like a raging tiger, at least till society can be better constituted for the retrieval of such men's minds,—so in the other, not only should the individual's safety as well as that of the community be consulted, but strict enquiry should be made into the causes which produced his insanity; as it is possible, in some instances, they may be found united with the grounds of the attempt. The Courier, not content with an absurd recoiling article it put forth a day or two before, respecting the causes which elevate people above their proper pitch in society, has put forth a long paragraph on this occasion, in which it accuses contemporary writers of having created a tendency to assassination. The Courier talks nonsense, as it is very apt to do: and a man may be allowed a double portion of it, who by his own confession has been frightened out of his wits. There is an end of begging the question in this manner now-a-days. Tendencies to assassination, when religious fanaticism does not produce them, are at least as likely to spring from the vices of the governors as from those of the governed. If an assassin is laid hold of, who has been instigated with bad passions, let him be dealt with as we have stated;—he has committed a horrible crime;—if an assassin is laid hold of, who was out of his wits, let him be treated in a different manner;—but in either case, and especially in the latter, it is the duty of those who can, to see whether any unconstitutional or inhuman grounds of provocation existed in the quarter attacked. We do not mean to impute the slightest thing of the sort to Lord PALMERSTON,—no, not the remotest shadow of it. On the contrary, we believe that the affairs of his Lordship's office are very well conducted,—much better certainly than those of some other offices we could name. But it is the interest of all parties, governing as well as governed, to have questions of this awful nature impartially discussed; and nothing insidiously begged upon either side.

We shall pay more attention in a week or two to the progress of the canvassing for the independent party in Westmoreland. The people seem to have great enthusiasm for Mr. BROUGHAM; and they reasonably may. To say nothing of the other bonds from which he would relieve them, the unusual presence of a man of great intellect, in the character of a parliamentary candidate, must act like a long-forgotten sunshine upon them, and thaw up a prodigious quantity of dull weather. We see by the accounts of his brilliant progress through the country, that when he was met by the first body of the natives, they insisted upon drawing him in his carriage. Mr. BROUGHAM entreated otherwise in vain. "My lad!" said they, "we have you; and we are resolved to carry you into Kendal ourselves." "Well, Gentlemen!" returned he, "you compel me to create sinecures under your own eyes; for these four horses are engaged for drawing my carriage, and you are resolved to do the work for them."—Could any of the LOWTHENS exclaim with the Poet,

Sir, you may spare your application;
I'm no such beast, nor his relation.

MOST EXTRAORDINARY LETTER FROM THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE CANNING.

WHEN we lately noticed the Letter addressed to Mr. CANNING, we remarked that every sentence of it would make that Right Honourable Person writhe as much as poor OGDEN did while under the knife of the surgeon. Just so has it turned out, as the following Letter from Mr. C. to the author of that caustic publication will sufficiently evince. One hardly knows how to comment on such an extraordinary communication. Mr. CANNING's object is evidently to ascertain the writer, who may have powerful reasons for wishing not to be exposed to the united power and malice of such an Administration. We therefore present to our readers the introductory Letter (which is a reply to Mr. CANNING's), and that of the Right Hon. Gentleman, just as we received them:—

LETTER FROM THE AUTHOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—You are requested to insert in your Paper the Reply of the Right Honourable GEORGE CANNING to my public Remonstrance with that Gentleman on the insult he lately dared to offer to the People of England.

I am agreeably disappointed. After ten days' deliberation, he acknowledges the Tribunal, and has determined to plead.

Whilst his Judges are deciding on the merits of his defence, it shall be my care to provide the Gentleman with another opportunity of displaying his taste and talents in the protection of his character.

In the mean time, whilst Mr. LAMBTON is a "Dolt and an Idiot," I am content to be a "Liar and a Slanderer and an Assassin," according to the same inimitable Master of the Vulgar Tongue.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant.

THE AUTHOR OF THE LETTER TO THE RIGHT
HON. GEORGE CANNING.

MR. CANNING'S LETTER.

Gloucester Lodge, April 10, 1818.

SIR,—I received early in the last week the Copy of your Pamphlet, which you (I take for granted) had the attention to send to me.

Soon after I was informed, on the authority of your Publisher, that you had withdrawn the whole impression from him, with the view (as was supposed) of suppressing the publication.

I since learn, however, that the Pamphlet, though not sold, is circulated under blank covers.

I learn this from (among others) the Gentleman to whom the Pamphlet has been industriously attributed, but who has voluntarily and absolutely denied to me that he has any knowledge of it or of its Author.

To you, Sir, whoever you may be, I address myself thus directly, for the purpose of expressing to you my opinion, that

You are a Liar and a Slanderer, and want courage only to be an Assassin.

I have only to add, that no man knows of my writing to you; that I shall maintain the same reserve so long as I have an expectation of hearing from you in your own name; and that I shall not give up that expectation till to-morrow (Saturday) night.

The same Address which brought me your Pamphlet will bring any Letter safe to my hands.—I am, Sir, your humble Servant, (Signed) GEO. CANNING.

For the Author of "A Letter to the Right Hon. Geo. Canning."

[Mr. RIDGWAY is requested to forward this Letter to its destination.]

The proceedings at Cape Breton, and the appointment of Governor AINSLIE, have at length been noticed in Parliament by Mr. BENNET. Mr. GOULBOURN, we hope, will next week have something satisfactory to say on the subject.

Lord PALMERSTON is quite recovered.

It has been the subject of conversation here for some days past, that Lord SUFFIELD will shortly be created an Earl, and Sir JACOB ASTLEY raised to the Peerage, by the title of Lord DELAVAL.—Notwich Paper.

It is said that Mr. CRESPIGNY has sold the Borough of Aldborough for 32,000*l.*, and that the purchaser is also buying up some of the franchises at 40*l.* a-piece!—Bury Paper.

Lieutenant GORDON, of the Coldstream Guards, was killed lately in a duel at Cambray, fought with a French officer of the Legion du Nord.

PITT v. HUSKISSON, &c.—Yesterday the Plaintiff in this action moved the Court of King's Bench, that proceedings should be stayed, in order that a fresh indictment might be preferred; but Lord ELLENBOROUGH shortly said, the thing could not be done.—More of this next week.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 318.

ITALIAN OPERA.

By some unaccountable chance, when we spoke of the new Opera by ROSINI, we omitted to mention the new singer, Signor GARCIA. He is a stoutish dark man, with an intelligent if not a handsome countenance; and might be a considerable acquisition to the theatre, both as a singer and an actor, were it not for a tendency to over-do every thing. His voice is of a middle kind in every respect, but flexible and not unpleasing; he evidently understands both the music he sings, and the parts which he performs; and he enters a good deal more into the character of them than most singers. But his musical power is apt to slip over the line of good taste, and run into flowery extravagance; and he sometimes gesticulates so much as to look like a dumb man talking with his fingers. He has also at times an affected rather than uncouth manner of walking and standing, especially a way of planting himself with a thigh rounded inwards and a leg perking out, in a style partly robust and partly finical, like some of the attitudes in MONTICELLI's pictures of banditti. This, with a tendency to be corpulent, has not the engaging effect it intends; and unluckily for our impression of him, it was in one of these kind of attitudes, with his arms folded in a cloak, his head thrown back, and his voice pouring forth an easy profusion of ornaments, as much as to say, "You see the way I'm in," that we saw him for the first time, on entering the house during ROSINI's Opera. He is upon the whole however a good deal at home in that Opera, and acts the part of the Count better than any other performer would do with the exception of AMBROGETTI. He assumes the various disguises with spirit, is very respectably drunk in the pretended soldier, and prodigiously doleful and canting in that eternally repeated salutation from the pretended singing-master, which reasonably tires out Doctor Bartolo. He is a great deal best, in short, in the broader part of a comic character. He understands the varieties of a graver or tragic one, as an intelligent reader understands them; but his expression is overwrought, and this is much more sufferable in comedy.

Signior GARCIA's performance, therefore, in La Clemenza di Tito is not so good as his Count Almaviva, though still it is much better than the ordinary performance of singers. When he commences the duet of Ah Perdona, his doleful look is something after the fashion of that in the disguise above mentioned,—his mouth is so prodigiously dreary and turned down at the corners. He also turns his eyes up and down a great deal too much, like a doll that is pulled with wires. We earnestly advise Signior GARCIA to prune his exuberance, in order that his powers, which are in many respects excellent, may not run to seed.

Madame FONOR is certainly not suited to the violent part of Vitellia in this opera, either in figure or disposition. She looks too plump and good-natured. Yet we know not who could sing the airs better, though the beautiful duet just mentioned (the most perfect perhaps of MOZART's serious ones, as Crudel Perchè is of the lively) appeared to us to drag too much between her and GARCIA. Perhaps it was his fault, for she looked at him when it was her turn to be silent, with one of those conscious good-natured faces of hers, which we have seen her carry towards other performers, when they were likely to mystify the audience. It seems as much as to say, "Well, I sincerely hope they won't think it odd." We remember one night when a respectable singer, who we understand has been a finer one in his time, was rambling away in a very lax and gratuitous manner, she looked at him every now and then with a kind of wondering but filial patience, as if she said, "Well, I can wait, though I don't well understand it. Heaven send they don't hurt a hair of your song."

BEGREZ and Signora MORI were justly encored on Tuesday night in the duet of Deh Prendi,—the other loveliest composition in this serious opera, which to say the truth with all our enthusiasm for MOZART, is somewhat tiresome to us. The cold Roman gravity of it did not suit his temperament. BEGREZ, we see, has multiplied his stock of gestures as he was advised, and is much the better for it.

There is a very poor divertissement between the acts. It is called a Village Festival, but there are only one or two gratuitous scenes in which different dancers vault and twirl. Mademoiselle MILANIE should not be turned to so little account, after the beautiful ballet of Zephyr; but the present school of dancing, generally speaking, is unworthy of the opera, and very inferior to the one in DES HAYES's time. That indeed was something like "the poetry of motion." The one now flourishing is like fine hand-writing to fine thoughts. It is any thing but the poetry of motion; it is the mechanism,—the spinning-jenny.

We have again to quarrel with the translation of the Operas, which we are very loth to do, as they have been much better since the beginning of the last season. In that of Il Barbiere di Siviglia, the joke of the drunken man's repeatedly mistaking Doctor Bartolo's name is entirely lost, by preserving the words of the original, except in the strange instance of Somaio which is rendered by the Italian synonym of Asina. We have not the book by us, but we remember the passages. Thus Barbaro is still Barbaro, which however may be easily guessed; but Doctor Somaio, (which, by the way, is no play on the word at all) might be translated Doctor Pack-saddle; and Doctor Bartolo be turned into Doctor Bartlemy, which would be a translation of Bartolo, and imply a sort of changeling too, Bertoldo being a well-known name in Italian comic romance for a droll who was deformed.

LYCEUM.

MR. MATHEWS is getting crowded houses here with a miscellany of anecdote and mimicry, which is usually called a Budget, and which an actor generally keeps for country audiences, before whom, it is supposed, his powers can better venture to appear in an undress. In a prefatory address, which we were too late to hear, he states, says the Times, "his motives to this undertaking, the chief of which were his disgust at the declining state of the drama, which banished him from legitimate comedy, and precluded him from the exercise of his art in that form which could alone be honourable to him, and grateful to his feelings; and his consequent determination, if he must be reduced to a mere mimic, to play the true mountebank, and set up a stage for himself."

There was never, we suspect, a more mortifying objection to the state of the modern drama than this. "This is the most unkindest cut of all." The dramas of living authors, however, at least the comic ones, are not in the habit of being played, as they used to be; and though Covent-Garden, in despair of being droll, has taken to angry modern tragedies of a strange complexion, and Drury-Lane does not do half what it might with the old drama, considering its possession of KEAN, DOWTON, and MUNDEN, and an excellent set of female comedians, yet we do not altogether see the ground on which MR. MATHEWS takes so unceremonious a leave of the stage, when the comedies of VANBRUGH, CIBBER, and WYCHERLEY are still performed at the latter theatre.

The entertainment before us consists of comic songs, imitations, and ventriloquism; and there is a good dramatic contrivance to connect as well as mingle the two former, by making them arise out of Mail Coach Adventures. MR. MATHEWS performs for the most part in his own dress, by a table and a couple of candles, and is accompanied in the songs by a piano-forte. The ventriloquism does not appear to be the most arduous of its kind; but it is very curious in one who is not a professor, and is even more entertaining perhaps in the mouth of so good a comedian. He performs it in the character of a French servant; and in one part of it, talks a good deal with a supposed old gentleman in bed; but the best is his dialogue with a large doll dressed up like a little child, which he holds on his knee, and teaches to count. We have seen him do it before at the Haymarket. The questions are followed quickly by the answers, in two decidedly different voices,—the one coarse and nasal, the other light-toned and exceedingly childish. The child is an impudent young rogue, given to mocking; and is always calling forth the remonstrances of its teacher by repeating his grunts and ver goods as well as the lesson itself. The effect is very complete and ludicrous. Some of the songs and imitations, though perhaps with variations, have also entertained and amused the public before, especially in a late after-piece at the Haymarket; but most of the mimicries with which MR. MATHEWS is understood to have amused his friends in private are, we believe, here brought together; and there is one inimitable one in particular of an old Scotch woman, which is truly surprising. He merely turns round, and quickly puts on a cloak and coif, and upon turning again, another being seems actually before you; the very features are quite altered; and while she tells her story of "the pure deer mon," her late husband, and SANDY ANDERSON his kirk-beadle, you might really think you were sitting with her in an inn-room, and attending to the calm old gossiping of a grey-haired Scotch-woman, with her failing memory, her kindly noddings and winkings, and her feeble up and down tones, half faltering, and half decided. MR. MATHEWS finishes with repeating a passage of Hamlet's Advice to the Players after the tone and manner of several living actors. The imitation of KEMBLE, we think, is not good; that of KEAN strikes us as a caricature; and one of them, the fourth if we remember, we did not recognize, with all our stage-experience; but the rest, POPPE, BLANCHARD, MUNDEN, FAWCETT, BRAHAM, and the late MR. SUETT, are excellent. Those of BLANCHARD, BRAHAM, and SUETT are indeed perfect. The last, with its tone of conscious buffoonery and its little abrupt laugh, came upon us like an absolute resurrection.

DRURY-LANE.

A Gentleman, whose name by the title-page appears to be BAYNES, sent us a printed Farce, called Love and Laudanum, which was produced with considerable success at the Woolwich theatre on the 23d of February, and from which he suspects the main incidents of the Sleeping Draught have been copied. With the Farce we received the following letter:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I send you the Farce of Love and Laudanum: from the date of its publication, you will perceive that it has a prior claim to the main incidents in the Sleeping Draught; trusting that (as a decided enemy to literary piracy) you will give publicity to this short communication, and favour me with your opinion on the subject.—I have no hesitation in confessing, that I borrowed the idea from the story you have pointed out in Boccaccio, and if (as reported) PENLEY be the author of the Sleeping Draught, I can as clearly prove that he copied the incidents in question from Love and Laudanum, which upwards of three months ago was (if not seen by MR. PENLEY of Drury-lane himself) placed in his brother's hands for perusal, by a friend of mine at Windsor, to whom I had lent it. Its title was then Who's the Murderer? which was afterwards changed to Love and Laudanum—having discovered that a piece of the former appellation had been brought out at one of the Minor Theatres.

"THE AUTHOR OF 'LOVE AND LAUDANUM'."

This farce is not destitute of pleasantry, though it is somewhat overloaded with dialogue and slang; but it is certainly inferior to the Sleeping Draught in ease and fitness for the stage; and how far it is or is not the origin of that production, the parties concerned must explain.—MR. BAYNES says in his Preface, that "the spectator of Poppolino's taking the "sleeping draught," and his subsequent appearance as the ghost, will judge what claims to originality the author of the Sleeping Draught has to those incidents, when he has read those parts of Love and Laudanum, in which Scruple is placed in similar situations." Now it is impossible to say, that MR. BAYNES's piece may not have furnished hints to the author in question, whoever he is, especially as we fear that a good deal of this kind of intellectual petty larceny is carried on in most circles of literature, high and low. We should be glad to have an assurance to the contrary. But on the face of the printed farce itself, it certainly does not appear necessary that he should have seen it. MR. BAYNES speaks of originality; but there is little or no claim to originality, we apprehend, be the case as it may. The author of the Sleeping Draught might have seen the story in Boccaccio as well as he; and the idea of the ghost might easily have been suggested by the late farce of Frightened to Death. That the writer has turned to Boccaccio's story seems pretty clear, inasmuch as he has added from it the circumstance of the chest's being taken to another house; which house also he has made a miser's, as it is that of two usurers in the original. The question then seems reduced to this,—whether a sight or any other knowledge of MR. BAYNES's farce gave a hint to the other author for consulting Boccaccio; and MR. BAYNES might help this discovery perhaps by calling to mind whether he ever mentioned the great Italian as his original. But this would be very innocent dealing compared with taking any unfair theatrical advantage.

FINE ARTS.

THE ROYAL ACADEMICIANS.

Mr. EXAMINER.—The Academicians are in a perfect fury at the other dream of Somniator, in the last Number of the "Annals of the Fine Arts;" gentle creatures! and so they find they have qualities as capable of being ridiculed as the Directors of the British Gallery, do they? O the ill-used dears! how they could chuckle, and laugh, and whisper, and revel at the first appearance of the Catalogue Raisonné! but alas, how chop-fallen the darlings seem now!—"Shan't be scolded, then,"—"shall have their own way,"—"shall paint pictures in a fortnight,"—"shall use putty and waxey-paxey,"—"shall paint Generals in red coaty-pooties,"—"shan't learn to draw, then,"—"hush, then,"—

"There 'ee go up, up, up,
And there 'ee go down, down, down,
Shall paint pictures as quick as you like,
And for some time shall take in the town."

"Well, then,—shan't paint pictures then."—"Od bless the children, I don't know what ails them; their temper is so altered lately, they weary one's life out."

R.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

ROYAL NUPTIALS.

The marriage of the Princess Elizabeth with Philip Augustus Frederick, Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Homburg, took place at the Queen's house on Tuesday evening. The Court Newsman says, that the acquaintance of the new married couple commenced two years ago, since which a correspondence has been maintained between them. Cards of invitation were issued between two and three weeks since to various distinguished characters who were to assist at the ceremony.—Among the company present were the Russian, French, Spanish, Dutch, American, Swedish, and Neapolitan Ambassadors, with their ladies; together with most of the ladies and gentlemen of the different Royal establishments, besides the following persons:—

The Marquis and Marchioness of Hertford, Marquis and Marchioness Cholmondeley, Marquis and Marchioness of Winchester, Lord and Lady Harrington, Lady Eldon, Earl and Countess of Harrowby, Earl and Countess Mulgrave, Viscount and Viscountess Castlereagh, Mr. and Mrs. Canning, Mr. Vansittart, Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Bishop of London, and Mr. Mannors Sutton.

The saloon in the Queen's Palace, which is considered one of the largest rooms in London, was the place appointed for the ceremony. Under the throne, which was erected for the purpose of receiving the Addresses upon the marriage of the Princess Charlotte, a temporary altar was put up; it was covered with crimson velvet, ornamented with gold lace, from the Chapels Royal, with the cushions and stools. The gold communion-plate was very splendid; part of it had belonged to King William: there were three remarkably large salvers or dishes, one of them representing the Last Supper, with emblematical devices in the compartments. There were two large flagons from the Chapel Royal, beautifully chased, and a number of ewers; also several chalices, or cups, of solid gold. Each corner had most superbly gilt tripods, for six candles.

In the morning the Prince of Hesse-Homburg had a long interview with the Prince Regent at Carlton-house, and he paid several visits in the course of the day. His Serene Highness dined at his residence in St. James's Palace. At a quarter before 8 o'clock in the evening, he went to the Queen's Palace, with his suite, in two of the Prince Regent's carriages, escorted by a party of Life Guards. His Serene Highness's suite consisted of Baron O'Naghten, Baron de Gerning, Baron de Krane, and Lord Stewart.

The company had all arrived before eight. They entered by the Colonnade, and the front door to the Grand Hall, where a few spectators were admitted. On the arrival of the Duke and Duchess of York, the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, the Duke of Clarence, the Duke of Kent, and the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, they proceeded to the Queen's dining-room, &c.—The Foreign Ambassadors entered the grand saloon first, to see the ceremony, to report to their different Courts; they were accompanied by their Ladies, followed by the Cabinet Ministers and their Ladies, who proceeded to the right; the Great Officers, and those of the Royal Household, took their stations on the left side.

At eight o'clock, her Majesty began to move from her private apartments, and, on entering the Saloon, the Queen took her station in a chair of state, to the left of the altar. The different branches of the Royal Family took their stations according to their rank. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London appeared at the altar, the latter attending as Bishop of the Diocese and Dean of the Chapel Royal. Every thing being properly arranged for the ceremony, the Lord Chamberlain retired, and introduced the Prince of Hesse-Homburg, between the Dukes of Clarence and Kent. His Serene Highness was dressed in his General's uniform, and wore several of his Orders, Grand Crosses, &c. having ten in the whole. The Lord Chamberlain retired again, and then introduced the blushing, trembling, and tender virgin (born Anno Domini 1770) who was conducted to the altar by the Dukes of Clarence and Kent. The Duke of York gave her away. The Prince Regent was absent, "partly (says the Court Newsman) in consequence of not being quite recovered from his attack of the gout, and partly because a similar scene was fresh in his recollection, in the marriage of his daughter."

As soon as the ceremony had concluded, a signal was given, and a double royal salute was fired from the Park and Tower guns.

The bride and bridegroom retired, and having taken off their splendid dresses, his Serene Highness appeared in a full ball dress, and her Royal Highness in a white satin pelisse, and a nun's veil over her head: they left the Palace soon after nine o'clock in her Royal Highness's landaulet and four for the Prince Regent's cottage at Windsor,—where, and every where else, we wish them all manner of happiness—

"May they live a life of pleasure,

"Without mixture, without measure;"—

May all the little male Hombergs (if any) be as valiant and well whiskered as their father, and all the females (if any) be as amiable and as plump—no, not quite so plump—as their mother.

It will be seen, that neither the Duke of Sussex nor the Duke of Cumberland was present at the wedding: the former, it seems, is not patronized by the Regent; and her Majesty, it is said, still refuses to receive the Duchess of Cumberland under her hospitable roof.

The daily papers close their account of these Royal proceedings with a long list of Dresses, Robes, Pelisses, &c. furnished by that illustrious dress-maker, Miss Wing,—enough, in all appearance, to supply a well-stocked milliner's warehouse. It is not for us to detail the particulars of the elegant white, amber, blue, green and white, Pomona green, and lilac satin dresses, abounding with Mechlin, blond, Brussels, and hobbin laces—nor to give a list of the star-book, India, sprigged, and spotted muslin dresses—nor of the cambric dresses—nor of the fine coloured cloth, kerseymere, and sarcenet dresses—amounting altogether to between 40 and 50: but we here present our fair readers with the principal one,—

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS'S WEDDING-DRESS:

A very elegant and rich silver tissue, with two broad flounces of the most beautiful Brussels point lace, each flounce headed with rich silver netted shells; body and sleeves superbly trimmed with Brussels point, the sleeves tastefully looped up with silver tassels; the robe of rich silver tissue lined with white satin, trimmed with Brussels lace, bordered with silver netted she is to correspond with the dress, and fastened in the waist with a very brilliant diamond clasp.—Head-dress, superb plume of ostrich feathers, with a most beautiful bandeau of diamonds.

"Rumour says, that the Princess of HESSE-CASSEL has declined the proffered hand of the Duke of CLARENCE, and that an union is on the tapis between his Royal Highness and a Princess of the House of SAXE-HILDBOURG-HAUSEN."—Morning Paper.

The last offer of marriage made by his Royal Highness the Duke of CLARENCE is to the Princess AMELIE ADELAIDE LOUISE THERESE CAROLINE of Saxe-Meiningen, and which has been accepted. Her Serene Highness was born on the 13th of August, 1792, and is accordingly in her 26th year. Her brother the Duke is a minor, and her mother holds the reins of the Duchy as his guardian. The Lady Mother is to accompany the Princess to England.—Chronicle.

We understand that a Message is to be brought down on Monday next, in consequence of the Royal Marriage, and those in contemplation, to settle a provision and outfit generally on the marriages of the younger branches of the Royal Family.—The proposed arrangement is said to be—22,000*l.* per annum, in addition to his present allowance of 18,000*l.* to the Duke of CLARENCE, with an outfit of one year's allowance of 22,000*l.*; to each of the other PRINCES on his marriage (with a retrospect to the Duke of CUMBERLAND), an addition of 12,000*l.* a year, with an outfit of 12,000*l.* To the PRINCESSES an addition of 6,000*l.* a year, with an outfit of 6,000*l.*—This proposal would go to deprive Parliament of the old constitutional right of deciding on each case separately.—Morn. Chron.

THE REVENUE.

PRODUCE OF THE REVENUE OF GREAT BRITAIN, IN THE QUARTERS ENDING THE 5TH OF APRIL, 1817 AND 1818.

	1817.	1818.
Customs	1,912,296	2,003,664
Excise	4,612,053	5,151,805
Stamps	1,492,611	1,588,759
Post Office	342,000	335,000
Assessed Taxes	868,174	917,414
Land Taxes	154,550	178,235
Miscellaneous	93,595	73,270
	49,510,211	£10,219,207

Arrears of property tax 1,023,718 251,190

It thus appears that our revenues are, in the quarter just expired, better than those of the corresponding quarter, by upwards of 700,000*l.* The Excise, Customs, Stamps, Assessed Taxes, and Land Tax for the present quarter, all exceed those of the same quarter in last year. The Post-office and Miscellaneous are inferior.

CLERICAL PROCEEDINGS IN ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

"The Church of England is in danger now, as the Church of Rome was three centuries ago, and exactly from the same cause. The spiritual edifice is in danger, as a wooden one is in danger when the dry rot is in all its timbers.—The Established Church is in danger, and from all the Non-Established ones. Why? Because, in England, from the very nature of the two opposite sorts of Churches it follows, that by their respective Ministers, in the one case, all their useful duties should to the utmost be fulfilled; in the other, that to the utmost those same duties should be neglected."—Bentham's Church of Englandism, and its Catechism examined.

Before new Churches are built, it would be quite as well, we think, to see that those already established are properly supplied, and that the people should not be additionally taxed in order that certain individuals of influence may have the means of living in idleness and luxury.

In most of the parish churches in and about London Sermons are preached twice every Sunday, either by the Minister or his Curate. We see however by a statement* just published, that there is an exception to this system in St. Luke, Chelsea, the valuable living of which is in the possession of one of the Wellesleys.† In this parish, one Sermon only is preached every week by the Rector or his Assistant—when a second is delivered,—and this is not regularly the case,—it is given by a Lecturer, as he is termed, who is paid, not by the Rector, as it is contended he ought to be, but by an annual demand upon the parishioners, made from house to house; so that the people, in fact, are largely taxed, and yet very scantily supplied with spiritual food. The consequence is, that much offence is given; that instead of "a congregation of love," there is a congregation of complainers; that murmurs are even uttered in that place, where sounds of peace and charity should alone be heard; and that, finally, even the Lecturer himself every now and then threatens—but only threatens—to resign a situation, from which, he says, he obtains a scanty and reluctant stipend, and in which he gives so little satisfaction.

Now, it appears quite manifest, that as the Right Honourable Rector receives so ample a stipend (full two thousand a-year, we believe), he ought certainly, and at his own cost, to see that the accustomed portion of clerical duty is properly performed. This, it should seem, is all that the parishioners require, and this is what he is in common decency bound to perform. They do not complain of his rarely doing any part of the duty himself; but perhaps they have a good reason for this; for though one of his kinsmen is a man of abilities, it does not follow that the whole family is blessed with them. Indeed we have seen in another branch a very sorry teacher of "great moral lessons;" and if the Right Honourable Divine is a moralist of the same school, the good people of Chelsea may well avoid pressing him into the pulpit.

But why don't the complainants apply to their Pastor's Superior, the Bishop of the Diocese? Surely he, one of St. Peter's Representatives, is not afraid of the Wellington influence. Or,—which would perhaps be still better,—why don't they refuse paying the Church demands until the Church duties are duly performed? Are the parishioners yet to learn, that even Churchmen are sometimes to be moved by the eloquence of "filthy lucre?"

* See "Observations for the Consideration of the Rector, Churchwardens, and Inhabitants of the Parish of St. Luke, Chelsea," &c. "The labourer is worthy of his hire; but let him that receiveth work diligently."

† This same Right Reverend and Right Honourable Rector of Chelsea, where he does so little, is also a Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, where he does nothing—but pocket annually between 2 and 3000*l.* He is what Mr. Bentham terms a "consecrated idler," and is no doubt on all occasions loud in his praises of "our most excellent Establishment." But, thanks to this enlightened reasoner, the Reverend Plunderers are at length unmasked.—See the work, which has furnished the writer of this article with an appropriate motto, and which will go near to choke many a plethoric Divine.

OLD BAILEY.

On Monday, James Bugler, Mary Spail, and Susan Wilson, were brought up to the bar under a charge of forgery. They all pleaded guilty to the minor offence (that of having forged notes in their possession), which subjects them to 14 years' transportation.

Mathias Maher, who was brought up last session in a state of derangement, on a charge of forgery, and attempted to jump over the prisoners' dock, was again brought up this day, and appearing to be still insane, his trial was postponed.

William Latimer Earnshaw was twice acquitted on charges of stealing money out of letters; but was detained to be tried for stealing some articles out of a dwelling-house.

On Thursday the Sessions ended, when sentence of Death was passed on Henry Horne and John Green, for horse-stealing; Joseph Davey, for forging an order for payment of money; Edw. Benyou, for stealing in a dwelling-house; Thos. Soader, Henry Jee, Wm. Phillips, Thos. Smith, and Thos. Smith, for a like offence; Jos. Jones and Jane Carter, for burglary; John Perkins, Henry Singer, John Elmhurst, Thos. Headley, and Arch. Winter, for highway robberies; Wm. Hutchings and James Hutchings, for housebreaking; Wm. Jones, for stealing privately in a shop; Sarah Overall and John Wilson, for a like offence; George Chapman, alias Claxton, for uttering forged Bank notes; Thos. Ford, Wm. Young, Allen Gregory, and Charles Wain, for stealing in a dwelling-house; and Wm. Freeman and Thos. Duggan, for house-breaking.

John Harris, William Carr, John Williams, William Daley, and John Bailly, were ordered to be transported for life.—James Cooke, Thomas Smith, William Downes, John Rogers, Joseph Townsend, Richard Carter, John Thompson, George Downes, Mary Shaw, Susan Wilson, Richard Radford, and Jas. Butler, for 14 years—60 for seven years—17 were ordered to be imprisoned in the House of Correction, Giltspur-street—64 in the House of Correction, Clerkenwell, and four in Newgate, for various periods—11 to be privately whipped—four fined 1s. each and discharged—five judgments respited—and 21 were discharged by proclamation.—Sessions adjourned to 6th May next.

POLICE.

QUEEN-SQUARE.

SHOOTING AT LORD PALMERSTON, AT THE WAR-OFFICE.

Lieutenant David Davies, on the half-pay of the 62d regiment of foot, was on Wednesday brought to the office in custody, charged by Mr. Wm. Owen, with having fired a pistol at the Right Hon. Lord Palmerston, Secretary at War.

Witness stated, that he is a messenger in the War-office: that between one and two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, he saw prisoner in the passage of the War-office, at which time Lord Palmerston was going up stairs into his own room. Witness heard the report of a pistol, and looking immediately round, saw one in prisoner's hand. Heard Lord Palmerston groan heavily, on which he seized prisoner's hand which held the pistol, and prisoner dropt it. Witness took it up, and saw it had been just fired off. Prisoner then cried out, "You know me, and you know my wrongs; I have killed him." Witness said, he knew nothing; and asked whom he meant as having killed? Prisoner asked, "Is not that Lord Palmerston?" Witness answered, "Yes."

Lieut.-Colonel Bird stated, that wishing to see Lord Palmerston he went to the War-office, and mentioned his wish to last witness, who answered, he was very lucky, for Lord Palmerston was just then going up stairs. Witness rose to go out of the room, and at the moment heard the report of a pistol, and coming into the passage saw last witness have hold of prisoner's hand, and a pistol lying at prisoner's foot, who said to Mr. Owen, "You know my wrongs; he has killed me."

On the prisoner's being searched at the War-office, no other fire arms were found upon him; he had in his pocket a small sized paper parcel, sealed with three seals, eleven bank-notes of 1l. each, 22s. in silver, an official letter from the War-office, and two or three trifling memoranda, which were all delivered to Lavender, and by him now produced.

Mr. Lawrence Samuel, belonging to the War-office, stated, that he had been present when Mr. Astley Cooper examined the wound of his Lordship, that he said the ball had passed, and that from present appearances, he had hopes the wound was not dangerous. The coat worn by his Lordship was now produced, and the ball seemed to have entered the middle of the back, and being fired from below had passed upwards, when his Lordship, being at the moment at the turn of the staircase, had most probably given it that oblique turn which caused it to glance off at the shoulder-blade.

The Magistrate asked the prisoner where his friends lived, that he might inform them of his situation, and procure from them every assistance. The prisoner said his family lived at Monmouth; and he had a brother in the navy. He was generally remanded, till Lord Palmerston and Mr. A. Cooper can attend.

Davies is short in stature, of mild manners, and was dressed in black. He said his misfortunes had reduced him to the necessity of either killing Lord Palmerston or himself.

The assassin had put forward claims for a pension on account of the loss of a limb in the service. As a foundation for this claim, he had so mutilated himself, as to leave no doubt of his being insane. Lord Palmerston pitied the man, and it is said was disposed to do something for him, if possible. Davies became impatient. He watched Lord Palmerston's return from riding, soon after one o'clock. He took his seat on a bench for porters, on the left behind the glass door opening out from the archway at the Horse-Guards. Lord Palmerston, on alighting, turned up the stairs to the right, and presented his back to the assassin, who immediately fired. Lord Palmerston being an active man, mounting the stairs with agility, the assassin failed in his aim. The ball took an oblique direction. It cut Lord Palmerston's clothes through, but only bruised the skin.—Courier.

Davies is confined in Tortill-fields. He was heard to say it was his intention to kill his Lordship. Lord Palmerston, as soon as the wound was inflicted, declared, when he heard the name of the assassin, that he was convinced the unhappy man was in that state of mental derangement, as to render him morally irresponsible for his actions.—The prisoner has several times been brought to Queen-square, charged with riotous behaviour and assaults: the last time was on a serious charge for wounding a young man in the head with a poker, who was a lodger in the same house where the prisoner lodged at Pimlico. He was on that charge dismissed on finding bail, being considered insane.

FINAL EXAMINATION AND COMMITMENT OF HUSSEY, AT GREENWICH.

On Thursday morning a vast number of persons had collected round the House of Correction, Cold Bath-fields, to see the reputed murderer, Hussey. About a quarter before nine o'clock, a coach drove out, in which was the prisoner, heavily ironed, guarded by police-officers and constables. They set off for Greenwich, where his examination was to take place. The prisoner did not appear to feel the least emotion. On their arrival at Greenwich, the coach drove up, amidst several thousands of spectators, to the door of the national school, which was fitted up with a bar, &c. for the examination. When the coach stopped, the multitude assailed Hussey with horrid execrations of "Black-guard, murderer, drag him out, tear him to pieces." He was placed at the bar, and the examination proceeded. The prisoner's box was produced, and the whole property was identified by Mr. George Bird, and Mrs. Bell, washerwoman.

Mr. Ousten, landlord of the Tiger's Head, stated, that Hussey and Hazeldon were at his house on Saturday, the day preceding the discovery of the murder, about 3 o'clock; he did not see either of them after, until half-past 10. What became of Hussey from 3 o'clock until 10 he could not say. Hussey slept at his house on the Saturday night: the murders were committed, and left as soon as he had breakfasted next morning.

MAGISTRATE.—Were not Hussey and Hazeldon in custody of the constables (Larkin and Hodges) at your house, a few days after the murder was discovered?—Yes, they were; and the constables examined them, and discharged them without taking them before a Magistrate.

MAGISTRATE.—Did you not then say that both Hussey and Hazeldon were at your house all the night of Saturday, on which the murders were supposed to have been committed?—I can't positively say the precise words I told the officers; but if I did say so, it was under a mistake.

Larkin and Hodges declared that the witness did most positively say to them that Hussey and Hazeldon were in his house all the evening and night of the Saturday when the murders were committed.

The Magistrate severely reprimanded the constables for not bringing the prisoners before them, instead of taking upon themselves to examine and discharge prisoners; and Ousten was censured very much for leading the officers into an error, by a falsehood.

Mr. Ousten said he was sorry, but it was quite an error what he said.

The evidence of Mr. Lutton, of the Greenwich Academy, was then read; Hussey and Hazeldon frequently came together after the murder to his house, and cleaned their shoes, &c. and often ate and drank together in his house; indeed, he believed they were nearly always together, and had been companions for a considerable time.

Hussey made a similar defence to what he did when examined at Bow-street, with the addition that, on the Saturday night of the murder, he was at a club. The man whom he described as having seen running with the bundle, containing the stolen property, wore a brown jacket and white trousers. He said, that after the man had put the bundle containing the stolen property down against the tree and left it, he, after slightly examining it, covered it over with a mat and some rubbish, and thus he accounted for its not being discovered, after leaving it there for seven days.

The spotted shawl in which the stolen property was tied up, was produced; it was stained with blood.

After the examination had closed, it was with great difficulty Hussey could be preserved from the rage of the populace; he was obliged to be conveyed through a private way in the church-yard, when he was put into a coach, and proceeded to Maidstone Gaol, to be confined till his trial.

BOW-STREET.

A young man, named John Pilkington, who had been engaged to take care of an insane gentleman, named Tripp, resident in Surrey-square, was on Tuesday brought to the office on a charge of fraud. It appeared that he had taken advantage of the absence of Mrs. Tripp, to carry off the lunatic in a hackney-coach, accompanied by a woman of the town: they were traced by Mrs. Tripp from brothel to brothel, till she at last found her unfortunate husband in Dorset-street, in the New Road: the prisoner was found in bed in an adjoining house. But the fraud was this: the prisoner had induced the lunatic to sell out 2000*l.* of South-Sea stock, and had appropriated the whole sum. Luckily, however, he had not had time to waste more than a few pounds before he was caught with the chief part of the property about him. He was remanded.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

An inquest was held at Shadwell on the body of a poor old woman, who died on Thursday week. It appeared that the deceased, who had lately lost her son, in a fit of despondency flung herself into the river. A watchman, named Samuel Carman, took her out, and with the assistance of another watchman, carried her to Shadwell watch-house. The head had gone home ill, and had taken the keys with him. The watchmen not knowing or not caring what was to be done, threw the poor old woman, who was completely drenched and in a state of stupor, into a dark hole, where three women were in confinement. She died in the course of the night, her companions, who were intoxicated, not being able to be of any assistance to her. A surgeon, who was called in after her death, gave an opinion that her life might probably have been saved had timely care been taken of her. One of the Jury, who was a Constable, thought she had been sufficiently taken care of, but the majority thought otherwise, and brought in a verdict—Died from cold and gross neglect.—The Overseers undertook to investigate the case.

Friday week a gentleman took his passage in the Searcher smack, which was to sail next day from Miller's-wharf, to Aberdeen. After he went on board he went up the rigging and remained there for some time; he at last came down and pulled out several bibles and prayer books, and began to pray devoutly. At night he went to bed in the cabin, and next morning he was found lying on the bed with his clothes on, his knees bent upwards, his features distorted, and quite dead. The circumstance being made known, a gentleman came forward and recognized the body to be that of William Blake Trevelyan, Esq. Seventy pounds in bills and notes were in his pockets. An inquest was held on the body, but in consequence of the vessel having sailed, there was no evidence except a day watchman on Miller's-wharf, who stated the above facts. An empty phial was found near the deceased, with a label indicating that one drop of the contents was equal to four drops of laudanum. The inquest was twice adjourned; the Jury met, for the third time, on Wednesday, when several gentlemen attended.—Mr. Evans, surgeon, deposed, that there was slight inflammation in the stomach, but not sufficient to occasion death. He thought the death might have arisen from a convulsion fit.—Mr. Holloway, surgeon, dissected the body; the fluid in the stomach was a compound mucilaginous mixture of broth, or something of that nature, with a quantity of opium; the quantity of opium found on the stomach would not have been fatal to a person in the habit of taking opium. He thought it probable he died a natural death.—Mr. Roberts, a surgeon, in Mark-lane, was inclined to attribute his death to the pressure on the brain.—Richard Cartwright, Esq., and a number of other gentlemen, deposed to the declining health of the deceased.—The Jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of—Natural Death.

Mrs. Edwin, the actress, has been robbed of above 2,600*l.* by a Stockbroker, whom she entrusted with the money to buy for her a Government Annuity on her life.

Between six and seven o'clock on Sunday evening, as Mr. Stone, of the Borough, was returning through Hornsey Wood-lane, he was stopped by three stout footpads, all armed with pistols, who with horrid threats robbed him of his watch and money.

MARRIAGES.

On the 2d inst. at Talgarth Church, W. A. Madocks, Esq. of Tre Madoc, and M.P. for Boston, to Mrs. Roderick Gwynne, of Tregarther Park, Brecknockshire.

On Wednesday, Mr. Benjamin Bensley, of Bolt-court, Fleet-street, to Sarah, only daughter and child of Mr. Pook, of Mansion-house-street.

April 2, Mr. J. Dillon, of Paddington, to Miss M. Woolley, of Plaistow, when they presented a protest against the Marriage Ceremony, as imposed by the existing laws, protesting, as Unitarian Dissenters, against the making marriage a religious instead of a civil act, against human interference in matters of faith and conscience, against the office and existence of a priesthood, and, as servants of Jesus (who are taught to worship the one living and true God), disavowing a belief in the doctrine of the Trinity, in whose name the marriage ceremony is performed.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—As an advocate of the cause of liberty of conscience, I do not doubt your ready insertion of the above. Society, as it is now conducted, is a strange thing, and morality a mere matter of time and place and points and parallels. A few months since it was blasphemy by law to disbelieve the doctrine of the Trinity: that matter is now however strictly legal; and a man may believe in one God without being exposed to the clutches of an Attorney-General. In the meridian of London, a profession of protestantism is essential to place and power; in that of the South of France, under the pious reign of Louis le Desiré, the same belief has exposed men to persecution; and in that of Spain, under the merciful Ferdinand, consigned them to the cells of the Inquisition. Thus it is too on the subject of Marriage: it is now in France a civil rite, established, as such, I believe, by Napoleon; and the very proposition to return to the superstitious practices of the church was recently there received and interrupted by peals of laughter;—whilst in this country, professing to act on principles of civil and religious liberty and the rights of conscience, every man, whatever may be his religious belief, is compelled to subscribe to a set religious form, to visit the Established Church, to pay the Priest, to violate his conscience, and forfeit his independence, before he can enter into one of the most important and most solemn relations of life. In the hope that this state of things may be speedily remedied, and that the ceremony of marriage may be made what, from its nature, it should be made, a civil compact entered into under the direction of the Magistrate, leaving every man, of course, at liberty to add what religious ceremony his opinions might dictate or his conscience approve, and with the persuasion that communications of the kind I am now giving, if frequently made public by parties protesting openly against the ceremony, would tend speedily to produce a consummation so devoutly to be wished,—I remain, Sir, yours, &c.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 523.

MR. CANNING AND HIS CORRESPONDENT.

IN order to account for an apparent inconsistency in the remarks we are about to make on this subject, we must enter into an explanation which would be much more unpleasant to us than it is, had not the kinsman, who is it's object, qualities enough to afford it. He must allow us to say this, with whatever violence to his feelings, if it is only for the sake of our own.—The Editor of this Paper has not been in the habit of being at the Office where it is published; and occasions will sometimes occur for paragraphs or other short articles, which have accordingly been furnished by his brother. When the answer to Mr. CANNING's Letter came to the Office for insertion, the latter thought, and still thinks, as many perhaps do, that he was warranted in countenancing the writer's concealment of himself, on the ground that there was a great difference between public attacks and private ones. The Editor barely mentions this circumstance; and proceeds to state his reasons, generally, why in common with many others he is of a different opinion.

It is agreed on all hands, except those of mere literary stabbers, that the author of a private attack ought to come forward when called upon; and even they will sometimes involuntarily acknowledge this principle, by affirming the most evident and desperate falsehoods about the nature of their assault, as the poor creature did who was dismissed in another part of our paper last week. The war of politics has been supposed to allow more bush-fighting and rifle-work; and one thing must be granted,—namely, that some licence or other may be taken, in proportion as a statesman avails himself of his own privileges to attack people,—privileges of Parliament for instance;—but this does not include security for the attacker, let him say what and how much he pleases, especially if he mixes up private anecdotes or insinuations with his public ones. Now of this nature we conceive the attack in the present instance to have been. The author of it may undoubtedly conceive it to be merely political, and as such entitled to a corner behind the ramparts; it being none of the least or least awful effects of insolent corruption in a state to make vehement spirits sophisticate, and think that a great mass of unwarrantable power renders every self-indulgence of enmity warrantable in others. But even as an attack merely political, we must say, for our own individual part, that had we been the author, we should not have concealed ourselves, whatever reasons of private interest might have suggested themselves to us for the reverse; and we are pretty sure also, that our kinsman, in a similar case, would have concealed himself as little. As an attack however, mixed up as we have described, we cannot think that the author on the present occasion was warranted in refusing to come forward; for though we are far from meaning to confound him with a mere slanderer, private attack there certainly is, as the anecdote alluding to the King will testify. And why should he not have come forward? Private reasons must clearly be set aside in this question, as a man who could feel so privately for himself would have no business with warfare on others. He would be stripping them of their privileges merely to clothe his own person. It would be an anticlimax and self-betraying blunder in patriotism,—a pretence of a daring sympathy with the community ending in a saving clause for one's own advantage at any rate;—which is the very blunder that corruption splits upon.—Then if the author told no untruth, why did he not come forward? He may say perhaps, that he does more good by concealing himself;—but concealing himself, under such circumstances, is in it's own nature doing an evil, inasmuch as it is bringing the goodness of his intentions into doubt, and sets an example of which the worst men will most naturally avail themselves. And all this renders the good doubly problematical. The most inflexibly anonymous writings were never of much benefit on this very account. WILKES, notwithstanding the libertinism of his life, did more service to the community by that single personal stand he made against Special Warrants, than JUNIUS with all his anonymous eloquence: and we dare say, that if the latter is still alive, one of the bitterest contradictions he feels to the relish of his literary consequence is the use that has so often been made of his name by mere slanderers. The negative and only reason assigned by Mr. CANNING's assailant for not coming forward is, that while Mr. LAMBTON is a dolt and an idiot, he is content to be called an assassin. We really cannot see the identity of the charge and the content. Mr. LAMBTON, it seems by the debates, was not content to be called a dolt and an idiot;—we do not say that he ought to have been discontented with such abuse; but the fact is, he demanded an explanation; and the explanation, apparently to his satisfaction, was given. Besides, he is well known. But here is a heavy charge, made by a person also well known, in answer to other heavy charges on the part of a person unknown. The latter is the first accuser; and we do not see how he can undertake to despise charges which he does not meet, from an individual that does meet them.

And now having been thus explicit, we must observe, that since occasion was given us for this opinion, we have come, by his own information, to a knowledge of the author's name. It is as safe with us as if it were petrified inside of a rock; but we have been explicit in our opinion nevertheless, and not the less so for having fallen into company with him formerly, and found him, as far as we could judge from his intercourse with his friends, an ardent and cordial man, enthusiastic in behalf of others and of the community. We doubly acquit him therefore of any identification with mere enemies and calumniators; and only think, that he has yet to satisfy himself of the strength of those family reasons which really prevented him perhaps from coming forward. In saying that we do not regard him as a mere enemy and calumniator, we also acquit him of all cowardly fears on the occasion:—indeed, we have never supposed, under all the circumstances, that it would have been incumbent on him to fight Mr. CANNING: though we can easily imagine that a challenge to that effect was the only answer which the Right Honourable Gentleman would have made. But the public, all this while, know nothing of him; and since he has declined coming forward to vindicate the truth in his own person, we suspect that their belief in it, as far at least as his information goes beyond their own experience, will be exceedingly modified by doubts of his veracity or of his conscious intentions.

As to Mr. CANNING himself, we have expressed our opinion of him before, and hardly need repeat it. He is a mere man of the world, with all the cleverness and all the ignorance of the more verbal class of that species. He has enough talent to make his way in life, with just sufficient perception of better things to hamper and commit him in the process; and he has all the want of real wisdom and sentiment, that shall thwart his intellectual ambition at the close of it,—that shall make him display his wit at the expense of his humanity, shall exhibit him pettiest when he thinks himself greatest, and force him to take refuge from the vain effort at being happy in a bullying pretence of being so.—Nay, it must have a worse effect with him; it must end in the still more unhappy notion that all his fellow-creatures are hollow and hopeless; and that he himself is only their superior, inasmuch as he knows all the horror of the secret.—Such is the success of insincerity.

A great deal has been said by the Courier, in its remarks on the Letter to Mr. CANNING, of a threat of assassinating him. The attempts of that delicious journal at pity or terror, are in general exceedingly ludicrous and posture-making; but on a subject of this nature, it falls, somehow or other, into a genuine set of fits. It never forgets itself so far, however, as not to misrepresent a thing. The passage, which the Courier has represented, without qualification, as a direct threat of this nature, is, according to the observation of a Morning Paper, “conditional three deep.” It is this:—

“You are not protected by your personal insignificance. The power, almost absolute, which has been, and may again be, placed in your hands, may make you a respectable victim; and be assured, Sir, that if I should ever be a prisoner of State, an hatter being trained by your gaolers, should be assaulted by your jokes, I WILL PUT YOU TO DEATH, with the same deliberation as I now give you this timely warning. This is no idle, although it is a defensive menace: nor is the resolution confined to one individual.—IDEM TRECENTI JURAVIMUS.”

If this announcement is a fearful one to the Courier, it is easy to imagine what it may be to Mr. CANNING, who probably contemplated a few more jokes and Suspensions of the Habeas Corpus before he died. The very least effect of it, we have no doubt, will be to stop the jokes in future. What has been thought the bitterest drop in the cup of distress will not again be forced down the throat of the fettered. Mr. CANNING will not take advantage of the surgical instruments’ piercing a sufferer’s body, to make “the iron enter into his soul.” Misery shall be spared one sorrow, and the Parliament of England one degradation.

This is a good certainly; nor will the Letter be without other advantages; but none of them would have been eventually injured by the writer’s coming forward when called upon. The good would have been secured; and the doubtfulness of the motive done away. The mere mention of his name,—simply, in so many words,—would have struck the mind of the public with all the force of an ancient voice started into life.

The reader knows our opinion of assassination: we have expressed it often, and no later ago than last week. It is in general either mere malignity, or religious fanaticism, or other madness;—it is also, at rare intervals in history, the slow and sorrowful determination, from entirely public motives, of a virtuous enthusiasm overwrought. But the threat here made is so qualified by provisos, and so easily rendered nugatory by very decency of conduct, that it redounds infinitely more to the discredit of him that fears than of him that makes it. It says, “Sir, if you treat me with the most unconstitutional, wanton, and brutal injustice, and put me and all my feelings, public and private, to a living death, I will put you to death in return.”

And now, whether such a threat as this, even so qualified, is right or wrong, one thing is clear, and one fact the half-witted and heartless usurpers of the Constitution cannot put down from their consciences;—which is this—that such threats are provoked by their conduct, and that what Lord Bacon calls “a wild kind of justice” will turn upon them if they do not take care. It will not signify, when it comes to this, what is the abstract argument on the subject. If they will treat the people as brutal butchers do cattle, and wantonly pound, bleed, overdrive, and worry them, and laugh at their hamstringing, they might as well read a passage in SENECA to a mad ox, as Couriers, Quarterly Reviews, and Riot Acts to an infuriated community. Their books and their teeth will be dashed down their throats together. In vain will those have written against violence, whose corruption wantonly persists all the while in provoking it. In vain will even those have written against it, who like ourselves would sympathize with the common humanity of all; and warn the provokers while they vindicated the rights of the provoked. Either Mr. CANNING must give up his brutal jokes, and the hiring writers their anti-popular jargon,—either they must give up the question so eternally begged against the possible rebellion of the many, in favour of the rebellion-provoking willfulness of the few,—and begged the more in proportion as communities have been driven mad,—(for this is the whole secret of the foolish cant against revolution), or when settling-day comes in money matters, God and the inexhaustibly forbearing help those, on whom millions of hollow eyes are turned during the scuffle.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, APRIL 14.—M. Dumoyet, one of the authors of the Centurion, was arrested on Sunday, and conveyed to La Force. A commissary and officers of the peace went also to the house of M. Comis, but he was not there.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, APRIL 1.—A report, which is however very improbable, has obtained circulation here, that the Spanish Infant, Don Francis Paul, who has left this capital to proceed to Madrid, has been summoned thither in order to embark at Cadiz, for the purpose of founding a new Dynasty of the Bourbons at Buenos-Ayres.

POLAND.

WARSAW, MARCH 27.—Yesterday his Majesty the Emperor our King opened the Diet, with the following speech, which was spoken by his Majesty in the French language, and afterwards read in the Polish language by his Excellency the Minister Secretary of State:—

"Representatives of the kingdom of Poland,

"Your hopes and my wishes are receiving their accomplishment. The people, to represent whom you are summoned hither, enjoy at length a national existence, secured by arrangements which time has matured and sanctioned. The most sincere oblivion of every thing that has passed could alone produce your regeneration. It was resolved upon in my mind, the moment that I could calculate upon the means of effecting it. Proud of the glory of my country, I have endeavoured to procure it a new one. In fact, Russia, after a passed melancholy war, returning, according to the precepts of the Christian religion, good for evil, has paternally held out its arms to you; and of all the advantages which victory gave it, she preferred one—namely, the honour of raising and restoring a brave and estimable nation. In contributing to this, I obeyed an internal conviction, powerfully supported by events. I have fulfilled a duty which was presented only by this conviction, and which is for that reason dearer to my heart.

"The organization which was in force in your country, has allowed the immediate establishment of that which I have given you, by putting into effect the principal of those liberal establishments which were always the object of my care, and whose wholesome influence I hope, with the help of God, to extend to all the countries which Providence has committed to my care. In this manner you have offered me the means of showing to my country what I have long since been preparing for it, and which it will obtain when the basis of so important a work shall have received the necessary consistency. Poles! it is for you who have laid under the fatal prejudices which have drawn upon you so many evils, to give durability to your regeneration.

"It is indissolubly united with the fate of Russia; all your efforts must be employed to give stability to this salutary and protecting union. Your re-establishment is fixed by solemn treaties. It is confirmed by the act of the Constitution. The inviolability of these foreign engagements, and of their fundamental laws, ensure to Poland in future an honourable rank among the nations of Europe—a valuable possession which it has long sought in vain under the severest trials.

"The career of your labours is opened. The Minister of the Interior will lay before you the state of the administration of the kingdom; you will be made acquainted with the projects of laws which will be the subjects of your deliberations. The object of them is progressive ameliorations. The improvement of the public finances requires knowledge, which only time and a due appreciation of the resources of your government can give. The constitutional form of government will be gradually applied to all parts of the administration; the department of justice will soon be formed; proposals relative to the civil and penal legislation will be laid before you. I will readily believe, that when you examine them with persevering attention, you will make laws destined to ensure the most valuable blessing—namely, security of persons and property, and freedom of opinion. As I cannot be always among you, I have left you a brother, my confidential friend, who, from our earliest years, has been my inseparable companion. I have confided your army to him, as the depository of my sentiments and my care for you. He has exerted himself to fulfil his task. By his care this army, already so rich in glorious recollections and warlike qualities, has acquired, since he has been at its head, all the habits of order and regularity which can be obtained only during peace, and prepare the soldier for his true destination. One of your worthiest veterans, as my representative among you, because grey under your standards, and a steady partaker of your adversity and prosperity, he has never ceased to give proofs of his attachment to the country. Experience has fully justified my choice. Notwithstanding my exertions, the evils under which you had to labour are not, perhaps, all repaired. It is, however, in the nature of things: what is good thrives but slowly, and perfection is unattainable by human weakness.

"Representatives of the kingdom of Poland!—Elevate yourselves to the height of your destination. You are called upon to give a great example to Europe, whose eyes are fixed upon you.

"Show your contemporaries that the liberal institutions, whose ever sacred principles it is sought to confound with those destructive doctrines which in our days have threatened the social system with a dreadful catastrophe, are no dangerous illusion; but if they are sincerely carried into effect, and are directed to an object useful to humanity, are perfectly compatible with order, and that they produce in common accord the true welfare of nations. Henceforth it is for you to prove this great and salutary truth; may harmony and concord prevail in your assembly—may dignity, calmness, and moderation characterise your deliberations; guided solely by love to your country, purify your opinions, make them independent of all private or exclusive interests; express them with simplicity and frankness, and avoid the seductiveness which may often accompany fluency in speaking; lastly, may the sense of paternal friendship which the chosen lawgiver has presented to us all, never forsake you.

"In this manner your assembly will obtain the approbation of the country, and the general esteem which such a one will ever enjoy, when the representatives of a free nation do not suffer the exalted character with which they are invested to degenerate.

"First Officers of the State, Senators, Representatives, Deputies, I have expressed my thoughts to you, I have shown you your duties.

"The result of your labours will show me what the country may expect in future from your attachment to it, as well as from your good sentiment towards me, and whether, faithful to my resolutions, I can farther extend what I have already done for you. Let us thank Him who alone has power to enlighten Princes, to render nations brethren, and to spread over them blessings of love and of peace—let us implore him to bless and prosper your work."

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

SOMERSET.—PITMAN v. MORGAN.—This was an action for the Seduction of the Plaintiff's Daughter, Mary Pitman, a girl not yet 16, though the mother of a child. The Plaintiff superintended the soap business at Bath of the Defendant's father. About twelve months ago, the Defendant, who is now not of age, desired Mary Pitman to bring the key of the till to him. He was then in bed, when he took that opportunity of completing the seduction, in consequence of which she became pregnant, and was delivered of a child, which shortly died.—On the girl's cross-examination, she denied ever having taken liberties with other men, or even suffered them. She entered the witness-box crying and apparently much agitated, and had the appearance of a child of twelve.—On the part of the Defendant, witnesses were called, who deposed that Mary Pitman was in the habit of inviting young men to take gross liberties with her, even while in the presence of others, and that she was altogether a very bold girl.—The Jury, after a ten minutes consultation, gave a verdict for the Plaintiff, with 200*l.*s. damages.

THOMAS v. TYSER.—This action we briefly noticed last week. The following are some of the particulars:—The Plaintiff was a Clergyman of property, living at Bradford, near Tiverton, and the Defendant was a Physician there, and also a man of some fortune. The Plaintiff, at the age of 26, in 1811, married a Miss Bailey, a young lady of 22, whom the Counsel and witnesses described as being handsome, well-educated, with an admirable understanding, and peculiar good taste.—She had borne her husband four children, to the last three of which the Defendant had been accoucheur. He was about 50 years of age, and had a family of five or six children, but his wife died in June last.—The criminal connexion was proved by the female servants of the plaintiff. They deposed, that Dr. Tyser used to visit Mrs. Thomas repeatedly in the absence of her husband; that they used to sit up alone together till two in the morning, in the study, without candles; that on various occasions they were seen together in very indecent situations; that Mrs. Thomas, after Dr. Tyser had been forbidden the house, used to admit him through the garden door, &c. &c. The intimacy, it appeared, had existed for more than two years, though none of the servants had disclosed what they knew to Mr. Thomas.—The connexion was in fact admitted by the Defendant himself, who had told a Mr. Smith to contradict a report that he was going to forsake Mrs. Thomas, for he would never desert her as long as he had breath. And the lady had also declared to a friend of her husband, that she would never give up Dr. Tyser.—It was endeavoured by the Defendant's Counsel to throw some blame upon Mr. Thomas, who was described as a romping Clergyman and a keeper of hounds. Something too was attempted to be insinuated respecting a young lady's not being called, of the name of Watkins, who used to visit at Mr. Thomas's, and with whom he used to romp; but it failed.—The Judge declared, that Dr. Tyser being admitted in a confidential manner as a Physician was an aggravation of his offence; that the attachment of the husband had been clearly shown by his offer of forgiveness; and his conduct was wholly free from reproach, when he determined, upon finding his wife's affections were criminally estranged, never to see her more.—The Jury, without retiring from the box, gave the Plaintiff Two Thousand Pounds Damages.

LEEDS.—At our Borough Sessions on Monday, as soon as the Court had pronounced the sentence of transportation for seven years upon James Utley, the prisoner with hardened assurance, exclaimed—"D—n you, I wish you may all sit there till I come back again." On which the Court, with more justice than magnanimity, directed that he should, in addition to his other sentence, be privately flogged. This reminds us of the case of a fellow in Dublin who had committed some trifling offence, for which the Judge pronounced the following sentence:—Judge—"The sentence of the Court is, that you shall be flogged from the Bank to the Quay"—Prisoner—"Thank you, my Lord, you have done your worst."—Judge—"And back again."—Leeds Mercury.

WARWICK.—Rebecca Hodgas, aged 38, was capitally convicted of maliciously setting fire to and in part destroying two stacks of wheat and one stack of hay, the property of Samuel Birch.—The Jury, after a very little hesitation, found the prisoner guilty. The Learned Baron immediately passed the dreadful sentence of death in the most impressive manner.—The Prisoner vehemently called upon his Lordship to spare her life; but his Lordship said he should be compromising the duties of the honourable office which he held, if he were even to suggest that there was the slightest ground upon which to recommend an alleviation of her fate. She was taken from the bar, still exclaiming, "Spare my life!"—The conduct of the prisoner is supposed to have arisen from jealousy, the prosecutor having married, to the exclusion of her hopes. A former deadly attempt at revenge had very nearly proved fatal. Mr. Birch was sitting enjoying his afternoon's nap in his kitchen-chair, when she entered the house and discharged a pistol at his head. Though his skull was fractured, by the operation of trepanning his life was saved.

KINGSTON.—CASE OF BLOOD MONEY.—A respectable looking young man, named Aaron Emmett, was put to the bar, charged with having, in company with several others, assaulted Edward Smith, on the highway, and taken from his person a pocket-book, containing four bank-notes for 1*l.* each, one guinea, 1*s.* in silver, some halfpence, a box, comb, knife, &c.

Edward Smith, waggoner, at Weston-green, stated the particulars of the alleged robbery. When the robbers, he said, were about to leave him, a pistol was discharged over his head. He was positive that the prisoner was one of the party.

Robert Crawford, an accomplice, said that he came forward to give evidence for his own safety. He described the robbery in exactly the same terms as Smith, but said, that instead of the pistol being discharged over his head, it had gone off at some distance from him by accident.

W. Waffron deposed, that on the night of the alleged robbery, he heard the noise of men at the gate of Lady Sullivan, and on the next day there were found, on the road side, the stock and barrel of a pistol, a knife, comb, &c.

A man, named Potter, assisted in apprehending the prisoner. He denied that he had concerted with Smith, or talked to him of the reward that would result from his conviction.

Mr. Thomas Hicks, in behalf of the prisoner, stated, that he was the proprietor of the King's Head Tavern, James-street, Covent-garden. On his way to Ditton he stopped at Kingston, and there learned that a Gentleman, whom he sought, was in the Assize Court. The witness went there, but was unable to gain admittance. He, however, stopped some time in the passage, where, among others, he observed the prosecutor Smith, and the witness Potter. They were in close conversation, and he distinctly heard the latter say to Smith—"If you don't swear point blank to Emmett, we shall lose every farthing of the money."

To this Smith replied—"Swear to him!—yes, that I will, and nothing else!" The witness, alarmed at such abominable proceedings, called Mr. Hibbert, of Kingston, to whom he made known the fact.

Mr. Hibbert confirmed the testimony of Mr. Hicks, who, upon hearing the infamous conversation he had related, said to him, "Good God! is it possible that the lives of men can thus be sworn away?"

A great number of respectable individuals, who had known the prisoner for many years, gave him an excellent character. When taken into custody, he was found pursuing his regular employment.

Mr. Baron Wood thought the story of the accomplice was more pregnant with suspicion than confirmation. But were it even otherwise, the testimony of a disinterested and respectable witness, Mr. Hicks, was calculated to shake the whole. The Jury were to say, whether the story of an avowed thief was to be received in preference to the evidence of the gentleman just named; and if they could give credit to the latter, he could not but add, that a more abominable conspiracy, or a more deliberate act of infamy in seeking money at the expense of the life of a fellow creature, was never known.

The Jury would not suffer his Lordship to proceed, and loudly declared themselves satisfied with the innocence of the prisoner.

The latter was instantly discharged out of custody, and, hastening up to Mr. Hicks, fell upon his knees, and blessed him for the preservation of his life. He assured Mr. Hicks also, that his humanity was not unworthily exercised, as he knew no more of the alleged robbery than himself.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 13.

REGENT'S MESSAGE—ROYAL MARRIAGES.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL brought down a Message from the Prince Regent:—(for which, see Commons.)—Ordered to be considered to-morrow.

FEES ON PARDONS.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE made some observations respecting the practice of exacting fees from persons who had obtained pardons from the Crown, by far the greater part of whom were unable to pay them (they amounted to more than 40*l.*), and consequently could not fully avail themselves of the mercy afforded. The Marquis concluded by moving for some papers on the subject.

Lord HOLLAND noticed another abuse, which he thought called for remedy. It would perhaps, he said, almost appear incredible, that an expense was incurred by a plea of Not Guilty; and that lawyers in some cases advised their clients to plead guilty, to avoid the expense! This he deemed an enormous abuse; and he hoped that and other such practices would be looked into.

Various papers were ordered on the subject of fees and pardons.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, April 14.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL, wishing to postpone till to-morrow the consideration of the Regent's Message on this subject, moved that the order be discharged.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE thought this postponement of the Regent's Message a very extraordinary and unusual proceeding. It was impossible to believe, that, when Ministers had advised the Message, they had not been prepared to state their intended measures. The House, he thought, should return an immediate answer to the Message.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL said, the sole object of the delay was, that their Lordships might be better prepared to give their opinion on the measures which Ministers might consider it their duty to recommend.

Lord HOLLAND remarked, it was evident the Noble Earl was not prepared to make a proposition upon the Message, because he now apprehended an opposition which he did not at first anticipate. The course now adopted by the Noble Earl was disrespectful to the Crown, and unfair to the House and to the people. It was calling upon the House to defer doing till to-morrow what should be done now, in order that Ministers might have time to tamper with those who are to decide on the question. (Hear, hear!) If marriages were to take place, suitable provision should be made for the Princes; but that might be done without any additional burthens. He should move an amendment, expressing the satisfaction of the House at the intended marriages, and their willingness to concur in making a suitable provision, &c. due regard being had to the present burdened state of the people.

Lord SIDMOUTH maintained that it was not candid to call for explanations now. Impressions which had been produced might be removed: alterations might be made in the plan. (Hear, hear!) These were reasons for delay which ought to have weight.

Lord KING and the Earl of LAUDERDALE would vote for the amendment.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE wished to learn how the impressions spoken of were to be removed? Not evidently by argument, for they had heard none; but some mode was to be adopted without the knowledge or concurrence of that House, and which, it seemed, was not fit to be stated.

Lord HOLLAND said, that if the Noble Secretary would agree to his amendment to-morrow, he would now agree to the discharge of the order.

The House divided—when the amendment was negatived by 51 to 12.

A motion was then made for a return of the incomes of the Royal Dukes, from whatever sources.—Ministers objected to this word, and another motion was proposed, which the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH objected to as altogether disrespectful and indelicate!—The motion was finally postponed till to-morrow.

THE BANK.

Some conversation took place on a motion for a return from the Bank of all advances made to it by Government, of the money laid out in Exchequer Bills, and of all its demands upon Government.—Ministers resisted it, on the ground that the House had no right to call on the Bank for information how it employed its money.—Lord HOLLAND said, that if a private banker was situated as the Bank was, he would be liable to such inquiries.—The motion was withdrawn.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, April 15.

An Address to the Regent, praying for a return of the incomes of the Princes, was passed nem. dis.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL rose to propose an Address to the Prince Regent in answer to the Royal Message. He alluded to the death of the Princess Charlotte, and the operation of that event in the present state of the Royal Family. Out of 12 living descendants of the Sovereign, 7 Princes and 5 Princesses, the youngest Prince was now 44, and not one of the youngest Princesses was under 41. When this circumstance was considered, and also that there was at present no descendant from any of the married branches of the family, he thought their Lordships should take measures respecting the succession to the Throne, as one of great political urgency. The Noble Earl then stated the plan which Ministers had at first thought it right to advise, which would have given the Duke of Clarence an addition of 10,500*l.*, making his income 40,000*l.* a-year;—the Duke of Cambridge, 12,000*l.*, making his income 30,000*l.*:—a similar grant to the Duke of Kent, under the like contingency, and a corresponding one to the Duke of Cumberland. The Duke of Gloucester and his Royal Consort possessed 28,000*l.* a-year, and he did not think the proposition to give the Duke of Clarence 40,000*l.* and the others 30,000*l.* a-year, could be regarded as an unreasonable proportion. Neither could there be any reason assigned for withholding the case of the Duke of Cumberland, and thus cast a stigma on that illustrious person; for there had been nothing in his conduct to merit it, nor in that of his illustrious Consort, since she had been in this country.—The Noble Earl then alluded to certain impressions which had been excited on this subject, which he thought ought not to have arisen, and observed, that the illustrious Persons did not wish that anything should be urged upon the country but what was fair and just. He knew not in what state the measure would come out of the other House; but he hoped nothing would take place which would induce the relinquishment of the intended unions.—The Noble Earl concluded with moving an Address to the Regent, expressing the disposition of the House to concur in making a suitable provision for the events in contemplation.

Lord KING was of opinion, that nothing in such a case should be done that did not meet the wishes of the nation at large. If the object was to increase the love and reverence with which the illustrious Individuals should be regarded, would not that love and reverence be diminished by a disregard of the distresses of the people, while attention was paid to the wants of the Princes? (Hear, hear!)—His Lordship proposed an addition to the Address, expressing the hope of the House that the necessary provisions would be made without creating additional burthens on the people.

The Marquis of BUCKINGHAM supported the amendment.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE thought that as all hope of the re-establishment of the King's health must now be given up, the vain splendour by which that exalted Personage was surrounded should be dropped, and thus a fund might be provided to meet the present wants. Though generally concurring in the Address, he should vote for the amendment.

Lord ENSKINE could not approve of any suggestion which went to strip the illustrious and venerable Occupant of the throne of the last relics of royalty and the last comforts of age and infirmity.—(Cheers and hear hear!)—He should vote for the Address, as it pledged the House to no particular measures.

Lord ROLLE said, that as his Majesty had been ever gracious to him in prosperity, he should never desert him in adversity.

The Duke of ATHOL opposed the amendment, and observed, that if the whole people were polled, he was sure they would rather submit to new privations rather than allow the conveniences and comforts of their decayed and beloved Monarch to be at all diminished.

Lord DE DUNSTANVILLE said he should vote for the amendment.

Lord HOLLAND concurred in the Address only as it was limited and explained by the amendment. If the alliances were to be made with honourable Ladies of this land, and not with foreign Princesses, he should consider them equally a subject for congratulation. He considered the Royal Marriage Act an innovation on the Constitution, which he heartily wished should be repealed.—In making any such grants, the situation of the country was to be considered—the people, in the 3d year of peace, tied up by exorbitant taxation, and trampled on by arbitrary statutes—all occasioned by the pernicious system of Government.—(Hear, hear!)—The enormous sum of a million sterling was now devoted to support the splendour of the Crown! As to the Windsor Establishment, no one desired that the comforts of the afflicted Monarch should be invaded in the slightest degree, but they could not consist in expense nor be augmented by extravagance: such a course indeed was only an addition of mockery to affliction. If the House acted with sincerity, it would adopt the amendment proposed. The splendour of the Crown was not to be increased by pageantry and expense; on the contrary, it would appear to much greater advantage, if many of its showy appendages were struck off.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE could not support the amendment, as he did not see how a revenue could be voted without adding to the public burthens.

Earl GROSVENOR was of opinion, that the rejection of the amendment, which pledged them to attend to the public distresses, would produce a bad impression on the public mind. It had his hearty assent.

The amendment was however negatived without a division, and the original motion for the Address carried.—Adjourned.

Thursday, April 16.

The Duke of MONTROSE reported that the Prince Regent had been waited on with the Address in reply to the Message respecting the Royal Marriages, and had graciously received the same.

The Marquis of CROMWELL reported, in answer to the Address on the income of the Princes, that the Prince Regent would order an account to be laid before the House.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 13.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR obtained leave to bring in a Bill for establishing a Water Company in Mary-le-bone.

General GASCOYNE brought in a Bill to prevent frivolous and vexatious actions in the inferior Courts. His object, he said, was, to extend the powers of the Act of the 23d Charles II. so that in suits for 40*s.* the costs should not be more than the sum sued for.

Mr. BROUGHAM presented a Petition from 130 inhabitants of Newbury, complaining of the mismanagement of the Charitable Institutions there.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTS BURGHS.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY presented a Petition from the burgh of Wigton. It was signed by 120 persons. It drew, he believed, a tolerably accurate picture of the situation of most of the Scotch burghs. It stated, that, although not according to the charter, the magistrates and the council were not elected by the inhabitants; that they elected themselves; and that the representation in Parliament was a perfect mockery. It stated, that out of eighteen magistrates only five were inhabitants of the place. The Petitioners were firmly attached to the Constitution as established, but they complained of the abuses of it. The magistrates and council applied the funds. They observed, that it had been said, the Scotch burgesses would be satisfied by the establishment of an audit of the magistrates' accounts: but this was quite incorrect, for they required a better kind of reform, and a real representation in Parliament; whereas, at present, there was a mere nomination of delegates, under influence, to nominate a member. They prayed the House not to be deluded by misrepresentations of their real opinions.—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CANNING presented two Petitions from Liverpool against the Poor Laws' Bill.—Referred to the Committee.

REGENT'S MESSAGE—ROYAL MARRIAGES.

Lord CASTLEREAGH brought down the following Message from the Prince Regent:—

“GEORGE, P. R.

“The Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, think it right to inform the House of Commons, that Treaties of Marriage are in negotiation between his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and the Princess of Saxe Meiningen, eldest daughter of the late reigning Duke of Saxe Meiningen; and also between his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and the Princess of Hesse, youngest daughter of the Landgrave Frederick, and niece of the Elector of Hesse. After the afflicting calamity which the Prince Regent and the nation have sustained in the loss of his Royal Highness's beloved and only child, the Princess Charlotte, his Royal Highness is fully persuaded that the House of Commons will feel how essential it is to the best interests of the country that his Royal Highness should be enabled to make a suitable provision for such of his Royal Brothers as shall have contracted marriage with the consent of the Crown; and his Royal Highness has received so many proofs of the affectionate attachment of this House to his Majesty's Person and Family, as leave him no room to doubt of the concurrence and assistance of this House in enabling him to make the necessary arrangements for this important purpose.

“G. P. R.”

Lord C. then gave notice of his intention to move, when the Message was referred to a Committee, an Address to the Prince Regent, pledging the House, to take it into consideration.

Mr. TIERNEY was of opinion, that the Noble Lord might have stated to the House what his intentions were on the subject, particularly as they had been communicated to 50 or 60 gentlemen, who had attended the House of a Minister that morning.—(Hear, hear!) The Noble Lord seemed by this step to have thought he could not get through his work without a previous rehearsal.—(Hear, hear.)

Lord CASTLEREAGH explained, that nothing had been done contrary to precedent.

Mr. PROTHEROE said, that time should be given and the discussion postponed—for which object he should move for a call of the House.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, that if the House properly valued its character, the peace of the country, and the stability of the Throne, they would take every step in their decisions to carry the voice of the country with them.—(Hear, hear!)—Before they legislated on this subject, they should know what the Royal Personages already possessed.

Mr. METHUEN was of the same opinion, and he should move for an account of the civil and military incomes of the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, and Cambridge.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR, though no man was more attached to the House of Brunswick, could not but think the intended grants highly objectionable.

Mr. CUBWEN and Mr. BRAND pressed for information on the subject.

Lord LASCELLES was present at the meeting mentioned by Mr. Tierney, and said, that what had there transpired had neither satisfied him nor others who were present.

Mr. BESNET put a question to Lord CASTLEREAGH respecting the sums intended to be called for; to which the Noble Lord declined an answer.

Sir C. MONCK thought it a strange piece of conduct in Ministers, to give information to a private meeting which they refused to the House of Commons.

Mr. CALCRAFT called on some one of the Gentlemen present at that meeting to give the House the requisite information.—(No answer.)

It was then agreed that the Message should be taken into consideration to-morrow by a Committee of the whole House.

Lord CASTLEREAGH then moved that an humble Address should be presented to the Regent, returning the thanks of the House for his gracious Message concerning the intended marriages, and to assure his Royal Highness that the House would proceed to the consideration of the Message in such a manner as should be consistent with the honour of his Majesty's person and family, and with the interests of his illustrious House.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, there was one omission in the Address, which, unless supplied, made it impossible that it should meet with his concurrence. The Address, after expressing the satisfaction of the House on the intended marriages, pledged them to take such measures as were consistent with a regard for the establishment of the family, without saying one word about another regard which they ought principally to entertain, that due regard for the state of the people, for the burdens under which they laboured, and for their capacity to sustain the pressure of those burdens,—that regard which ought to limit the demands made for the third branch of the legislature—the Royal Family. Mr. B. then moved, as an amendment to the motion, that after the word ‘House’ should be added, “and with a due regard to the present burdened state of the people of this country.”—(Hear, hear, from the Opposition parties.)

Lord CASTLEREAGH thought that the amendment of the Hon. Gentleman had a tendency to imply, that in some quarter there was not that due regard to the people that there should be. The amendment certainly tended to the reception of that principle.

Sir G. HEATHCOTE did not feel all that joy that the Noble Lord perhaps might feel on occasion of these marriages. No one of them ever occurred without the country being burdened. At present a man had only to walk about with his eyes open, to see the country in a most distressed condition. They ought to consider before they added even a single sixpence to the public burdens.

Mr. TIERNEY said, the amendment did no more than was right; for though it was proper to show attachment to the Crown, yet it was equally their duty to show that they were alive to the interests of the people.

The gallery was then cleared for a division. While the reporters were excluded, the debate proceeded:

Mr. COCKS declared, that he could not vote for the amendment, as he thought it would be offensive to the Royal Personage by whom the Message had been sent.

Mr. PLUNKETT earnestly recommended Mr. Brougham to withdraw his amendment from similar considerations.

Mr. ABERCROMBY was surprised at the observation of Mr. Plunkett.

After some farther conversation, the House divided.—Against the amendment, 144—For the amendment, 93—Majority for the original motion, 51.

Mr. P. METHUEN moved for a return of the incomes of the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, Sussex, and Cambridge; also of all allowances from the droits of Admiralty since 1800.

Mr. TIERNEY proposed that their incomes from foreign states should be included.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said it was impossible to make such a return, as the means of making it were beyond the province of Ministers.

Mr. J. P. GRANT said, that at least the personages who received those incomes had the power to make the return.

Mr. BROUGHAM thought that the House ought at least to be informed of the emoluments of the Duke of Cambridge in Hanover, and he could name one person who could make a return to that effect; it was the person who was making the application to the House for more money. (Hear, hear!) Their grant must be influenced by the amount of the present income, because they would grant only what was necessary for supporting the splendour belonging to the situation of the Royal Dukes. Hanover had formerly been a burden; it would be some compensation if she were now found to alleviate our charges. (Hear, hear!)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that on former occasions of a similar nature, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox had made no inquiry into the foreign receipts of any of the Royal Family.

Mr. BROUGHAM replied, that if Mr. Fox had lived to see the country so burdened as at present, his conduct in that respect would have been different.

Mr. PROTHORP conceived this to be a question of very great importance, and therefore thought that there should be a full attendance of Members. He moved for a call of the House on Friday the 24th.—A call of the House for that day was ordered accordingly.

OFFENDERS' CONVICTION AND REWARD BILL.

Mr. BENNET moved the 2d reading of the Bill for abolishing rewards in cases of the conviction of offenders.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had no difficulty in admitting the propriety of some alteration in the law as it now stood. His notion was, that it would be injurious to the interests of justice to take away the rewards for conviction in all cases; but that both the extent of the reward, the distribution of it, and whether there ought to be any reward at all, ought to be referred to judges before whom the indictment was tried. The stimulus for the apprehension of criminals would thus be left, while the inducements to conspiracy would be removed.

Mr. W. SMITH thought that what was objectionable in the Bill might be amended in the Committee.

Mr. BENNET said, that the Police Officers, the Magistrates, and the public, were all agreed on the propriety of abolishing these rewards. They induced false testimony, and were an object of just suspicion with the juries and the people. Indictments were not laid according to the crime, but according to the reward to be obtained. The Bill proposed to indemnify prosecutors and witnesses for their expenses, and to remunerate them for their trouble. He did not think that the ends of justice required more. Fixed rewards had been long the great blot in our system of criminal procedure. These rewards held out a bounty for crime and a temptation to perjury. By this means children were prosecuted for capital felonies, who, without it, would have been punished by a ducking. Two children were now in Newgate, one 13 and the other 9 years of age, who had been convicted on the testimony of a child of 6 years of age, and who would never have been prosecuted for capital felonies, except for this system of rewards. He trusted, therefore, that the Bill, which was intended as a remedy for these monstrous evils, would be allowed to be read a second time.

Alderman WOOD supported the second reading. He gave his decided opinion against all fixed rewards whatever.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL supported the arguments of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BENNET wished only the Judge to have the power, which he did not now possess, of ordering a reward at his discretion, together with indemnity for expenses incurred: and he proposed a clause to that effect.

After a few words from General THORNTON and Sir THOMAS BARING, who supported the Bill, it was read a second time.

After a few words from Mr. Alderman WOOD, leave was given to bring in a Bill to regulate paratheraps for the employment of the poor in Ireland.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, April 14.

On the proposition of Mr. M. A. TAYLOR, a Committee was appointed to bring in a Bill to regulate the Marylebone Water Companies.

Mr. Burrell's motion for a Committee to inquire into the state of the laws restraining the Wool Trade, was negatived, after some debate, by 85 to 80.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

LORD CASTLEREAGH moved that the consideration of the Regent's Message be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. BROUGHAM commented on this extraordinary delay. He said, a Noble Member of the other House had assembled a number of Members of the House of Commons in a room in his own house, and had stated to them the intentions of Government—(Hear, hear!)—most of those assembled were independent Country Members—they were a body of Members who were feared by Ministers, and to whom the Noble Lord had made communications which he withheld from the House of Commons. If the House allowed such proceedings, debating would become a mere mockery—there would be no real discussion. Lord Liverpool, however, had mistaken the silence of the persons thus assembled for consent; but when they returned to their proper character of Representatives, they soon evinced their dislike to the extravagant propositions of the Minister; and now time was wanted to try new arts on the votes and honesty of the Members. The Noble Lord knew that he dared not then, even on his own notice, bring his question before the House.—(Hear, hear!)

LORD CASTLEREAGH said, that nothing had been done but what had been the usual practice. The Honourable and Learned

Gentleman's observations were only part of a system to vilify and run down the Administration. He should enter into no particulars now, but reserve himself till to-morrow, when he should endeavour to satisfy the House, that Ministers had in all cases studied the interests of the nation.—(Hear!)

Mr. CANNING stated, that if his Hon. Friend's intention was to vilify the Government, it was a very unnecessary one; for surely no Ministry had ever before so vilified themselves!—(Hear!)—No Ministry that he had known had ever put themselves into a more contemptible situation.—(Hear, hear!)—He knew of no other words than those he had used by which fairly to express his opinion. Ministers had collected what they deemed a faithful few at Lord Liverpool's house, where they should have had a gallery for those who were not Members, that this precious debate might have been heard. But in fact there was no debate; it was a sort of Quakers' meeting. No notice was taken of Lord Liverpool's speech to them; but when they came out, the Gentlemen became mutineers.—(Laughter)—and they generally objected to the propositions. Perhaps the Noble Lord declined to tell why he postponed his communication, for possibly he wished to avoid the degradation of saying that he must wait to take further orders.—(Hear, hear!)—From what he had heard, he understood the Minister proposed to make up the income of the Duke of Clarence to 40,000*l.* a-year, giving his Royal Highness an outfit of 20,000*l.*; also that 12,000*l.* a-year additional should be given to the Duke of Kent, to make up his income 30,000*l.* a-year, with an outfit of 12,000*l.* Further, that the Duke of Cumberland was to have an increase of 12,000*l.* a-year, and an outfit of 12,000*l.* and so make up his 32,000*l.* a-year.—(Hear, hear!)—and the Duke of Cambridge was to have, in the same way, 12,000*l.* a-year, to make the 32,000*l.* a-year, with his 12,000*l.* outfit. If this scheme were sanctioned, the expense of it for this year would amount in the whole to 116,000*l.*—(Hear!)

—In common candour he must believe that Ministers had deliberately considered the whole measure, and that they thought the Royal Personages could not enter upon the marriage state without these great additions of income; and also that, according to their general professions, they considered this as the most economical arrangement they could form.—(Hear!)—But why now change the mode of their proceedings? Why delay the consideration? Why did the Noble Lord, after having given his advice on the subject to his Royal Master, and produced his Royal Master's Message to the House, now desert his Royal Master, and look about him to his friends in that House? Gentlemen who desired every practicable retrenchment, were now called upon to support a set of Ministers who did study economy in the public affairs.—(Hear!)—The conduct of Ministers in this transaction really involved them in degradation, upon degradation. When system was talked of, let gentlemen look across at the opposite bench, and see of what an incongruous and discordant body Ministers were composed. From them could any thing of system be expected to come.—(Hear!)—The truth was, that their only system was this—to try at any thing, and if it did not answer, to try something else. On his word, he would say that he did really pity the Noble Lord; and his compassion for his situation was even more than his indignation at his conduct to his Royal Master.—(Hear, hear!)—What sort of a figure did the Noble Lord make, and on what grounds did he stand in the eyes of the various foreign Ministers of Europe now in this country, appearing not to know what to do?—(Hear!)—He believed sincerely, that nothing less than the Noble Lord's total abandonment of the whole proposition would be satisfactory to the country at large.—(Hear, hear!)

The motion of Lord CASTLEREAGH was then agreed to.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY moved that the Bill be read a third time.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed an amendment, that for the words in the preamble, which stated, that the extreme severity of punishment, by increasing the difficulty of conviction, afforded impunity to crimes, and which made the change in the value of money a reason for altering the law, should be substituted, simply, an expression of the expediency of repealing the law as at present constituted.

Sir S. ROMILLY said, that the principle now objected to was the very foundation of the Bill. "Extreme severity,"—he begged that the House would attend to the expression,—"extreme severity, by rendering conviction more difficult, afforded impunity to crime." This was a truth of universal notoriety. It was well known, that the fear of the punishment of death following conviction had often prevented prosecutions for privately stealing, and thus afforded entire impunity to the crime. Instances were so numerous, that it was unnecessary to trouble the House with any reference to them. As to the second ground of objection, could any one pretend that 5s. was now the same sum in value as in the reign of King William? Was it not now equal to 20s., or, at least, to 10s.? If so, the punishment of death for 5s. now was necessarily more severe than the Act contemplated, since it was applied to a sum not one-half the value of the sum to which the Act had limited it.

Mr. WILBERFORCE said, that if his Learned Friend was not of the highest service to his country, it was not for want of zeal in endeavouring to render our laws less bloody. (Hear, hear!) Upon the principles of human nature, it was clear that attention to the early stages of criminality was the only sure mode of preventing and diminishing crimes. If there was any one evil to be guarded against more than another, it was the introduction of a gambling principle in penal legislation. It extinguished all sobriety of consideration and seriousness of mind, and nursed that hardness and daring which qualified for any crime. If one principle was more sacred than another on this subject, it ought to be the certainty of punishment according to the nature of the crime. (Hear.)

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, April 16.

The Papercas Poor Bill was opposed by the Solicitor-General, and thrown out without a division.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

The House went into a Committee on the Regent's Message—when

Lord CASTLEREAGH stated to the House the plan which Ministers had advised (which will be seen in Lord Liverpool's speech in the other House.) He then adverted to the condition of the Princes, the state of the succession, the propriety of creating no delay in the marriages of the Princes, the necessity of making that state comfortable to them, and to the consideration, that a single marriage might not afford satisfactory expectations. The Prince Regent had unhappily lost his daughter, and the Duke of York had no children. In all human probability, the issue of the Duke of Clarence might come into the line of succession. The Princess Charlotte had a settlement of 60,000*l.* a-year. The Duke of York had 37,000*l.* besides military appointments. The Duke and Duchess of Gloucester had 28,000*l.* Besides the Duke's emoluments. It did not appear the duty of Ministers to put the King's Sons in a situation subordinate to the Duke of Gloucester. Prince Leopold had now 50,000*l.* a-year. To meet the new wants, there was the 10,000*l.* remaining from the 60,000*l.* granted to the late Princess, and in the course of two years, 50,000*l.* a-year, now devoted to the payment of the Prince Regent's debts, would be also available. As Parliament, however, had manifested an indisposition to the plan originally suggested by Ministers (though they were still convinced of its propriety) he would not press it upon the House. Much had been said of the emoluments of some of the Princes. The Duke of Cambridge's income from Hanover, as Military Governor, did not exceed 5000*l.* and with other contingencies amounted only to about 6000*l.* a-year. The Duke of Clarence had only 1000*l.* a-year as half-pay. The Duke of Kent's emoluments as Governor of Gibraltar, and his regiment, did not exceed 6000*l.* annually. Ministers had gone into a strict examination, and the result was, that unless 10,000*l.* a-year additional allowance was granted, the Duke of Clarence could not possibly support his rank in the married state. Allowing this sum to his Royal Highness, in consequence of the closer proximity of his issue to the succession, he should propose further, a resolution for 6000*l.* to the Dukes of Kent, Cambridge, and Cumberland. Less, he thought, could not be voted, if the House wished the marriages to take place, and desired not to expose the Royal Family to the necessity of contracting debts, or to discredit the Royal Succession among foreign nations. He proposed this low estimate with painful feelings, because it was running the risk of making a provision, which might not exempt their Royal Highnesses from the necessity of involving themselves in debt.—The Noble Lord concluded by moving the above grants to the Royal Dukes. And on the first, that of 10,000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Clarence, being put,—

Mr. BARCLAY opposed an additional expenditure in the present distressed condition of the country, when a loan of eleven millions was wanted in a year of peace. The state of the finances should be examined, before any additional allowances were voted, and for this purpose he should propose that the discussion be postponed to this day week.

Mr. PROTHMER contended, that to increase the burthens of the people beyond the possibility of supporting them, would be equally revolutionary as to grant the call for radical reform. This was not the time to augment the public burthens, and he should vote against the proposed resolutions.

Mr. GURNEY said, that the present application was owing to the Marriage Act, which prevented the descendants of George II. from intermarrying with the great native families. The branches of the Royal House were thus forced into connexion with weak and poor German families. In the present state of society, it was absurd to fear the revival of civil wars about the succession.

Mr. HOLME SUMNER alluded to an expression used by a Learned Gentleman (Mr. Brougham) in speaking of a previous meeting, on this subject, of Gentlemen, who, from their character and station, were best acquainted with the sense of the Nation, and fittest to be consulted on such an application to Parliament. The Learned Gentleman had characterized such meetings as clicks. Although they were not equal to the Hon. and Learned Gentleman in ingenuity, in dexterity, and in a certain Parliamentary accomplishment, which, (to use a word borrowed from the same dictionary of slang from which the word click had been taken), he would call the "gift of the gab"—(Much Laughter and Confusion)—yet they were as just and as independent a body as any that ever graced the country.—According to report, the Duke of Clarence's debts amounted to between 50 and 60,000*l.* Of what use, then, would be the proposed grant to the splendour of the Crown?—The Duke of Cambridge had acquitted himself well from the earliest period of his life, and had, greatly to his credit, avoided all debts. When a grant had on a former occasion been proposed for the Duke of Cumberland, Gentlemen came up from all parts to oppose it; and the House was not now fairly treated in his being hooked in among the other Princes. (Long continued cheering.)—He objected to the granting 30,000*l.*, but would agree to 24,000*l.*

Lord CASTLEREAGH explained, that if the 30,000*l.* were agreed to, the Duke of Clarence, whose debts were not truly stated, would be relieved from pressing demands, would make a provision for the extinction of his debts, and then have 25,600*l.* a-year unincumbered.

Mr. COKE could not possibly consent to the proposed arrangements, under the present distresses of the country.

Sir W. CURTIS did not approve of the grants at first intended; but in their modified state he saw sufficient reason for adopting them.

Mr. ELLISON loved liberty as well as any Hon. Member opposite; but he knew his duty too well to convert that zeal into a means for humbugging the people.—(Hear, hear!)—Ministers had carried the country safe through the greatest dangers, and he had always supported them; yet he could not but think the present proposition injurious to Royalty. He would vote for some provision for the Duke of Clarence on his marriage, but the rest of the plan must have his decided negative.

Sir T. AGLAND was sorry he could not approve the present proposition.

Lord J. RUSSEL also opposed it.

Lord LASCELLES felt no sort of objection to the reduced allowances.

Mr. FORBES disapproved of the distinction made in favour of the Duke of Clarence.

Mr. THORNTON said, that the reduced scale appeared to him unobjectionable, and he praised the conduct of the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, as well for their domestic economy as for their refraining on their marriage from calling for an augmentation to their incomes.

Mr. BARCLAY withdrew his amendment.

Lord L. GOWER spoke in favour of the grant to the Duke of Cumberland; and said that the expenses of the Duchess, whose conduct had been exemplary during her residence here, were now borne by the King of Prussia, as Parliament had refused to vote her an establishment.

Sir G. HEATHCOTE thought the incomes of the junior branches of the Royal Family were ample enough: they ought to attend to their domestic concerns.

Mr. CALVERT observed, that the utmost economy ought to be observed in the present embarrassed condition of the nation.

Mr. CANNING assured the House that the alliance had been pressed upon the Duke of Clarence as an act of public duty.—(Loud laughter.)—Without this alliance he wanted not the aid of Parliament, and he contracted this alliance, not for his own private gratification.—(Loud laughter.)—but because he had been advised to do so for the politic purpose of providing for the succession to the throne.—(A laugh.)—If there was any thing ridiculous in this proposition, it was brought about by their own laws. The laws of the country prevented the Royal Family from entering into engagements of marriage at home: they insisted that the branches of their Royal Family should look abroad for wives; and when they came to do this, (as in the present case,) not from liking or affection, for that could not be supposed possible when the persons had not even seen each other, he thought the House could not refuse this grant of 10,000*l.* to the person who might produce the heir to the crown, without exposing him to embarrassment. Ministers were convinced that no less a sum would be sufficient; for if it did not render the marriage impracticable, it would at least endanger its peace, happiness, and prosperity.—(Loud laughter.)—In voting the sum, the House would only grant one-half of what was originally proposed, and for less than that Ministers would not be responsible.

Mr. WODEHOUSE supported the amendment of the Member for Surrey.

Mr. W. SMITH thought that a sufficient sum might be taken out of the Windsor Establishment.

Sir W. GURSE spoke to the same effect.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that no establishment could be conducted with so much economy as the Windsor Establishment. At the utmost, not more than 10,000*l.* could be reduced.

Mr. TIERNEY insisted that the Windsor Establishment was far greater than was necessary. There was 50,000*l.* for the Privy Purse, out of which no expense was paid except of the medical attendants: he would estimate that, at the utmost, at 18,250*l.* the aggregate sum was no less than 245,000*l.* Now, what was done with all this money? Was it spent, or nearly spent? and if not, for what purpose was it accumulated; and why might it not be applied to such uses as outfitting the different branches of the family on their marriages?

Lord CASTLEREAGH replied, that the estimate of the Right Hon. Gentleman was not fairly taken: the medical attendance last year came to 38,000*l.* Great part of the Privy Purse was applied to benevolent purposes; besides providing her Majesty with carriages, servants, and other reasonable expenses of her station.

Mr. LAMETON said, that in the present burdened state of the country, when he saw the poor languishing in want, and distress in every part of the country, he could not consent to burden the people with one shilling more. The question was, whether they should or should not provide out of the pockets of the people for the use and benefit of the Duke of Clarence, because through his misconduct he had extravagantly thrown away what Parliament had so liberally given him. That House would ill discharge its duty to its constituents, whom they must shortly meet again, if they did not resist so unconstitutional a measure in the beginning. They would forfeit every claim to the respect of the country.

Mr. C. WYNN should give his vote in favour of the 6,000*l.* In the event of an increase of family, it would be for Parliament to consider the circumstances of the case. With respect to the Windsor Establishment, it appeared to be a question amply worthy of the consideration of Parliament, but not to-night.

The cries of question became vehement, and the House divided—For Mr. Holme Sumner's amendment of 6,000*l.* a-year, there were, 193—Against it, 184—Majority against Ministers, 9.

The result was received with shouts of applause; amidst which Lord CASTLEREAGH rose, and observed, that since the House had thought proper to refuse the larger sum to the Duke of Clarence, he believed he might say, that the negotiation for the marriage might be considered at an end.

It was agreed to report progress, and ask leave to sit again.—Adjourned.

Thursday, April 16.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

Before the House went into a Committee, Lord CASTLEREAGH stated, that after the opinions expressed last night by the House, he had deemed it his duty to wait upon an illustrious Duke, and inform him of what had passed. His Royal Highness said, he should feel great reluctance in forming any conclusion which might imply any thing unfavourable to the proceedings of the House; but as the matter involved his honour and character, he instructed him (Lord C.) to state his views to the Committee. His Royal Highness was of opinion, that in the event of his marrying a foreign Princess, he could not maintain a proper establishment with the sum proposed, without the liability of incurring debt—and under such circumstances, in the event of the vote passing, he must decline availing himself of the grant. (Hear.)—The House having gone into the Committee, the Noble Lord then moved a Resolution allowing 60,000*l.* a-year additional income to the Duke of Cambridge.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that if it was proved that the incomes of the Royal Dukes were insufficient to allow them to enter the marriage state, he would agree to a proposition for the smallest possible addition. The Hon. Gentleman alluded to the meritorious conduct of the Dukes of Kent and Sussex, in making provision for the liquidation of their embarrassments, &c. He had been informed that the Duke of Cambridge, besides his large professional appointments, had considerable sums in the English funds; and he therefore thought they should pause before they gave him this large addition.—There were other funds, too, besides the Windsor Establishment, which might be available. By the appointment of three Commissioners to his Majesty's personal property, it was to be presumed that such private property was great. It was also understood that her Majesty had very considerable property. (Hear, hear!)—He had no disposition to pry into the private affairs of the Royal Family, but when the dearest and nearest relatives of the Heads of the Family were in difficulties, it was natural that those who had saved by a wise practice of economy should furnish a part at least of the required assistance. (Hear!)—Indeed, from sympathy with a loyal and suffering people, they might pay back the attachment in some measure, as was done by private families, by contributing a portion of their large funds. He should make the stand he did, if only an unnecessary sixpence was called for, as it was the principle of the measure that was of the chief importance. The cry of economy had gone forth from one end of the kingdom to the other, and particularly that connected with the Royal House. Why they were called upon to make a difference between the Dukes of Cambridge and Cumberland he knew not? He saw no reason for it, as it related to the succession.—For himself, he preferred a monarchy to a republic; but he who voted for keeping monarchy higher than it ought to be, supported the delusion under which the people laboured, and compelled them to throw away their veneration for the fabric of monarchy, merely because another form of government was cheaper.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that if there was any course that was calculated entirely to disgust with monarchy, and to alienate the affections of the people from the House of Hanover, the Learned Gentleman could not have pursued a better than he had, when connected with the poison disseminated out of doors. There was no proceeding better adapted to such purposes than throwing out reflections, without assigning any ground, public or private, on which they were founded; than casting insinuations on persons who were known not to be within the walls of that House, and who consequently were unable to defend themselves. He might ask what would be felt when such reflections were thrown out against persons of such a character? Such a proceeding was worse than to contrast one with another, to detract from the reputation of one and to panegyricise the other.—(Hear, hear!)—He trusted that the House would never sanction the principle, that when such illustrious individuals required an addition to their income, they were to plead in forma pauperis. (Hear.)—and come forward with a statement of their affairs. The Learned Gentleman had passed a libel on the people in insinuating that their notions on this subject were so contracted and mercenary!

Mr. BROUGHAM and Lord CASTLEREAGH mutually explained.

Mr. F. DOUGLAS said, the Noble Lord had complained of inattention to the Royal Family, while he had himself set up their marriages to a Dutch auction.—(Hear, hear!)—He was confident that the events which resulted from the conduct of Ministers would have no effect in impairing the general respect entertained for the Royal Family; but the country would feel execration—he could use no gentler term—towards the Ministers who endeavoured to make the succession to the house of Hanover such a grievance to the country.—(hear hear!)

Mr. CURWEN said, it was painful to find it necessary to exercise economy at the expense of the Royal Family, but such was the state of the country, that 1*s.* could not be spared.

Mr. WILBERFORCE did think an addition of 60,000*l.* ought to be given to the royal Duke upon his marriage. The necessity arose in a great measure from the Act of George III., which restricted the marriages of the Royal Family. That Act he did not think wise or salutary.

Mr. BRAND thought the House was bound to know the incomes of the several personages of the Royal Family before throwing away further sums upon them. Unless, therefore, the necessity of granting this sum were made out, he should oppose the resolution.

Mr. TIERNEY contended that the votes of that House ought to be measured, not by the distresses of the Royal Dukes, but by their own; and their own distress compelled them to expend not one farthing more than was necessary. The Royal Duke's situation in Hanover was to be brought into consideration. If his emoluments were of a public nature, they were essential to the question now before the House. Why should that House grant a sum to go to increase the private wealth of the Duke of Cambridge, and not to increase his Royal splendour?—(hear, hear!)—He now opposed the grant of 6,000*l.* If the Noble Lord would declare that the marriage could not take place without this sum, he should vote for it. Otherwise, he would not vote for it till the Royal Duke came to reside in this country.

Mr. STAFFORD thought that Ministers had converted the marriages into the means of obtaining money for the Royal Dukes, without considering the situation of the country. He should therefore vote against the sum proposed.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was desirous of assuring the House, that the appointment of the Duke of Cambridge abroad was any thing but a sinecure. The duties annexed to it were of a very laborious nature, and entitled the individual who discharged them to the full compensation that was particularly provided.

Mr. P. METHUEN charged the Noble Lord (Castlereagh), who threw upon others the reproach of indelicacy, with being the first on the preceding night to introduce invidious comparisons.

Mr. PLUNKETT declared, that looking at the situation of this country, and at his Royal Highness's appointment in another, he could not consent to any further grant to him out of the public funds.

The Committee then divided—For the Resolution, 177—Against it, 95—Majority, 82.

On our return to the Gallery, we found the Committee agreeing to the settlement of jointure on the Princess of Hesse.

Lord CASTLEREAGH, after some few remarks, then moved a resolution for granting an annuity of 6,000*l.* per annum to the Duke of Cumberland.

Mr. BROUGHAM expressed a hope that the Noble Lord would follow up his present motion with another for securing dower to the Duchess of Cumberland. (Hear, hear.) He would not stop or stoop to inquire minutely into such a subject; but it was undeniable that this Lady had been the object of a most ungenerous and illiberal treatment, which had powerfully operated to countenance the prejudices against her: (hear, hear.)

Lord FOLKESTONE expressed his hope, that Parliament would assign dower to the Duchess of Cumberland; with regard to whose character, he could say of his own knowledge, that many of the prevailing prejudices were unfounded.

Lord CASTLEREAGH intimated, that it had never been his intention to pass over the requisite provision for the Duchess.

Mr. WROTTESEY contended, that if dower was granted to the Duchess, it would be an extraordinary act to refuse the annuity to the Duke.

Mr. FORBES declared that he would not, if the grant to the Duke was negatived, insult the Duchess with the offer of dower. (A laugh.) He felt it his duty to call upon the House to reconsider whether an exception ought still to be made to the disadvantage of his Royal Highness.
